The Same old Terms.

Uninterrupted friendship is sweet; and those who have friends, on whom they can rely, year after year, in whose integrity they can confide, without reservations or explanations, should know how to prize such companions. Much of our friendship is marred by human infirmity, imperfection, and failure, which causes disquiet and distrust.

And there are persons who will throw away the confidence of many years, through the influence of some gossip's idle tale; and friends whom they have loved, and for whom they have professed the greatest regard, are cast aside without an explanation or an inquiry, simply upon the slander of some mischief-making meddler. Such friends are of little value. When neeeded they cannot be found; and those who thus betray our trust, and turn carelessly against their friends, almost shake confidence in all human sympathy and regard.

We may, however, thank God for a Divine friendship free from all imperfection; and for a Divine Friend, whose faithfulness is beyond all doubt or uncertainty. Trusting in His love, we are sure that our confidence shall never be betrayed. Casting our care on Him, we know that He careth for us. And taking Him to be our friend and comforter, we read with joy His gracious promise. "I will never leave thee nor forsake you."

But even then, there is much to mar the friendship we might enjoy. Not because He is unfaithful to us, but because we are faithless and untrue to Him. He bids us come to Him with boldness; but how often with shame. He tells us of his faithful promises and his everlasting love; but how often we are forced to confess our love but transient, and our promises untrue. He bids us draw near with a true heart, and in full assurance of faith; but our hearts which condemn us, cause us to hesitate and fear; and the mercies which he waits to grant us, we often feel forbidden to accept. How many times our prayers come laden with the heavy tidings of our sin and shame, instead of rising like fragrant incense to the throne of heavenly grace, to obtain the countless blessings which he waits and longs to grant.

Little do we know of the power and sweetness of a Savior's love, as felt by those who are blameless before the Lord. Little do we know of the mercies that wait for us, and the blessings that he bestows on those who do the things that are pleasing in his sight.

There is a story told of the learned Albert Bengel, a man of faith and prayer, who had power with God, and boldness at the throne of grace. Some one who longed to know the secret of his communion with the Lord, watched unobserved in his hours of retirement one night. "Now," thought he, "I shall hear Bengel pray."

The aged saint sat long before his open Bible, perusing its sacred pages, and comparing scripture with scripture, until the hour of midnight sounded, and he, wearied with his studies, abandoned them for repose. The good man folded his arms over the open word of God, and looking up, sweetly said, "Lord Jesus, thou knowest me. We are on the same old terms." And rising from his place, in a few minutes Bengel's weary frame was resting quietly in the slumbers of the night.

Christian, let this life be yours. Let your sins, once settled, be settled forever. Let your walk be so close with God that your fellowship with the Father and Son shall not be interrupted, so that day by day you may say; in the confidence of a devoted and trusting heart, "We are on the same old terms."—Christian.

Salvation.

BY S. R. ZUG.

"For the Son of man is come to seek and to save that which was lost." Luke 19: 10.

Salvation is a term used by every professor of the Christian religion. It is used in public and private worship, in religious conversation, as well in private, by lay-members, as in public preaching, by ministers everywhere; yet it is seldom duly considered what a stupendous work it required to bring salvation within reach of a fallen humanity.

To seek something signifies that something is lost, whatever that may be. I remember just at this moment, that some years ago one of my neighbors lost his purse containing some money, which, as was natural, he did not like to lose; and consequently instituted a search for it; but without success, and why? Simply because he did not seek at the right place, and that would have been just where it was.

Now the Savior says, "For the Son of man is come to seek and to save that which was lost," The question would come up, what was lost? In answer I will first consider the first word of the above quotation—"For."

Supposing that all my readers will admit that the word "for," in the above scripture passage implies that what follows is given to explain that which immediately precedes it—"And Jesus said unto him, This day is salvation come to this house, forasmuch as he also is the son of Abraham." What! this sinner—this chief among the publicans—to have salvation? Briefly, yes; for Jesus said so. Thus far we see that there was something in the house of Zaccheus that was lost—that needed help, or salvation.

Jesus, when sending out his disciples said, "Go not into the way of the Gentiles; and into any city of the Samaritans enter ye not, but go rather to the lost sheep of the house of Israel." Matt 10: 5, 6. And in the 15th chapter, 24th verse, when besought by a Canaanitish woman to have mercy on her concerning her daughter who was "grievously vexed with a devil," he said: I am not sent but to the lost sheep of the house of Israel." And in 1 Tim. 1: 15, the apostle says, "That Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners," &c. By the quotation at the head of this article, as well as by those following, except the last, one who did not know more of scripture might be led to suppose that salvation is only to the lost sheep of the house of Israel, or the children of Abraham; which was really the case, to a certain extent at the time those words were spoken. But then, prior to the Apostle Paul's writing to Timothy, we find that the Jews, being filled with envy, "Paul and Barnabas waxed bold, and said, It was necessary that the word of God should first have been spoken to you; but seeing ye put it from you, and judge yourselves unworthy of everlasting life, lo, we turn to the Gentiles;" Acts, 13: 46

Again in Rom. 11: 7, when writing upon the manner in which salvation is come to the Gentiles, Paul says, "What then? Israel hath not obtained that which he seeketh for; but the election hath obtained it; and the rest were blinded," &c. Verse 11, "Have they stumbled that they should fall? God forbid; but rather through their fall salvation is come unto the Gentiles, for to provoke them to jealousy." Verse 30th, "For as ye in times past have not believed God, yet have now obtained mercy through their unbelief." By passages similar to these we are able, occasionally, to get a glimpse of this work of salvation and redemption. Yet the enlightened apostle Paul, after telling the Romans how the Gentiles have come in for a share in this great inheritance, seems to have become lost in wonder and says, "Oh, the depths of the riches, both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! how unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out." Hence we see the propriety of the apostle, writing to Timothy," that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners."

We understand that Zaccheus was the object lost, and to whom salvation had come, the Jews, "the lost sheep of the house of Israel," and "Sinners"—all people everywhere, who are not in a state of reconciliation with God.

Now, then, if sinners are the object lost, it was necessary that the one who wishes to seek and save sinners should go where the lost object is, even as the person losing the purse should have come to where the purse was. For, any person of common sense will agree that there is no use in seeking an object where it is not, hence the necessity of Christ coming into the world, right among sinners the object to be saved.

"Crown our Jesus."

Crown our Jesus! Children, crown him
Lord of lords, of Kings the king;
Saints adore him; devils fear him;
Let the children praises bring.
Crown him, children.
Lord of lords, of kings the King!

Once in Bethlehem's stable manger,
Weak and helpless babe he lay;
Then, at God's command, the angels
Homage to the infant pay!
Hosts of angels
Joyfully their homage pay.

Once, within the olive garden,
Bore his soul the dreadful load;
Suffered in our stead, to free us
From the awful wrath of God.
'Twas for children
That he bore the wrath of God.

Once, rude soldier hands did crown him,
Pierced with thorns that sacred brow,
Stripped him, scourged him, spit upon him,
Mockingly the knee did bow.
Children, crown him,
In your young hearts crown him now!

Once, on Calvary suspended,
Poured he out his life for you,
Finished all the work of mercy.
That was given him to do.
Blessed mission!—
Work of love he came to do.

Once, from Olive's brow ascended,
Jesus, conquer o'er the tomb,
Death and sin the victor vanquished,
Robbed the grave of all its gloom,
Jesus conquered;
Rose triumphant from the tomb.

Once, wide flew the heavenly portals,
Angels welcomed back the King;
God omnipotent enthroned him;
Bids us all our tribute bring;
Bids the children
Own him, crown him as their King.

Now, in heaven he pleads for sinners,
Pleads the ransom price he paid;
Cries, "O spare the guilty rebel;
On my soul the stroke was laid."
Oh, what mercy!
Spurn not price so dearly paid.

The Form of Baptism.

It seems to me that a child who has been taught how to learn a lesson, would readily find the required form of baptism given in the New Testament, if its mind had not been biased by hearing false teaching and seeing it administered according to man's plan.

1. There was much water used. John baptized in the river Jordan. Matt. 3: 6. He also baptized "in Aenon near to Salem, because there was much water there." John 3: 23. Then much water was needed. Was any ever baptized without much water? There is no record where any one was.

2. They went down into it, and came out of it. Jesus went up out of the water. Matt. 3: 16. He must, therefore, have been down in it. We read of Philip and the eunuch, that "they went down both into the water, both Philip and the eunuch; and he baptized him. And when they were come up out of the water, the Spirit of the Lord caught away Philip." Acts 8: 38, 39.

Was any one ever baptized without going down into the water and coming up out of it? There is no record of it. Then much water was used, and they went down into it and came up out of it. Now what was done while down in the water? Rom. 6: 4, says, "We are buried with him by baptism into death." Therefore,

3. They were buried. "Buried with him in baptism, wherein also ye are risen with him," Col. 2: 12. We have such words as "planted," "risen," and "born," to denote with reference to the form of baptism and they imply an immersion and coming forth—a burial and resurrection.

Was any one ever baptized without being buried? There is no account of it. Then to be baptized we must go where there is much water. We must go down into it. We must be buried. We must be raised. We must come up out of the water to walk in newness of life. This form shows the burial and resurrection of our Lord. B. F. Merrit.

Remarks: The writer of the above is a single immersionist, as far as I know; but it is truly as he says about the false teaching, if it were not for that, the people would readily adhere to immersion.

But the same may be said as regards Trine Immersion. I really believe, that, if it were not for false teaching, every man, woman, and even the child, would not hesitate readily to adhere to Trine Immersion; for I think it is just as plain, that it is the law of Heaven that it should be performed in the three names. When all power was given to our Lord in heaven and earth, he told his disciples that they should "teach all nations, and after teaching them, they should baptize them in the name of the Father." This certainly could not be understood in any other way than that it means one action; that is, according to the Scriptures, if it were not for the false teaching. "And of the Son." So if the first required one action, the second surely does; and if so, we have two actions. "And of the Holy Ghost." This requires another action; and so we have three actions or Trine Immersion." It seems to me it is so plain, that no candid reader of the word of God could understand it in any other way, unless they are taught otherwise; for the conjunction "and" connects the sentences together. For example: If you read where Pilate wrote the title, when Christ was crucified, we find that it was written "in Greek, and Latin, and Hebrew." Now who will deny that the title was written in Greek, and that it was also written in Latin, and also in Hebrew? I ask now, is there any person of good, sound judgment that will assume that it did not require three writings to complete the title? I think it is so plain that a way-faring man, though a fool, cannot err therein, that Pilate could not have written the three languages in one action. The conjunction "and" connects the sentences together in writing the title the same as in the command for baptizing. Well, then, if the title could not be written in less than three actions, it is certain according to sound logic, that no person can be baptized, according to the commission, without three actions, or Trine Immersion.

Cheating the Dying.

BY G. A. PUTMAN.

In a seaport town on the coast of Maine, a young lady was taken sick with consumption. Her physician, after carefully examining her, was satisfied she could not live. He made known his opinion to the family. He urged her aunt, who had the special care of her, to tell her plainly her condition, and have everything done that might be to prepare her for so great a change. But father, mother, aunt, and all, conspired together to deceive the dying one. Every day she neared the end. All who saw her knew she was growing weaker, yet not one was kind enough, or honest enough, to tell her. Every hint of death, everything serious was forbidden. That sick chamber was turned into a stage for players, who wiped away their tears before they entered, wore a mask of smiles, and spoke in fabled words of hope when hope herself was dead.

So the play went on, and the disease, too, till the hour of death came. Then, when the truth flashed upon the victim's mind, she cried out in agony of spirit: "I can not die! I can not die! I am not prepared. I can not get ready." Sad, awful words! She had asked to know her condition and plead earnestly that they would tell her all, but those whose business it was to do so, resolutely deceived her, and betrayed her stealthily to death.

The whole scene reminds one of that old heathen pageant, where they crowned the Lambs with garlands, and led them to the slaughter with dances and music. When will parents and friends learn to be honest in the sick room and truthful to the dying? Does not death come suddenly enough according to God's own arrangement, without this cruel conspiracy of our fellows? Ought not our effort to be, by a word in season, by watchfulness, by kindly persuasion and instruction, to prepare death's subjects for death, and so take away, as far as possible, the surprise of its coming and the suddenness of the departure? The Congregationalist.

Religious Miscellany.

PRAYER.—A lady once asked a little deaf and dumb girl, by writing on a slate, "what is prayer?" Now this little girl had never said a prayer, for she could not speak; and she had never heard a prayer, for she was quite deaf; yet you will find that she well knew what prayer was. She took the pencil and wrote on the slate this reply: "Prayer is the wish of the heart."

INTENDED REFORMATION.— How dangerous to defer those momentous reformations which the conscience is solemnly preaching to the heart! If they are neglected, the difficulty and indisposition are increasing every month. The mind is receding, degree after degree, from the warm and hopeful zone, till at last it will enter the arctic circle, and become fixed in relentless and eternal ice.—John Foster.

GOD'S PROMISES.— They are sure. God is not a man, that he should repent. Hath he said, and shall he not do it? or, hath he spoken, and shall he not make it good?

A mother's babe was dead. For strength and comfort she fell back on the promises of God. And when asked by her pastor if she found support from them, she replied, "What are the promises for, if not for such a season as this?"

A poor boy, when asked what he did when in sore trouble, answered, "I fall flat on the promises."

A dark cloud hovered over the prospects of a father. For a few days he bore up under the burden, and then his strength failed. Retiring early he slept soundly, and waked at early dawn. The weight was still upon his mind. Conscious of his own weakness, he laid hold upon God, and cast his burden upon him. As distinctly to his mind as though by a voice from heaven, the assurance come, "Leave it with me and all will be right. Years have passed and all is "right."

God's past faithfulness is encouragement for future trust. A manly youth, noticing his father's anxiety respecting certain changes about being made in his business arrangements, encouraged him with these words: "You know, pa, that Providence always takes care of you."

The psalmist says: "Whoso is wise, and will observe these things, even they shall understand the loving-kindness of the Lord."—Christian Weekly.

For the COMPANION.

Is it well with the Boy?

In reading over the obituary notices of the county paper, my sympathies were aroused, in beholding the notice of the death of little CHARLIE, only son of brother John, and sister Kate Gehr, of Ringold, Washington county, Md. Aged about 5 years. I was once forced to the conclusion, that the sad fate, that took the boy, has caused in the hearts of the parents and grand-parents a wound that time can never heal. Especially grandfather Heichew, who devoted much of his time in trying to make Charlie happy. In reading over the notice, my recollections were carried back about fifteen months, when it was my lot to visit the family of brother Gehr, and while there, sharing the hospitalities of the family, I was much captivated with the many peculiarities of little Charlie. One special trait was the gentle submissiveness to the wishes and demands of his parents. He was an amiable and lovely boy, and was idolized by the father and mother, and no doubt, often employed, and fondly embraced in the arms of the mother, as the object to cheer the troubled mind when cast down with the cares so incident to this life.

I feel in this sad hour of bereavement, to suggest a few thoughts which should cause the tear of sorrow to dry; and while the inquiry which heads this communication, no doubt, naturally will often force itself to the mind, we have the sure promises of God, that the immortal principle which made Charlie so lovely and interesting, is now safely housed, in the beautiful city of our God, never more to be subjected to the fearful disease of diphtheria, which swept him so suddenly from the fond embrace of those who loved him with that love which can only be felt by the parent, and while you may often be compelled to gaze on the little arm chair, standing in the corner unoccupied by one who once laid claim to it as his own, your dear boy has joined the heavenly choir. But will not be confined ed to there only, for he will visit you often. Not so much while you are engaged with the busy cares of life, but in the still hour of night, when all is wrapped in silent slumbers, and all is quiet; then it is, that the spirit of Charlie will visit you, to induce to come over the river, and join the happy band.

Now dear brother and sister, in conclusion, allow me to admonish you, live faithful to the cause, which you have in early life engaged in. Remember, little Charlie can never come to you again as

Now dear brother and sister, in conclusion, allow me to admonish you, live faithful to the cause which you have in early life engaged in. Remember, little Charlie can never come to you again as you once beheld him, but the Lord help you that you may be able to rejoice in the fond hope; that ere long, you may be able to fondly embrace your children in the land that knows no sorrow.— And to the grandfather let me say, Charlie is calling loudly unto you, to prepare to meet him again, and while your limbs are beginning to totter, and your gray hairs are waivering o're the grave, in the name of God, make haste, and delay not, to make your return to God, who is holding forth the means of reconciliation, and invites all to come and possess an assurance of a happy home beyond the grave.

Thoughts on Entering upon Volume Nine.

By the unwearied mercies of Almighty God, we have been permitted to enter upon the threshhold of another year, and to have begun its labors. We will endeavor to prove our gratefulness by laying hold of the duties these new favors have brought with them. And, although, the Lord alone knows what we shall be able to accomplish, yet we know and the Lord knows also, that we feel a longing desire to be more than ever devoted to the one great work—the salvation of souls, which is the honor and glory of God; and it is our prayer that the Lord may keep the matter heavily resting upon us, and at the same time bear us up with our burden; for from him must come all power for the accomplishment of good. We feel utterly inadequate for a task so responsible; but we feel also that we were never in a condition more suitable for casting ourself entirely upon him. Pressed down by a deep sense of the great responsibilities resting upon us; with all support from self removed by the consciousness of our incapacity for such wonderous duties, we are only persuaded to take up the yoke, by remembering the omnipotent strength of him whose arm brought us through the arduous duties of the past.—Through all our editorial life our God has indeed been a present help. "As thy days, so shall thy strength be" was never more faithfully fulfilled to any of God's most favored people, than it has been to his unworthy servant. Over seas of trouble, with waves of threatenings, and clouds of evil forebodings, the Lord has safely delivered us! Through rivers of bitter water the Lord has led us, and has preserved us from its poisons.—From all our opponents the hand of our God has delivered us, and has added unto us the spoils from the camps of our enemies. Oh! why should we not trust his dictates, when his promises are true? Thus we shall now yield ourself into the guiding hand of the Lord trusting, if it be his will, he will bring us safely to the close of the volume.

With this consecration we invite all our contributors and correspondents to join. Come, brethren and sisters, let us stand shoulder to shoulder, and press on in the Master's service. A great work is before us, lay hold upon it with cheerfulness and pleasure, knowing that the Lord rewards abundantly.

A House of our Own.

Next to being married to the right person, there is nothing so important in one's life as to live under one's own roof. There is something more than a poetical charm in the expression of the wife:

"We have our cosy house; it is thrice dear to us because it is our own. We have bought it with the savings of our earnings. Many were the soda fountains the confectionery, saloons, and the necessities of the market we had to pass; many a time my noble husband denied himself of comforts, wore his old clothes, and even patched up boots, and I, O me! made my old bonnet do, did the plainest cooking; saving was the order of the hour, and to have a "home of our own" was our united aim. Now we have it. There is no landlord troubling us with raising the rent, and exacting this and that. There is no fear harbored in our bosom that in sickness or old age we will be thrown out of house and home."

What a lesson do the above words teach, and how well it would be if hundreds of families would heed them, and instead of living in rented houses, which take a large part of their capital to furnish, and a quarter of their earnings to pay their rent, and the rest to eat accordingly, would bravely curtail expenses and concentrate their efforts on having a "home of their own." Better a cottage of your own than a rented palace.

We are so well pleased with the above that we insert it in these columns. We do not believe in one man or family owning a whole community, but it appears to me that the Lord designed that every family should have a little Paradise, (Garden of Eden), in which the family may be reared and delighted. And with few exceptions we believe it is attainable to all who will practice the plan laid in the above. And we are persuaded that many more would do so, if they could but realize the supreme satisfaction that a poor family would enjoy, both children and parents, upon taking possession of a snug little "house of their own." They would all be delighted, and take new and redoubled interest in the family affairs. Will not all the readers of our paper try it? We do not wish you to be penurious nor rob yourselves or your families of any of the real comforts of life. That would be "penny wise and pound foolish." You should have plenty of wholesome food, a sufficiency of comfortable clothing, and bedding; but all the money you spend for sweetmeats, condiments (spices), tea coffee, tobacco, and pork, is more than wasted, giving you no strength, and injuring your health. We know very well that many poor people will say that before they would deny themselves of the above items, they would do without a home all their life. And it is safe to say that that is the very reason that nine out of every ten poor families are without a home of their own. And we believe we are on the safe side of truth, when you assert that there is not a poor family in the country that has kept house for twenty years that has not spent more money for the superfluities, than would be required to purchase a house of their own. Think of these things, readers, and if you are concerned, act the part dictated by reason.

As the editor was called away from home, and as the time is here for going to press, and as we do not wish to delay and keep our subscribers in suspense, the editorial department will be found somewhat incomplete in this number.

I Will Never Leave Thee nor Forsake Thee. Heb. 13: 5.

In this world we often meet with kind friends—with those we dearly love—but only to leave them again, or to be left by them; for here there is no meeting that knows no parting. We form alliances of various kinds and for different purposes; but all are subject to dissolution. We lay plans and invent schemes to accomplish our purposes; but these are liable to fail, and we are often doomed to disappointment. Our brightest hopes are seldom realized; and our dearest enjoyments are of short duration, and are often followed by sadness, if not by remorse. We can think of nothing earthly that will not change, leave, or fail.

Under those circumstances, being accustomed to separation, disappointment, and failure, how anxiously we look about us for something lasting—something durable—something permanent! This we may grasp in the promise of God to his people, "I will never leave thee nor forsake thee." When Jacob, on his way from Beersheba to Padan-aram, in his dream saw a ladder whose top reached heaven, and upon which the angels of God ascended and decended, the Lord stood at the top of it and spake to him, saying, "I am the Lord God of Abraham thy father, and the God of Isaac, * * * and, behold, I am with thee, and will keep thee in all places whither thou goest * * * for I will not leave thee." When Moses was an hundred and twenty years old, and near his end, he encouraged the people and Joshua to cross the Jordan and not fear the nations, saying, "Be strong and of good courage, fear not, nor be afraid of them; for the Lord thy God, he it is that shall go with thee, he will not fail thee, nor forsake thee." And after the death of Moses, the Lord himself encouraged Joshua, in these words, "There shall not any man be able to stand before thee all the days of thy life; as I was with Moses, so will I be with thee: I will not fail thee nor forsake thee. And David said, "I have been young, and now am old, yet have I not seen the righteous forsaken, nor his seed begging bread." So Paul said, "Let your conversation be without covetousness; and be content with such things as ye have; for he hath said, I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee."

How encouraging, how consoling, is this promise of God! Children of God, seize it, store it up, you will often want it. When your friends leave you, the Lord will not. When your alliances are broken up, when your associations are severed, when your projects fail; when hopes crumble, and pleasures vanish, remember the Lord's promise, "I will never leave thee nor forsake thee." Think of the word "never." Cling to it as a drowning man would to a rope; for it is of inestimable worth.

Upon this J. C. Ryle aptly remarks:

"Never!" Though your heart faints and your are sick of self, failures and infirmities—even then the promise will not fail.

"Never!" Though the devil whispers, "I shall have you at last; your faith will fail and you will be mine"—even then God will keep his word.

"Never!" When the cold chill of death creeps on, and friends can do more, and you are starting on that journey from which there is no return—even then Christ will not forsake you.

"Never!" When the day of judgement comes, and the books are open and eternity is beginning—even then the promise will bear all your weight. Christ will not let go his hold on your soul." B.

Sending Money.

Let it be understood clearly, that all money sent us by Express must be paid in full as we cannot afford to pay express rates for transmitting money.

Money orders must be made payable at Somerset, Penna. Dale city is not a Money Order Office. Several orders have been made payable at Dale City, and all must now be returned, which requires much trouble.

Overlooked.

With all our care some of our best agents were overlooked in sending out our Blank Lists for the present volume. Most of these fell to work and made out substitutes, and collected lisst equal to, and some much larger than former years. A precious few, however felt themselves slighted and did nothing. And in some cases the new men into whose hands the lists fell, have proved themselves the very persons we were looking for. So all in all, we believe things are working together for good. But in all cases where we have learned of the omission we have afterwards supplied.

Answers to Correspondents.

Credit.—We had rather take a good subscriber on credit, who will pay within six months, than not to have him at all; but we would much rather have cash in advance subscribers, even if they were not so "good"—rich. It does appear strange sometimes that poor subscribers can pay in advance, and good ones must have credit. But business reveals some strange things.

Martin Neher: One dollar pays to No. 33.

Samuel Cook:—Your money is acknowledged in No. 46. The paper will be sent.

Wm. Schrock:—All right we will send the Companion.

W. H. Blough:—All right.

John J. Hershberger:—That will do.

S. R. Zug: By paying that amount, brother J. M. G. will have paid to Vol. 10, No. 25.

John Forney, Sen: Cannot account for it; but we have entered the name for Vol. 9, and given a credit of 50 cents.

Trip to Pa., by John Knisley.

I long since had a desire to go on a mission of love among the members in the East; but, as death came and took my wife away, I put off the trip till October the 8th, 1872. I went west to Wanatah, on the Pittsburgh FtWayne & Chicago Railroad; thence south, 50 miles; thence west 15 or 16 miles to a communion, on the 9th of October, at friend Johnson Dobbins'. He is not a member of our church, though he is a very kind man, as are all the family. Elder John S. Snowberger has the charge of this new district.

From there I went to the Monticello church, where there was a love-feast on the 11th. Here I met our esteemed brother James Quinter. Had a very good communion. On the 12th, brother Joseph Amich was ordained to the full ministry. Brother Quinter left on the 12th; I remained and had meeting. On the 13th went home with brother John S. Snowberger. Brother and sister Snowberger, sister Dillinger, and myself, were taken to Delphi on the 14th. By 9 o'clock P. M., we started for Penn'a. We arrived at Altoona on the 15th. At 7 o'clock P. M. from Altoona to Martinsburg. Were taken to the Yellow Creek church on the 15th where there was a communion. Here brother Jacob Miller has charge of the church. Brother John Eshelman, Leonard Furry, Daniel Snowberger, Samuel Moore, and John Replogle are laborers with Elder Jacob Miller, in the Yellow Creek branch, Bedford county, Pa. There are many members in this congregation. I think I was told 500, and all in peace. We sometimes hear brethren talk about a split in the church. I see no cause for it. I traveled among the brethren and sisters for over eight weeks, and found love and peace. May the Lord bless and help us, that we may so live. I thought while traveling, if I would pick at every flaw I see I would better stay at home. I dare not name all I visited, as it would be too lengthy; so I will give the churches only.

From Yellow Creek we went to Clover Creek branch, to a love-feast, on the 17th of October, where we met many of our dear fellow-members. Here live Elders George and John W. Brumbaugh, brother George W. Brumbaugh and Joseph Snowberger are in the second degree of the ministry. Here we found all in good order. May the good Lord bless them to ever live in peace, as we saw nothing else. We had a very good love-feast. Had meeting on the 18th at 9 o'clock A. M. Were taken by brother John Dillinger to Wood-cock Valley. Lodged with brother Daniel Brumbaugh. In the morning of the 19th, went to Coffee Run, took the cars to Jame's Creek, where we met brother H. B. Brumbaugh. Here I first heard from my children after leaving home. I was very glad to hear from them. Brother George Brumbaugh is the Elder here. H. R. Brumbaugh, Editor of the Pilgrim, and George B. Brumbaugh are ministers in this arm. As far as I became acquainted with them, all is peace and love. May the God of peace be with them all, is my prayer. Here I met with our brother H. R. Holsinger, editor of the COMPANION. On the 20th, Sunday, meeting at 10 o'oclock A. M., and also in the evening. There was very good attention. In the afternoon of the 20th, brother H. R. Holsinger delivered a discourse on singing; saying how we all ought to sing understandingly, and all learn to sing aright. The discourse was very good, and I do hope our members will learn to sing. Let all the churches get the Brethren's Tune and hymn Book. We can get them from brother Henry, and if we will learn to sing from these books, wherever we meet we will sing together, and I do think this will be singing understandingly: we will understand, and those that hear will understand us.

On the 21st I, with brother Daniel Snowberger from Yellow Creek branch, took the cars at Pleasant Grove, went to Bloody Run. Lodged with brother Jacob Lingafelder. On the 22nd, we took the cars for Dale City. Arrived there about 8 o'clock in the night. When we stopped, the brethren conducted us to their homes. Here I thought, "How lovely it is, and how pleasant, if brethren will go to meet their brethren, and conduct them to their homes. So it will be when Jesus comes to gather his children together, where we will all meet, if we are faithful. Here was brother H. R. Holsinger, editor of the COMPANION, and brother Daniel Beachly, and others. I lodged with brother Dr. U. M. Beachly. Here all members can feel at home. In the morning of the 23rd, I visited the COMPANION Office; found all in good order. After writing a short article, I visited the family of brother Holsinger. Was very well entertained. Thence I visited our dear old brother Daniel Buechly, where I tarried till time to go to the love-feast, which commenced at 5 o'clock P. M. Here are many members. Here our next Annual Meeting is to be held, if the Lord will. We had a very good communion; though it rained all day. The 24th, had a meeting at the same place in the forenoon; In the evening at Dale City. On the 25th, returned to Bedford, where we had a meeting. Brother J. S. Snowberger from Ind., and brother Daniel Snowberger, from New Enterprise, were along. Had very good order. I do think the brethren ought to preach at Bedford, as there is a desire for them to have meeting there. On the 26th, went to old brother Andrew Snowberger's, being the Elder of Snake Spring Valley branch. Had several meetings in company with John S. Snowbarger. In this arm all is peace.

On the 27th had a meeting in Morrison's Cove. Thence I and brother Snowberger separated; I was taken to brother Elder Jacob Steel's congregation, by brother John Clapper. Here I again found great kindness.—May the Lord bless them. Brother Henry Clopper, and his son John, were speakers with brother Steel. In this church we had several meetings. Brother John S. Snowberger came here to assist in preaching. We had good order and attention.

Next I was taken by brother Levi Replogle back to Yellow Creek the second time. Had several more meetings. Here I again met with my company from Ind., I. S. Snowbargrer. Then we went to Clover Creek, and had some more meetings. Here I and my company from Ind. took the parting hand, and I went to James' Creek, where I remained till the morning of the 12th of November; thence started in company with a young friend, J. P. Brumbaugh, for Huntingdon. Missing the train for Philadelphia, I tarried with brother Andrew B. Brumbaugh M. D. The night of the 12th, I and friend J. P. Brumbaugh took the train for Philadelphia. We got to Philadelphia in the morning of the 13th at 8 o'clock. Stopped with brother C. Custer. The old sister is a mother indeed. We remained in the city till in the afternoon, then went to Germantown. Visited brother Davis Younce. Found them all well. I and brother Younce visited the most of the members in Germantown. I was there from the 13th till the 16th, had one meeting. Thence I went back to the members in Philadelphia, had two meetings, stayed till the 19th. Thence I went to Eld. Moses Miller's congregation, Mechanicsburg, Pa. Found all well. Had three meetings at Mechanicsburg. While in this arm brother Miller was with me all the time, visiting the members. I enjoyed it much. Brother Samuel Mohler was with us part of the time. May the Lord bless the dear members for their love shown to me.

Next I went to McVeytown, Mifflin county, Pa. In this arm lives Elder Joseph Hanawalt, here I attended eight meetings. We had good order. All is peace and love. Here I received the sad news of the death of my dear son-in law; and my enjoyments ended, in part, as my mind was at home all the time, though the members were very good to me, and comforted me. May God bless them for it.

On the 29th, I left here for James' Creek, where I attended two more meetings, and one at Coffee Run. Stayed till the 30th of December, then left for home. Reached home safely, thank God. Found all well, but felt sorry that I could not find all again as I had left them; but I do believe if we all are faithful unto death, we will meet them all again.

On the evening of the fifth our meetings commenced. Brother James Quinter was expected, but did not come. Brethren Jesse Calvert and O. W. Miller labored for us. One was added by baptism, and we do think there will be many more before long. May the Lord grant it to be so is my prayer, and may he bless the brethren for their labor of love. Brother Jesse Calvert thinks he can't go east, to Pa., till after the middle of January, if then; and my members say I must not travel so much till we get more help in the ministry. Come to us, dear brethren, as we love to have brethren come to visit us.

I will now say to all my dear brethren and sisters, and your dear and kind children, and all that I was with, that I never traveled that I enjoyed myself as well as I did this time. I was gone from home over eight weeks; was in large cities and in many towns; and I was well all the time, found few sick in my journey, had no abuse from any, saw but two that I thought were intoxicated; and I truly enjoyed myself very much till I heard of the death of brother John Hoover. He was elected to the ministry the same time I was, and labored faithfully with us. Now I will say to all that I saw and was with, may God our Heavenly Father bless and keep you, and us all, in the path of duty, till we will have to bid adieu to all on earth, and then bring us all together again, where we can stay together forever, is my sincere prayer. I hope the members will bear with me for not giving all the places I visited.

Farewell till we shall meet again.

JOHN KNISELY.

Report of Main Mission.

Dear Brethren and Sisters: Our last report was written at the house of friend Samuel Burns, on Saturday, the 30th day of November, 1872. On that evening we had an appointment at the Wharf meeting-house; but it being quite a wintery day, we were persuaded not to turn out, as no hearers would be there, nor any one to make fire. So, we tarried another night with the family, enjoyed good rest and good accommodations.

DECEMBER 1ST. This morning the sky was clear, but the air cold; but gradually it became more pleasant. Meeting at 11 A. M. at the Wharf meeting-house. Here for the first time we had the pleasure of meeting Eld. Horace Washburn, (Free-will Baptist.) He is about seventy-six years of age; had come some distance that day expecting to see us. He listened to the word preached with more than ordinary attention; and after we were through, he bore quite an honorable testimony to what he had heard, and to the truths of the Gospel in general. Such testimonies from such men are very encouraging; especially when in a strange land and among strangers. Eld. W. H. Clark also met us another time here.

Here we bade farewell to some dear christian friends. The crystal tears were seen sparkling in the eyes as they held our hands with almost a death-grasp, and desiring our prayers. This evening had been announced as our last, or farewell-meeting, for the time, at the house of friend John Milton Adams. So, by the way, we stopped in with Elder Dennis, and once more took dinner with them; and after a short conversation we took leave of them and repaired to the place of meeting.

At an early hour the usual number of hearers were gathered in. For our farewell discourse we read Acts 20: 17–38, but chiefly based our remarks on verse 32. With what degree of ability the Lord endured us to labor, is not for us to say; but one thing we are quite sure of, that at this place we bade farewell to a number who were almost persuaded to be christians, (such as we are,) and who we fondly hope will become such ere long. Thus ended our labor of four weeks (including five Sundays) in the state of Maine—very pleasant all through, with the exception of one jar alluded to before; but even that we hope will result in good, though unpleasant at first.

On Monday morning we were courteously conveyed to the depot by those whose horses could be used. Friend Thomas Rowe conveyed brother Longanecker, and J. M. Adams, our host, conveyed me. This evening we landed at Boston, enjoyed a good night's rest at the Arlington house.

DECEMBER 3. To-day from Boston to New York. Took up quarters again at the Merchants Hotel, enjoyed a good night's rest, and at 9 A. M. were on our way to Myerstown, via Allentown and Reading, arrived at 3 P. M., and were met by brother John Herr, who conveyed us to his house, where Eld. J. Zug awaited our arrival, and greeted us with a very warm welcome. That night was spent very pleasantly with the family.

DECEMBER 5. To-day at 10 o'clock and in the evening were appointments at the Tulpehocken meeting-house Here we took up the German language, which at first was rather unpleasant, but soon seemed natural again.

At 2 P. M. it had been arranged to meet for the purpose of giving some account of our mission, and of answering such questions, relative to the people with whom we labored as might be prepared. Some had been of the opinion that we should have stayed longer, but when they heard our explanation they were all satisfied of our course.

DECEMBER 6. To-day were two appointments for public worship, and one for counsel, at the Heidleburg meeting-house. We had very pleasant and interesting meetings with our dear brethren and sisters here, and hope our labors were not in vain.

DECEMBER 7. Were conveyed to Myerstown and soon found ourselves at the city of Harrisburg, where we had to take the parting hand. Brother Longanecker took the southern train for Gettysburg at 11 : 50 A. M., and I at 1 : 30 took the western for Martinsburg, where I landed at 9 P. M. Lodged with brother Isaac Metzker,

DECEMBER 8. Meeting at Martinsburg. Oh, how glad I felt at again meeting with my dear brethren and sisters! After meeting I made my way home, and found that my wife had been suffering with a sore leg for several weeks, and since I am home it had become worse again. It assumes somewhat of the nature and appearance of erysipelas; but knowing ones say it is not. At this time it is much better; hope it may soon be all right. I enjoyed the best of health, all the time, while away. On Sunday evening, after reaching home, I felt a hoarseness; on Monday I went to see our children in these parts, hoarseness increased, and by Tuesday morning I had a violent cough, cold and hoarseness. I think that I coughed more during the last week than in five years past, together. Hope it may not amount to anything serious.

GENERAL REMARKS AND INFORMATION.

Owing to the change of schedule on our branch road, which went into effect on the morning of the 28th of October, I missed the morning train, and therefore did not reach Myerstown until next day between six and seven A. M. This, however did not discourage any of the plans; for I had sent on a dispatch that I was on the way. It was planned that we should go on to the city of New York, and lodge there. About 9 : 30 we were again at the depot, and in good time we were in the empire city.

Next day was laid off to see us in the city of Boston; and so it did in good time to take up quarters: found a good resting place.

Next day was calculated to land us at Skowhegan, the terminus of that branch of rail-road. This point we also made, but somewhat late in the evening. The general appearance of the state of Maine, to a Pensylvanian, especially one that has seen the garden of the west, is not very enticing. At the same time we have plenty of lands in Pennsylvania, even worse than theirs. Very excellent quarries of grey granite stone are found. Beautiful streams of clear water interline the state, and afford power for manufactories of various kinds, thus giving employment to thousands of hands. Timber is mostly different kinds to what we have here. The hardy oak is hardly found, white oak, not at all: spruce, fir, cedar, white pine, white birch, white maple, bass (lynn,) ash of different kinds: mostly all soft wood. They grow a good many apples, but not much other fruit. Spring wheat is raised to some extent, but very little Fall wheat. Corn "yellow flint,' does well. Potatoes, beans, and pumpkins do well. So does timothy.

In the summer of 1871 the drought was very severe, and then the grass hoppers became so numerous, that they, in a manner, destroyed everything. Many a farmer did not harvest a handful. So, in the fall, they had to sacrifice their stock, or see it starve. But God blessed them last season with food; so that we see no real want anywhere: but we saw liberality bestowed upon entire strangers—readiness to divide those blessings with others which made our very hearts rejoice, in anticipation of the time when the Master will say: "Inasmuch as ye have done unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me."

There are some different habits, customs, and orders noticable; together with some local peculiarities, which charity forbids me to report.

We were well entertained and cared for, by those dear people of different persuasions and creeds. We found them an intelligent, moral, sociable, industrious, frugal, peaceful and truth-loving people; mostly well versed in the word of truth. I have said, and am not ashamed to let the expression go before them, that of many of them the testimony of the angel to Cornelius, seems right in place: "One that feared God, which gave much alms to the people, and prayed to God always." To some af these noble Christian qualities we can testify; yet as a Cornelius, after having testimony of those qualities, still had need of further instruction.. It is by no means claimed that that those people are instructed to perfection in every respect, neither do they claim it themselves; but they seem as anxious for further instruction as any class of people well can be; hence would attend church from time to time.

We attended thirty-three meetings during our mission; never had large crowds, but regular hearers. Owing to the horse disease and much wet, our labors were confined to a small compass, which at first we much regretted, but now believe it to have been a blessing; for we thereby learned that by peseverence an interest can be awakened, which we would not so readily learned, had our labor been more divided. The interest increasing gradually, with every meeting, until the cold New England winter set in, and as said before the horse disease still raging, those that could not wade the snow could not attend. So we concluded best to come home and see how the seed will grow, in that northern region of our dear America. Thus we left them in care of the great shepherd to watch over them, and thus I leave you dear brethren and sisters, after thanking you for the aid afforded us by your prayers, which aid was manifestly felt by us. And as those dear ones strongly urged us to them remember them in our prayers: I extend the appeal to all who feel an interest in Zion's welfare. D. M. HOLSINGER.

Dec. 15th, 1872.

BROTHER HOLSINGER: Two long months have passed since we received a copy of the COMPANION. Two long months have passed since we took our line of march westward from the Fairview congregation, Unionville, Appanoose county, Iowa, to make our home among strangers; leaving brethren and sisters, leaving friends and relations, and many kind neighbors, to fight the world alone. Need I say alone? Not entirely, I hope. There are a few members in this county, but we have no organization, and no preacher. Need I tell you that we are lonesome? Now what we most desire is some one to preach for us. There was an organization in this county, but they have nearely all left, which leaves a vast field for some speaker. Many, since we have come, have expressed a desire to join our church, if they but had an opportunity. Will not some one come to our assistance, when there are so many that desire it?

And now let me give you some encouragement. As the COMPANION has already proved a success, try to let it prove a greater one; and may the gospel truths contained therein be the salvation of many souls. Give us a word of encouragement in our lonely homes. We bid you adieu. Yours in brotherly love.

J. F. WILLIAMS.

All we can now think of to say to by way of encouragement, is to persevere. Honest efforts will always be rewarded. In the abscence of a minister, do not forget that you have with you that which makes and finds all true ministers, namely the Word of the Lord. Study it, and get up sermons and preach them to yourself. It is a pleasant, and very profitable exercise.

Burned out—Help Needed.

Dear brethren and sisters, our dear brother Lyman Grove and family, have met with a sad misfortune in having their house burned,and almost all they had. Particulrrs of the case about as follows: brother Grove left home in July or August, 1872; went to Clay county, Neb., purchased a piece of land with a house and some other improvements on it; then went back for his family. Started with a team for his new home, Sept. 9th, and after about seven weeks of tedious travel, arrived at his journey's end only to find his house lying in ashes. He had shipped all his goods by rail. Among the burned goods, were a new cooking stove, farming implements, and many other articles: all was gone.

Dear brethren and sisters, do we want anything more to draw out our sympathy, and show that sympathy by sending the necessary means by which their wants, in this trying hour may be relieved. Think of our dear brother and sister without a house, without a home, no place to go to, not even a relative to speak to or to drop a tear of sympathy for them: no place to hide from the cold chilly winds of the treeless plains of Nebraska: When you and your children are comfortably shut in your warm rooms, think of them and their little children shivering in the cold, without a house to shelter them from the howling storms. Look around you and see what you can do, you that will relieve suffering. Brother Groves' means are limited,and he had put nearly all into his lands. He wrote to me saying he would be glad to get a little help. They are both industrious members. I would suggest to each housekeeper, that they lay this matter before their respective congregations, and urge a speedy action. A few cents from each one would go for to relieve them in their present dilemma. I would also suggest that all sums of five dollars and over, be sent in registered letter, directed to brother Grove. All letters registered or otherwise, express, or goods by freight, should be sent plainly marked, to LYMAN GROVE, Harvard, Clay Co., Nebraska.

Notes of Travel.

J. S. FLORY.

Nov. 15th. Took the train at Falls of Kanawha early in the morning, arrived at Coal's Mouth in due time. Brother P. A. Fisher's little son came to meet me with a horse. Arrived at brother Fisher's, Putnam county, in the evening. Next day, in company with brother Fisher and daughter, went to Sand Fork school-house, Lincoln county; two meetings same day, one next day at same place. In the evening, meeting at friend Dings'. Next day, meeting at Sugar Tree school-house, and at friend Davis', on Turkey creek.

Next day, 19th, meeting at Mt. Moriah church, and at Mrs. Alfords'. 20th, meeting at Elizabeth church. 21st, meeting at Island Creek, and at Upper Falls of Coal. 22nd, went to Mouth of Coal, was met by brother O. Perry, who took me to his home. Meeting at night, at Rose Valley school-house; also next day, at 11 A. M, at night at B. meeting-house, at Two mile, Kanawha county. 24th, Sunday, two meetings at Lynn school-house. 25th, meeting at Robison's school-house, at 11 A. M., at night in the city of Charleston. Next day, 26th, at 2 P. M., left on the cars, arrived at home at 11 o'clock at night, and found all well. Had eighteen meetings. There was much interest manifested; eight souls were willing to unite with the church, some of whom were baptized in the icy waters. To all who were so kind as to assist me on my way, and administer to my wants, I tender my most gratefu. thanks, and hope the Lord will abudantly bless them for their love and kindness. As such I found them wherever I went, and the brethren were not willing that the servant should go a "warring" at his own charge. Those that have just set ot on the way, some of whom are in the bloom of youth, I hope will run with patience and delight the race set before them; so that, if we all hold out faithful to the end, we may meet in the blessed mansion of heavenly glory.

NORRISTOWN, PA.

Brother Holsinger:—As you solicit church news, and as it always rejoiceth my heart to hear of the prosperity of Zion, I will try to give you a few items of news, from this part of God's Moral Vineyard. We held a love-feast here on the 2nd of November, and I can truly say we had a feast of fat things in the presence of the Lord. The strangers present on the occasion and also the principal inger, from Cumberland, and brother William Hartzler from Dauphin county. They presented the truth with power and in demonstration of the Spirit, and as I believe, with good results, as we had the pleasure to see two precious souls led into the liquid stream to be buried with Christ in baptism, a few weeks ago; and there are still others that we believe will come soon. So you see the Ark of the Lord is still moving. I hope the good Lord may still continue on this good work, that many may yet be made willing to turn from the error of their ways, while it is yet called day; the night is coming wherein no man can work. So my dear brethren and sisters in the Lord, let us all try to be faithful in the discharge of our several duties in the vineyard of our Lord, for we all have a work to perform in trying to win souls for Christ, so that when that good shepherd shall appear we may also appear with him in glory.

If any of our dear brethren, either in English or German, should travel this way, please do not forget us, as we are very glad to have the brethren stop with us. We are only one hours ride in the cars from Philadelphia. All are invited.

WM. C. CLEMMER.

Dec. 16th, 1872.

Brother Henry:—I notice in COMPANION No. 49. current volume, J. B. Shoemaker requesting brother J. Wise to give some information concerning a man by the name of L. E. Smith. I know a son of a respectable family, close neighbors to me, by that name. He was baptized in the Clear Creek church about seven years ago. He remained in the Clear Creek church about two years. The church gave him a letter and then he went west, and remained west for about five years. Then he came back to Huntington church. While he was west he was correspoding with a young sister of our church, whom we esteem very highly. He came here about the 20th of last December, and the last day of December he married the aforesaid sister. She lived with him about three months and then she left him. He is about 28 years old. He promised speakers were brother Daniel Holthe church here a letter of recommendation, but did not present it yet. He left, I think some time in August, we do not know where he is. It is reported that he is in Stark county, Ohio.

MARTIN HOKE.

Huntington, Ind.

BROTHER HENRY: I wish to inform you of a sad accident which occured a few weeks ago with an old brother in Christ, which put an end to his mortal life. His name is David Sollenberger, formerly of Pennsylvania, coming west from Morrison's Cove, and taking up his home with his son in Du page county, Ills., near Napersville. A few months ago he took a visit to some relatives in Iowa, and on his return after safely landing from the cars, after dark, it appears, he started home, walking on the track, and in a very short time was overtaken by a passenger engine which killed him instantly.

I think brother Sollenberger has been a member quite a long time. Thus ended his life and career on earth. He was about seventy-six years old. May his ashes rest in peace, until resurrected to a glorious immortality.

Yours Fraternally,

JACOB CROMER.

Gleanings.

Brother Henry: We also have a very poor sister who loves to read the COMPANION, if you think you can afford to send the paper to her, and risk getting anything for it, you can do so, and I will try to induce some one to help to pay for it. I have paid for some in such cases since the COMPANION has been paying its visit; and I expect to continue as far as I am able.

T. D. LYON.

We can afford to run the risk, as there is very little risk to run. The poor sister has rich brethren not far from her, and they will, no doubt, attend to her wants.

BROTHER HENRY: What shall I do? all my shelves, drawers and boxes are full of COMPANIONS, Visitors, Vindicators, Pilgrims, and a few Pious Youths. I have no place to put them. How would it do if the brethren and sisters would put them up carefully and ship them across the seas into the Old Countries? Wouldn't that be spreading the Gospel? I think so. What do you say.

CATHARINE LONGANECKER.

Yes, we agree with you; but think our brethren and sisters could accomplish more in the good cause by sowing them broadcast throughout our own land. Let those who have a redundancy try it, and they will realize that some good will be accomplished, and that our lists will be largely increased.

Query.

Will some brother reconcile the three evangelists in their reference to the two thieves upon their crosses? Matth. 27:38, "Then were there two thieves crucified with him." Verse 44, "The thieves also, which were crucified with him, reviled him." Mark 15:32, "And they that were crucified with him reviled him." Luke 23:39, and one of the malefactors which were hanged railed on him," saying, "If thou be Christ, save thyself and us." We are often told by ministers of the gospel, who preach much about the thief on the cross, that he was saved. Luke says one reviled him; Matthew says the two cast the same in his teeth; and Mark says they both reviled him. How is it?

J. J. COVER.

Query.

Will some brother give an explanation on Acts 9th chapter, and 7th verse, which reads as follows, "And the men which journeyed with him stood speechless, hearing a voice, but seeing no man,." Acts 22d, and 9th, "And they that were with me saw indeed the light and were afraid, but they heard not the voice of him that spake to me."

As brother H. R. H. has given the Pious Youth a space in the C. F. C., we will propose a question to its young readers. Who will answer? What is the first prayer in the Bible?

E. R. STIFLER.

Hollidaysburg, Pa.

Who will be so obliging as to explain and answer the following query through the columns of the C. F. C.?

"I robbed other chuches, taking wages of them, to do you service." 2 Cor. 11:8.

DIED.

We admit no poetry under any circumstances in connection with Obituary Notices. We wish to use all alike, and we could not insert verses with all.

In the Elk Lick branch, Somerset county, Pa., November 3d, CATHARINE CHRISTNER, daughter of friend Jacob and Caroline, aged 4 months and 6 days. Funeral sermon on the 4th at 2 P. M., by the writer, from 2 Sam. 12: 19–23. Oh, may it be a warning to the parents, that they may turn from death unto life.

JOEL GNAGY.

In the Conemaugh branch, Cambria county, Pa., on the 24th of November, brother JOSEPH FUNK, aged 67 years, 8 months and 9 days. Disease, dropsy. Funeral service by brother William Byers and the writer. JOS. S. BURKHART.

At the residence of Alexander Cruikshank, Lee county, Iowa, September 7th, brother SAMUEL SEARS, aged 48 years, 6 months, and 21 days. Disease, congestion of the lungs. S. A. GARBER.

In the Otter Creek congregation, Macoupin Co., Nov., 22nd. sister ELIZABETH RIFFEY, aged 23 years, 5 months, and 18 days. She was consort of brother Noah Riffey; and daughter of brother John and Mary Garst. She left a sorrowing husband to mourn her loss; but he need not sorrow without hope. She obeyed her Master's call in her early days, and lived and died a consistent member. Disease, Typhoid pneumonia. Funeral occasion improved by brethren Henry Brubaker and J. W. Harshbarger, from Matt. 24: 44, to an attentive congregation.

ISAAC H. CHRIST.

Fell asleep in Jesus, December the 18th, sister LOVINA MARQUADEND, wife of Friend George Marquadend, aged 31 years, 4 months, and 24 days. Funeral service by brother Stephen Hildebrand, and the writer. We rest in the assurance that our loss is her great gain. DAVID HILDEBRAND.

In Lee County, Ill., Rock River congregation, December the 12th brother JACOB BUCK, formerly from Montgomery county, Pa., aged 77 years, 3 months, and 23 days. He was confined to his bed for over 4 years, by a stroke of palsy. He bore his affliction with christian patience. Never a murmer or complaint escaped his lips, during his long illness. He left an aged widow, and a large circle of friends, to mourn, but not as those that have no hope, believing that their loss is his eternal gain.

[Visitor please copy.]

Also in the same congregation, Nov., 27th, little WILLIE BUCK, son of brother Chilion and Mary Buck, aged 3 years, 1 month, and 14 days.

Funeral occasion improved from Revelations 14: 12, 13, by the brethren.

DANIEL DIERDORFF.

In the Upper Canawago branch, Adams Co., Pa., Nov., 27th, JERMIAH LATSHAW, aged 83 years, 7 months, and 23 days. Funeral discourse by Eld. Adam Brown, and the writer.

Also Dec., 7th, in same church, MINNIE MAY, infant daughter of James and Addie BROWN, aged 2 months.

Also Dec., 7th, our friend JACOB BROWN, aged 82 years, 9 months, and 25 days. Funeral discourse by the Brethren.

Also Dec., 17th, brother WM. PICKING, aged 77 years, 1 month, and 26 days. Funeral discourse by the Brethren.

Also Dec., 17th, in the same church, LYDIA GRACE BARE, only daughter of brother Daniel B. and Maggie Bare, aged 2 years, 3 months, and 17 days. Funeral discourse by Eld. Adam Brown and the writer.

PETER B. RAUFFMAN.

Dec., 3rd, in the Lower White Oak branch, Lancaster Co., Pa., sister AMANDA SELLERS, wife of brother Peter Sellers, aged 48 years, 1 month, and 6 days. Her disease was cancer at the breast. She suffered much, but she bore with christian patience, and when she felt that the time of her departure was at hand, she made choice of Elders David Gerlack, Benjamin Eby, and the writer, to preach at her funeral. She then fully resigned herself to the will of the Lord, and in her dying moments, left the strongest evidence of a glorious immortality, She leaves a husband and four daughters, to mourn their loss, which to her is a great gain. The family could scarcely be reconciled were it not for the words of the Apostle, 2 Cor. 7: 10. On the 6th, her remains were followed to their last resting place, at the Brethren's meeting house near Manheim, by a large concourse, who mourn the loss of an affectionate wife, a kind mother. A consistent and praise-worthy member, has gone to her rest.

Funeral services from 2 Cor. 4: 17, 18; 5: 1, by the aforesaid brethren.

DANIEL HOLLINGER.

In Fayette Co., W. Va., Dec., 1st, SALLIE JOHNSON, daughter of brother Hiram and sister Lydia Johnson, aged 3 years and 5 months. Disease, diphtheria. Little Sallie was a lovely child, but God has called her home to be a singing angel in glory. The parents have a bright j wel gone before. May that thought help them and us to live "Nearer to thee my God." J. S. FLORY.

The Christian Family Companion. Is published every Tuesday, at $1.50 a year, by Henry R. Holsinger, who is a member of the Church of the Brethren, sometimes known by the name of "German Baptists," and vulgarly or maliciously called "Dunkards."

The design of the work is to advocate truth, expose error, and encourage the true Christian on his way to Zion.

It assumes that the New Testament is the Will of God, and that no one can have the promise of salvation without observing all its requirements, that among these are Faith, Repentance, Prayer, Baptism by trine immersion, Feet Washing, the Lord's Supper, the Holy Communion, Charity, Nonconformity to the world, and a full resignation to the whole will of God, as he has revealed it through his Son Jesus Christ.

So much of the affairs of this world as may be thought necessary to the proper observance of the signs of the times, or such as may tend to the moral, mental, or physical benefit of the Christian will be published, thus removing all occasion for coming into contact with the so-called Literary or Political journals.

Subscriptions may begin at any time.

Living Waters.

There are some hearts like wells, green-mossed and deep
As ever summer saw:
And cool their water is—yea, cool and sweet:
But you must come to draw.
They hoard not, yet they rest in calm content,
And not unsought will give;
They can be quiet with their wealth unspent,
So self-contained they live.

And there are some like springs, that bubbling burst
To follow dusty ways,
And run with offered cup to quench his thirst
Where the tired traveller strays;
That never ask the meadows if they want
What is their joy to give;
Unasked, their lives to other life they grant—
So self-bestowed they live!

And One is like an ocean, deep and wide,
Wherein all waters fall;
That girdles the broad earth, and draws the tide,
Feeding and bearing all;
That broods the mists, that sends the clouds abroad,
That takes, again to give;
Even the great and loving heart of God,
Whereby all love doth live.—

Washing Pots and Cups.

"For, laying aside the commandment of God, ye hold the tradition of men, as the washing of pots and cups; and many other such like things ye do." Mark, 7: 3.

In Volume 8, number 32, a reader of your paper has taken courage to express his views on she subject of Feetwashing. I was glad to see it in the paper. It does one good to look at forbidden fruit—not advisable to taste it. I was patiently waiting for a reply. Brother Lint has taken courage to give a correct view on the subject, so much so, that I could only make a comparison. For that reason I have selected the subject of Washing Pots and Cups.

This subject truly embraces a great deal: a volume could be composed on it, if carried out in all its details in the word of God. As I do not wish to write a lengthy article, I would only make a few references. I suppose we all understand that Christ, who was addressing the Pharisees and Scribes, about their traditions, has strict reference of those ways or views which mankind take to disfigure the true way of salvation. If so, what was the cause of the fall of man? We all know, that strictly obeying God was not the cause, but disobedience. What was the cause of the destruction in Noah's time? Disobedience. And how dreadful was the fall, or destruction, on account of their disobedience to God. By tracing up the old Testament scriptures, we can find many similar circumstances, to show the result of a self-consecrated practice. But as we depend upon the present and future for our welfare, we will speak about Christ and him crucified.

Christ said, "I am the way, the truth, and the life; and no man cometh unto the Father, but by me." Thus it is necessary for us to become acquainted with his teachings. We have this revealed unto us. We can have it; and mostly all have it in their families. But I am sorry to say it is too little heeded, A great number take some novel instead of the wholesome teaching of Christ. At times when you wish to talk to them about that Savior, they appear to have heard of him; asking questions, they know nothing, except what certain preachers have told them; and this only because they were well paid for it. You, perhaps, in some cases, have to be very short, or receive offensive answers. I for my part could only compare them to pot-washers. If we can come to God only in and through Christ; if we could live in him, with part of his commands, we would have a great many Christians. But the word of God appears to introduce some different sentiments. It seems to teach us to fulfil the whole law. There are some objections made to this, claiming it impossible to keep the whole law. I never heard it made by any, except such as are pretenders. If we believe, there is nothing requested of us, but what we can practice. There is nothing requested of us, only what is calculated to make us respectable men and women. It will make us lovely in our neighborhood, in our families, and, in short, wherever we go.

I often thought, "what a change it would make, if we could only all be true followers of Christ." We would have a joyful time here! It seems as though it were necessary to have some tares among us, or, at least there always were some. And they grow so variously that it is necessary to understand them well, so as to avoid gathering them. I sometimes see them appearing very mild and pleasant: might almost say it is a pity to let them be destroyed." And they like to grow very well, in well cultivated soil. So it is necessary to watch them daily, and not let them grow. If they should happen to be sown, root them up before they take too much of a start. They have spreading roots. If they are allowed to grow, they are a tedious weed to destroy. This is the great cause of our differing so much in the plan of salvation. A great many tares are in the way; and not wishing to destroy them, they seek a way to let them grow together, and at last the tares take the advantage. But at the same time, the husbandman will make it appear that it makes no difference so that the end of that tare affair is almost infidelity, of which we have a great deal.

The term, non-essential, is the seed in general. Perhaps it is very small in the beginning, giving it room to grow, but it will make a serious thing of it. They often commence growing by seeing a splinter in a neighbor's eye. The oftener they look at it, the larger it appears; but at the same time, they are peeping over a beam in their own eye. This is a great evil in practice among the so-called christians in this nineteenth century.

A willing mind—a mind that understands and practices the will of the Lord, is what we want. Unless this takes place, we cannot expect success. It will have a tendency to grow weaker, becoming less, and less, until it is all gone. It is necessary to become acquainted with the will of God in the onset. In what way? By going to meeting only? This is a good place, but not necessarily the only place. Take your Testament, read it thoroughly at home, read it with a desire to practice what it tells you. By so doing you will not depend so much on the preacher. If he should accidentally not make quite the right illustration, you are ready to do better, which is your gain. "If the blind lead the blind, both will fall into the ditch." Thus it appears not a safe guide to depend too much on a leader. We are told to prove all things and hold fast that which is good." Our Savior has suffered and died to redeem us all. What a pity it is, that so many are not willing to take part in that which is going to make them more respectable, more reliable, more sociable, and intelligent than any rule of mankind can. In this year may we be farther advanced in the cause of Christ, help each other along; build each other up. Every day brings us nearer home. One after the other leaves this troublesome world, until we are all there, so let us not forget each other; but pray for each other, so that we may all have part in that land of peace and rest.

Useful Talents.

What does it profit a man if he has rare talents but turns them to no good account? Many a man boasts of his gifts and accomplishments, and in a measure despises others on account of their inferior endowments; but when results are compared he is far behind those who have been less lavishly blessed by nature. It reminds us of a rich nobleman who was once showing a friend a great collection of precious stones, whose value was almost beyond counting. He had gathered them with the greatest labor and expense. "And yet," he remarked, "they yield me no income."

His friend replied that he had two stones which cost him about ten florins each, or about ten dollars for both, yet they yielded him an income of two hundred florins, nearly one thousand dollars, a year. These valuable stones in themselves made a poor comparison with the diamonds, pearls, rubies and gems of the nobleman, for they were toiling, gray mill-stones, but they were worth more after all. What if we are talented, but our talents yield us income!

A Sweet Thought.—Good, kind, true, holy words, dropped in conversation, may be little thought of, but they are like seed of flower or fruitful tree falling by the wayside, borne by some bird, haply thereafter to fringe with beauty some mountain-side, or to make glad some lonely wilderness.—North British Review.

To an Autumn Leaf.

The buds of Spring, their beauties coyly-chiding
From stranger eye,
Breathe not to us, as thou, sweet, sad. chiding,
That all must die.

The summer wild-flower, blooming for some finder
Who chance may send,
Hath not, with all its bloom, thy still reminder,
That life must end.

Thus, neither beauteous buds, nor flowers, giving,
Their perfumes rare,
To us who cannot always here be living,
Are left so fair.

As thou bright leaf, which, wafted from a distance,
Hast hither flown.
For, in the story of thy brief existence,
We read our own.

Did the Savior Bear the Cross?

Did, or did not, the blessed Lord bear his cross to the place of execution? This being a question with some, we will briefly notice the history concerning this matter, as it is recorded by the sacred writers.

"And after that they had mocked him, they took the robe off from him, and put his own raiment on him, and led him away to crucify him; and as they came out, they found a man of Cyrene, Simon by name; him they compelled to bear his cross." Matt. 27: 31, 32. "And when they had mocked him, they took off the purple from him, and put his own clothes on him, and led him out to crucify him. And they compel one Simon, a Cyrenian, who passed by, coming out of the country, the father of Alexander and Rufus, to bear his cross." Mark 15: 20, 21. "And he released unto them him that for seduction and murder was cast into prison, whom they had desired; but he delivered Jesus to their will; and as they led him away, they laid hold upon one Simon a Cyrenian, coming out of the country, and on him they laid the cross, that he might bear it after Jesus." Luke 43; 25, 26.

From these scriptures it might be inferred, that the Savior had nothing to do with taking his cross to the place of crucifixion; but John in speaking of the matter, says, "Then delivered he him therefore unto them to be crucified, and they took Jesus and led him away; and he, bearing his cross, went forth unto a place called the place of a skull, which is called in the Hebrew Golgotha, where they crucified him." In this last scripture we have a positive declaration that the Savior did bear his own cross; and as he was crucified by the Romans, (a fact which we think no person will deny,) and as according to their law, criminals were obliged to bear their own cross to the place of execution, we conclude that the Savior did bear his cross, at least a portion of the way; and as they came out of the city, his physical strength began to fail him so much, that he was unable to bear his cross farther; therefore they compelled Simon, who was passing by to bear it the rest of the way.

Now it is not said that Simon bore the cross all alone. He might have only assisted the Savior in bearing the cross the rest of the way. From the reading of John, we would favor this conclusion. But it is not to be supposed that it was a lack of courage, or zeal, that caused our blessed Master to give way under his burdens; but it was the agonizing trials and fatigues which he had been subjected to for the last fifteen hours; having been deprived of sleep, and hurried from place to place, and obliged to stand the whole time of his trials, the loss of blood and the want of food, that caused his strength to fail him.

Dear reader, cannot we take up his cross, and bear it after him, as Simon did; and follow him in his footsteps, he having endured so much that we through his suffering might live into life everlasting.

Jesus Wept.

What solemnity in the words, "Jesus wept!"

What feelings of sympathy! What emotions of love! What tenderness of heart, seemingly, manifested in behalf of poor humanity! He is the Redeemer, and his love is infallible. Reader, "Jesus wept," not because he was afraid of death; not because he shrank from the shame of the cross; not because in resurrecting Lazarus it would require a supernatural display of power! Oh, no! it was not that! it was because of sin.

How beautiful it is expressed in the poet,

"Jesus wept that we might weep,
Each sin demands a tear;
In heav'n alone no sin is found
And there O no weeping there."

When the world lay in sin and gross darkness, Jesus left the beautiful climes above to expiate for the sins of the world. What tears it cost for our redemption! Whenever we weep, and the tears fall to our feet, oh! what bliss to know that the same ground has been saturated by the tears and blood of Emmanuel.

The way of life is the way of tears. We cannot make one step heavenward that has not been hallowed by the tears of a lovely Savior. Every inch is holy ground.

Reader, do you glory in the thought that you have a Savior of infinite strength and of sympathy? Do you apperciate his his holy example? Do you love and serve him as you ought? If so, continue in his service and you shall be happy in this world, happy in eternity, and at last sing the songs of the redeemed in the world to come. Your brother and friend.

REMARKS:—The above is a brief production from my brother in the flesh, of late deceased.

It was composed about a fortnight previous to his death.

After his death it was presented to me for correction, and having done so, I now submit it to the readers of the COMPANION, hoping they will profit by it.

Reader, think of the dead, who is so earnestly appealing to you to adhere to the useful discipline as taught and exemplified by the world's Redeemer. Think of the dead, and then think of him of whom it is said "He wept."

After This Manner Therefore Pray Ye. Mat 6 th: 9—13.

Prayer to God is the duty of all men. In him we live, and move,and have our being. Every good and perfect gift cometh down from the Father of lights. Men ought therefore always to pray, and not to faint. We are so sinful, that we always need mercy. We are so weak, that we always need help. We are so empty, that we always need supplies. We are so exposed, that we always need protection. How reasonably then it is that we should continue in prayer; but we greatly need direction in prayer. We know not how to pray, nor what to pray for, as we ought. Therefore Christ has been pleased to teach us in these words; which contain an excellent form and pattern of prayer. After this manner we are to pray. Now, as many persons constantly use this prayer, it may be very useful to explain it, because it may be feared that some repeat the words without knowing the meaning, which is formality at best; and some contradict every part of the prayer by their wicked lives, which is base hypocrisy. May we therefore be assisted by the good Spirit rightly to understand it, that so, whenever we use it hereafter, we may offer up a reasonable and spiritual sacrifice, acceptable to God, by Jesus Christ.

'Our Father, Which Art In Heaven.'

We should always begin our prayer with proper thoughts of God. And what thoughts of him are so proper as those suggested by these words: namely, his goodness and his greatness. As a Father, he is good, as a heavenly Father, he is great. Thus we are taught to approach him in confidence and reverence. As the Creator of all men,God may,in a general sense, be called the Father of all, but it is in a higher and more endearing sense that he is here called a Father: as being reconciled to believing sinners through the blood of Jesus Christ. God is angry with the wicked every day. He does not look down upon them with approbation, nor do they look up to him with confidence and love. Therefore this prayer is not fit for the use of a man who lives in sin, whose carnal mind is enmity against God. How dares the swearer, the liar, the drunkard call God a Father. God will not own the relation. If such men pray, might they not rather cry our father, which art in hell, for Christ said to such persons, ye are of your father the devil, and the lusts of your father ye will do. John 8: 44. But when a person is convinced of his state as a sinner; when he is enlightened to know Christ as a Savior, and when, by a lively faith, he comes to God through him; then God is reconciled to him; his anger is turned away, and he comforts him. Then he may look up to God, through Christ, as a merciful God, "forgiving iniquity, transgression, and sin," for, "to as many as receive him," and the atonement through him, "he giveth power to become the sons of God, even to them that believe in his name," and to such only is the "spirit of adoption" given whereby they cry,"Abba, Father." For it is one thing to use the word Father, and another to approach him, as an affectionate child comes to a tender parent, with a persuasion of his being able and willing to supply his wants. To such persons this name is full of comfort; for they are emboldened to believe, that if earthly parents, though evil, know how to give good gifts to their children, God, our heavenly Father, is much more disposed to do them good, and bless them with all spiritual blessings in Christ Jesus. But this name teaches us also the greatness of God, Children ought to treat their earthly parents with great respect, but what reverence is due to the Father of spirits, whose throne is in the heavens; not that God is confined to heaven; but he is said to dwell there, because he displays the brightest beams of his majesty, and there angels and saints bow low before his feet, crying, day and night, Holy, holy, holy, is the Lord God Almighty. Such thoughts as these should pass our minds,when we say Our Father which art in heaven. Hallowed be thy name. This petition is placed first, to show us our first and chief desire should be, that God may be glorified. The name of God signifies God himself, as he is pleased to make himself known to us by his titles, his words, and his works. In his Gospel, more especially, all his glorious perfections shine and unite. There he shows himself "a just God and a savior." Now, to hallow God's name is to sanctify it, to hold it sacred,for to sanctifyanything, is to set it apart from every profane and common use. In this petition, then, we pray that God would enable us to glorify him in all things whereby he makes himself known. We must glorify him in our hearts, by high, holy, rent thoughts of him. We must glorify him in our language, by always speaking of him in the most solemn manner. We must glorify in our actions, whether we eat or drink, all should be done with a view to the glory of God. How far from this are many who say this prayer, and who no sooner rise from their knees than they profane this holy name. Think of this, you who curse and swear, or take the Lord's name in vain. When you say, in a thoughtless manner, God bless us! O God! O Christ! is this to hallow the name of God? Leave off praying, or leave off swearing, for they cannot agree together. But let every one that fears God remember that the glory of God is the first and chief thing, that we are to ask for, and to desire, and to seek, even before our own good. That we and others may do this, we are taught, in the next place, to pray, "Thy Kingdom come." This does not mean the kingdom of God's providence, which rules over all; this cannot be said to come, for it is come already, and will never cease, but it means that spiritual kingdom which Christ came to set up in the world; that kingdom of the Messiah, which the pious Jews had long expected, and which when this prayer was given to the disciples, was said to be at hand. This kingdom of Christ did come soon after. It was set up when Christ ascended to heaven, and the Spirit descended from it. But still the prayer is as necessary as ever; for we pray that this kingdom may be established in our hearts, and extended to all the world. The kingdom of Christ is extended on purpose to destroy the kingdom of Satan. The devil has usurped a dominion over all mankind,and though he does not now possesss the bodies of men, as once he did, yet he "rules in the hearts of the children of disobedience, who are led captives by him at his will, and in some parts of the world he is actually worshiped." In order to destroy this infernal kingdom, Jesus Christ came into the world, he overcame him in all his attempts to seduce him, and on the cross he spoiled principalities and powers, and conquered when he fell; he deprived Satan of his power, and led captivity captive. Wherever he sends his Gospel, he proclaims liberty, and whenever he gives his grace to any person, there Satan is dethroned, and being made willing to submit to Christ, the believer is translated out of Satans kingdom of sin and darkness into the holy and happy kingdom of God's dear Son. When we say, "Thy kingdom come," we pray that the light, power, liberty, and glory of Christ's spiritual kingdom, may be more fully experienced in our own hearts. For, as one observes, in worship we pay our homage to God. In the word, we came to learn his laws. In the Lord's Supper we renew our vows of allegiance. In alms-giving, we pay him tribute. In prayer, we ask leave and praise is our rent to the great Lord, from whom we hold our all. Thus also we express our souls desire for our poor fellow-sinners. Deeply affected with the state of Heathens, Jews, Mahometans, and sinners of all discriptions, we pour forth our souls in holy longings for their conversion, earnestly desiring the joyful day when it shall be said, "The kingdoms of this world are become the king of our Lord and of his Christ, and he shall reign forever and ever."

"Thy will be done, in earth, as it is in heaven.

God, the maker of the world, has a right govern it. His will is the proper rule of his creature's action; will it is obeyed by them all, except by men and devils. God has made known his will to us in his word. The law of the ten commandments shows what obedience he requires of us; but, as fallen creatures, we have broken it, and rendered ourselves incapable of obtaining life by it. God has graciously given us the law of faith, or the Gospel of salvation by Jesus Christ, and this is his commandment, that we should believe on the name of his Son Jesus Christ, and love one another. But the natural man refuses obedience to this also. He is either unconcerned about salvation, or dislikes the way of it; and while he remains in this state, he cannot do the will of God in any respect acceptably; for without faith it is impossible to please him. How necessary then is this petition, "Thy will be done." It includes, 1. A desire to know it, as the Psalmist prays, "Teach me to do thy will, for thou art my God." 2. A heart to do it, a heart on which God has written his laws. I remember a person who told me, when he was teaching his child to say this prayer, and came to this petition, "Thy will be done," the child refused to say it, and would have it, "My will be done." This poor, simple child was far more honest than many of us who say, "Thy will be done," and yet determine to follow our own will, but the real Christians desire is, "O that there were such a heart in me, to fear God, and to keep his commandments always;" Deu. 5: 20. We pray also. 3. For strength to do the will of God, for to will may be present, and yet how to perform that which is good we may not find, but, knowing that the Lord worketh in his people both to will and to do, we hereby pray that he would "make us perfect in every good work, to do his will;" working in us that which is well pleasing in his sight, through Jesus Christ. This petition also includes holy submission to the will of providence, however afflictive; and that we may learn to bear it within murmuring. We pray for grace to do all this, in imitation of the spirits of just men made perfect, and of the sinless angels in heaven. Gods will is done in heaven.

Give us this day our daily bread."

This petition implies dependence on God for food and all the supports and comforts of life. Man, as a fallen creature, has forfeited the good things of this life, and deserves to be deprived of them all. The earth was cursed for man's sake, therefore in sorow and labor he eats of it; but it is through the goodness of God, that he has power to labor; that rain from heaven and fruitful seasons are granted. It is he, who gives us our corn, and wine, and oil, and though the poor man works hard for his daily bread, it is no less the gift of God To him also we owe the appetite that makes our food pleasant, and the power of digestion that makes it nourish. Moderation in our desires is here expressed. We are not taught to ask for riches and honors, which are often the destructive snares of those who possess them; but we may lawfully ask for food and raiment, for our heavenly Father knoweth that we have need of these things, (Matt. 6 : 32), and having these, we ought to be content. We are not to ask for weekly bread or monthly bread, or, yearly bread, but for daily bread; for we must not boast of to-morow, or depend on future years, but live in daily dependence on God, without anxious cares for a future time. Sufficient to the day is the evil thereof; and sufficient for the day is the good thereof, so that we are to exercise ourselves in daily prayer, and receive every meal and every morsel, as the gift of a good God, which will make it sweet. The Christian will also ask for bread for his soul, as well as his body. Christ is to the believer's soul what food is to the body. He is the bread of life, and if we are born of God we shall daily desire to feed upon him in our hearts, "by faith, with thanksgiving.

And for give us our debts, as we forgive our debtors."

This petition is joined to the last by the word and, which may teach us that without the forgiveness of sins, the comforts of this life can do no real good; "for what is a man profited, if he gain the whole world, and lose his own soul." Everyman is a sinner. There is not a creature, who wants daily bread, that does not also want daily pardon, and yet how few are sensible of it. Sin is here compared to a debt. There is a debt of duty we owe to God, and in case of failure we contract a new debt to the justice of God. The debts we owe to man expose us to misery here. And be it remembered! we are not able to to pay a single farthing of this debt. If ever we are delivered from going to the prison of hell it must he by a free pardon, for so we pray. "Forgiveing us our debts, or, as it is elsewhere, "Forgive us our tresspasses." We can make no amends. It is not taking care not to contract a new debt, that will discharge an old one, this will not do with our neighbors, nor will it do with God. Free forgiveness alone will prevent our punishment. But, though a sinner is justified freely, it is only through the redemption that is in Christ. With believing and penitent hearts we must go to God by Jesus Christ, and plead for his mercy for Christ's sake. At the same time, we are here taught the necessity of a forgiving temper. "As we forgive our debtors," that is as we forgive those who have injured us in our property, person or name. Not that by our kindness to another we deserve forgiveness at the hand of God, but that we cannot expect pardon from God, while we refuse it to those who ask us for it, we may humbly hope that if we are enabled by grace to forgive others, God whose thoughts and ways are infinitely above ours, will not reject our prayer for pardoning mercy through Jesus Christ.

"And lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil."

Those whose sins are forgiven will be afraid of sinning again, and knowing the power of temptation, we pray to be kept from it. Temptation is any thing which makes trial of us, and proves what is in our hearts. Afflictions are God's trial of us, for our good; but all Satan's temptations are to lead us into evil. The person who uses this prayer aright is afraid of sin, and he offers up this petition to God, that he would keep him out of the way of such trials. as would be too hard for him, or grant sufficient strength to resist and overcome the devil, the evil one, "who goeth about like a roaring lion, seeking whom he may devour." But this must be accompanied with watching, and avoiding all wilful occasion of sin, or else these words do but mock God. The conclusion of the prayer is: For Thine Is The Kingdom, And The Power, And The Glory, Forever Amen. This shows why we should pray to God, and why we may hope to be heard. The kingdom is his. God is king of all the world, and has a right to dispose of all things in it. The power is his, as well as the authority. He therefore can answer our prayers: and we hope he will. His then will be the glory. Whatever God does is for his own glory, and if we are disposed to give him all the glory of what he does for us, we may hope that our petition will be granted. This kingdom, this power, this glory, are forever; he will never want the power to help: and if we are saved we shall never cease to give him praise. The force of the prayer lies in the first and last words of it, Our Father, and Amen. In the first we apply to God in Christ, as reconciled to us: in the last we set our seal to the whole, and say Amen: so let it be so; we humbly hope it shall be for Christ's sake.

CONCLUSION.

How awfully is this prayer abused. Ignorant people use it as a kind of charm; and think it enough to say the words, without considering the meaning. O, beware, as you love your souls, of mocking God by thoughtless praying. Can you call him a father, while you obey the devil? Will you say "hallowed be thy name," and yet profane it daily. What do you care for his kingdon when you belong to another, or talk of his will, without wishing to do it. Do you not forget him when you eat and drink? Are you not careless about the forgiveness of your sins, adding daily to the dreadful debt, and perhaps living in malice and wrath. How can you pray that God will not lead you into temptation, when you run wilfully into the way of it; frequenting the ale-house, the play-house, and the company of the low, the profane, and the drunken? Dear fellow creature, permit me to say, that thus contradicting your prayers by your life, you cannot expect to be heard, nay, God may justly say to you at last, "Out of thine own mouth I condemn thee, thou wicked servant." But God forbid. Think over this prayer before you use it again; and beg of God to enable you to use it with understanding and sincerity, that the rich blessings asked for in it may be yours, and God be glorified in your everlasting salvation.

An Explanation of Corinthians 11: 16.

"But if any man seem to be contentious, we have no such custom, neither the churches of God."

In the above named chapter the apostle Paul is speaking of Christ and his church, together with the church ordinances. The apostle refers to a fact in this chapter, which is embodied in all the writings of the Bible; namely, that God has placed the woman in a depeudence on, and subject to, the man. Even to Eve the Lord God had said "and thy desire shall be to thy husband, and he shall rule over thee." Although Christ qualifies that subjection, yet it requires holy women now to be in subjection to their husbands. It is a trait of "the holy women, who trusted in God, in the old time," that they were in "subjection unto their own husbands," I might refer to numbers of passages bearing on the subject, but I will only refer to a few. 1st Tim, 2: 11, 12; Titus 2: 5; 1st Peter 3: 5, 6, and Eph. 5: 22. Christ is the head of the Church; the man the head of the woman. When Paul says that the man is the head of the woman, even as Christ is the head of the church, he evidently means that as Christ has power or authority over the church, so the man has power now, always has had, and always should have, over the woman. And when otherwise, it is somewhat as the rhymes have it.

"I know not which live most unnatural lives.

Obeying husbands, or commanding wives."

Now we hear Paul say that the woman ought "to have power on her head," or as the marginal reading has it, "a covering, in sign that she is under the power of her husband. "The word power, stands here for the sign of that power: namely, a covering. As Clarke says, "It is no unusual thing, in the Old and New Testaments, for the signs and tokens of things to be called by the names of the things themselves: for thus, circumcision is called the covenant, in Gen. 17: 10—13, though it were only the sign of it." This power, or if you prefer, the sign of this power, holy women were in some way informed, to place on their heads, but in what way they were informed, I know not, nor is it a matter of importance. The query is, does the New Testament require the woman to have this power on her head as a sign of subjection to her husband? The Greeks, Romans, and Jews had theirs on, and we are informed that this was, and is, a common custom through all the East. Paul says that a Christian woman ought to have it on, and the readers of the COMPANION have before now learned that ought is binding, as it implies an obligation of duty. To be shaven and shorn, was considered a shame or infamy, for a woman, as we are informed. Therefore says Paul "If it be a shame for a woman to be shorn or shaven, let her be covered." In conclusion Paul asks the question, "Is it comely that a woman pray unto God uncovered?" That is, is it becoming, or suitable, to time, place, or circumstances for her to do so? We infer from Paul's writings that it is not, yea, the question itself implies it. Now as it was a disgrace for a woman to be stripped of her veil, and to be shaven and shorn, the apostle would have us to know that the woman should have long hair as a covering that God gives to her. But some confound this covering with the covering that she is some confound this covering that she is to put on herself. I will again repeat the words "If a woman be not covered, let her also be shorn." That is, if she will not put on a covering herself, remove also the one God gave her. "But if it be a shame for a woman to be shaven or shorn, let her be covered." That is, if it be a shame to remove the covering that God gave to her, why then let her put on the covering which is to be a sign of her subjection unto her husband. Although the apostle speaks of the hair as a covering, yet he speaks of another covering, as already proven. And further, if Paul had reference only to the covering of hair, he would have taught the man to remove all his hair, for he says "A man indeed ought not to cover his head." Then we conclude that when a man is engaged in the religious duty of "praying and prophesying," that he is "not to cover his head;" and that the woman is to be covered, for it is not comely, that is suitable, or becoming, for her to "pray unto God uncovered." Paul was setting things in order when he wrote the above words. Webster says that a "frequent repetition of the same act," makes it a custom. I am not positive how it was in Paul's time, but I suppose it was then like now; that is, there were individual members who contended that it was not necessary for women to be covered during prayer or prophesying; and in frequently doing so it became a custom, according to the meaning of the word; but Paul informs us that he, and others, no doubt those who had with him the care of the churches of God. It is somewhat so now; the elders who have charge of churches, if found faithful, and the faithful churches have no custom to contend that a man may have his head covered, and have long hair, and a woman have her head uncovered, during the service of God. In COMPANION, number 28, of last volume, we hear one speak who seems to be contentious, or, as we would have it, one who "puts himself forward as a defender of these points." He contends that "it is not likely" that Paul "intended to call contention a custom," for says he, "customs are things established by a more or less common usage and consent." But Paul does call contentions a custom, and I will refer you to Webster to see whether he is right, or not.

Custom: frequent repetition of the same act; way of acting; ordinary manner; habitual practice; assuage. And we know that contentions may be all this. The writer would have us to accept of the meaning of custom as found in the sense of the term of law, which was not what Paul intended, as the connection plainly shows. The writer referred us to three translations, for which I thank him, and by comparing six translations, I find that they have about the same substance, all teaching that Paul would have the woman to wear long hair, as well as another covering, and the man short hair, and no covering on his head, when engaged in the service of God. May God forbid that the elders of the churches, as well as the churches themselves, should ever have the custom to contend for the opposite. Brethren, the doctrine of the covering of the woman, and of he non-covering of the man, in divine worship, "will bear investigation in the light of the light of the Gospel; it will gain by being investigated." I know that a part of the church would rather not submit itself unto Christ; and of the women, they would rather rule over the men, I mean, only some so. I am not much surprised if the man puts his covering on,—as some do at funerals—and the woman hers off. "Prove all things, and hold fast that which is good" If I have but one talent to use, I will use it in "earnestly contending for the faith which was once delivered unto the saints"

Home.

It seems but a few days, since we, in our boyhood, would gather around the fireside, with our father, mother, brothers and sisters, all at home, Now where are we? Our parents have both gone to their long home beyond this vale of tears, to a happier home, we trust, than this. Their troubles and sorrows are over. Ere long it will be said of us that we, too, have no abiding place here, and must go the way of all the earth. We are now scattered several hundred miles apart; and have little homes that we call our own; but they, too, are not lasting, no more than the buds that burst in the Spring and grow to their full extent in a few weeks, but are soon gone. Well may we say, "Man born of woman is of few days and full of trouble."

This brings us to see more closely that the things of this world are earthly, and that it is not best to strive to lay up treasures here, for it is too short a duration, and where our treasure is there our heart will be also. Then we think that it is very necessary that we try to store away our treasure where it will last, or in other words where we can enjoy it forevermore. As the New Year approached the old one disappeared; and we are one year nearer eternity, whether well spent or not. We have been thinking upon this point, and trying to make ourselves fit subjects to enter the new year, with the Grace all christians should have. May we be strengthened, that we may lead a pious and christian life, that good works may be seen by our daily walks; and that we may reach that heavenly home that fadeth not away, is my prayer.

A Worthless Move.

I learned a very important lesson today from a lazy clock. I call it lazy; for such it is in one sense of the word. True, it made a noise, as do other clocks, and seemed to second away every hour of time with apparent ease; but, when I came to examine its time, I found it to be, as I then thought, far behind the right time. Presently, one near me said to the proprietor, "Your clock is too slow." The prompt and decided reply followed, "It is not to slow, but its hands will not move." This remark set me to thinking. "What a worthless move!" thought I. It had folded its hands, as it were, in inglorious ease, to tick away the seconds in the most unsatisfactory way imaginable.

As I took a last look at that useless worker, I thought of the fruitless toil of millions of intelligent men and women, whose lives are a failure. Many, regardless of the inspired injunction, "Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might," fold their hands, and live a life of pleasure and ease. They seem to be asleep to their best interests. They have not learned the more important lessons of true living. They act in such a manner, and in such a cause, that their labors are unappreciated. Behind his counter stands the vender of what has burned up the very foundation of true manhood—poisonous liquors. On his editorial chair sits the sensual editor, issuing, for a few million, a dose of fiction, sufficient to purge from the young heart all that is high and noble, letting remain, and giving vitality to the tares of evil, which will ripen into a life-harvest of degradation and misery. Around the card table, in a gambling hell, sit a few unfortunate wretches, who were once happy in innocence, with a pack of cards, bearing the satanic image itself, in one hand, and a revolver in the other, to keep Satan's fingers out enough to admit fairness They are making a valueless move. Unlike the lazy sinner, who seems not to move at all, and who fails to appreciate the value of Christianity, only because he has never been fully awakened to its utility, they move—hasten on toward perdition, until they are compelled to drink of those bitter waters, and seek a retreat away from the gaze of the refined and Christianized, in the abode of some primary hell.

Such is the result of a downward move. It is well to keep looking upward—heavenward. It is the magnificent view of the richness and splendor of Heaven's high dome, that will inspire our hearts to move in any good cause. Such a view will swell our hearts with love and gratitude to him whose pity hath saved us. We will then go to work in alleviating the sorrows, and inspire a new hope in the hearts, of those who are wretched and on their way to ruin, just because they have been so coolly treated that they are made to doubt that there is an eye to pity and an arm to save.

Hymn.

By faith I view my Savior dying
On the tree, on the tree;
To every nation he is crying,
"Look on me, look on me."

He bids the guilty now draw near Repent, believe, dismiss their fears—
Hark! hark! what precious words I hear
"Mercy's free, mercy's free."

Did Christ, when I was sin pursuing Pity me. pity me?
Did He snatch my soul from ruin
Can it be, can it be?

O yes, he did salvation bring,
He is my prophet, priest and king,
And now my happy soul can sing
Mercy's free, mercy's free.

Jesus my weary soul refreshes—
Mercy's free, mercy's free.
And every moment Christ is precious
Unto me, unto me.

None can describe the bliss I prove,
While through the wilderness I rove,
All may enjoy the Savior's love—
Mercy's free, mercy's free.

This precious truth, ye sinners hear it
Mercy's free, mercy's free,
Ye ministers of God declare it
Mercy's free, mercy's free.

Visit the heathen's dark abode
Proclaim to all the love of God,
Go spread the gracious news abroad
Mercy's free, mercy's free.

Long as I live I'll be crying,
Mercy's free. mercy's free,
And this shall be my theme when dying
Mercy's free, mercy's free,

And when the vale of death I've past
When lodged above the stormy blast
I'll sing while endless ages last—
Mercy's free, mercy's free.

The Christian Exode.

FROM THE GERMAN.

Come, brethren, come we hasten on
To New Jerusalem:
Perceive ye not the golden gate,
Which there before you gleams?

Direct your eyes straight forward there.
To Jesus doctrine true:
Keep in your mind to watch and pray,
Till you have journeyed through.

There is a monstrous wilderness,
Through which we yet must pass.
Here, sweet the heavenly manna tastes,
Oh, murmer not, Alas!

Soon we will land on Jordan's strand,
Along the city's side.
Who keepeth faith can go across,
The waters will divide.

To Moses' song, our voices we,
On Jordan's banks will raise;
And to the Lamb's triumphant song,
In sweet rejoicing praise.

The golden, Heavenly city there,
Where all things flow and run;
Where all the streets are paved with gold,
And Jesus is the Sun.

O, beauteous place! O golden Sun!
That yonder gleaming keeps:
If I can only gaze thereon,
My heart within me leaps.

Oh, were I there! Oh, could I stand
In such a beauteous throng!
Which there to God, before his throne,
Exulting moves along.

There, all their sorrow, want and pain,
Then ever disattends.
There, they are dress'd in garments white,
And palms are in their hands.

There, they are singing evermore
Such beauteous melody,
As they had never sung before
In all their living here.

A Tribute of Respect.

In a recent number of the Companion, I read the obituary notice of Argus Leatherman, one of my former pupils. The king of terrors irrespective of age, talent or position, carries off his victims. A strong constitution, and exuberant health are no safeguards against the inroads af death. Accidents, and snares, beset the pathway of all. The endearing ties of relationship, friendship and association, are often sundered in the midst of the most ardent expectations of usefulness in the various duties of life. The fond hope of father and mother be blasted as the rose. For a moment the social circle feels the loss of a cheerful member; yet as the days and nights pass slowly and sadly away, as the sun shines with its accustomed brilliancy, and new friends seem the more cheerful, the departed one is measurably forgotten. So it is with all earth, and earthly attachments. Not so, however, with the attachment of father, mother, sister, brother,and friend. Sweet memories of the departed hover their meditations while life endures. It is an earnest of that blissful meeting in a better world. What friend of loved ones gone before has viewed a sun-set scene without emotion and without a tear—the outpouring of fond memories? What mother has viewed the vacant seat without a sigh? What brother or sister can review the old play-ground and recall the kind word and loving smile, without awakening fond recollections and inexpressible emotions? There is a home where the good shall all meet again. Let us all live the life of the righteous that our last days may be as his.

[Essay.]

A Thunder Storm.

On a calm evening of a sultry day in the latter part of August, I was alone on my way home from the Alleghany Mountains. There was that perfect quiet which prevails over nature in the languor of summer heat. The screaming of a hawk as it wheeled its course in the air was reverberated from cliff to cliff. In descending the mountain, there was a feeling of quiet luxury in gazing down on the narrow valley of New Creek.

In the midst of my admirations, I noticed a pile of bright, snowy clouds, peering above the height of the mountain. It was succeeded by another, and another, each seemingly pushing its predecessor, and towering with dazzling brilliancy in the deep blue atmosphere. And now muttering peals of thunder were faintly heard rolling behind the mountain. The hawk wheeled and screamed around the peaks, and the crows flew in all directions in search of shelter, and all nature seemed conscious of an approaching thunder-gust.

The clouds rolled in volumes over the mountain tops, their summits still bright and snowy, but the lower parts of an inky blackness. In a few moments, the rain began to patter down in broad and scattered drops; the wind freshened, and turned up the leaves of the trees. At length it seemed as if the massive clouds were torn open by the mountain tops, and complete torrents of rain came pouring down. The lightning leaped from cloud to cloud, and streamed quivering against the mountain tops, splitting and rending the stoutest trees. The thunder burst in tremendous explosions: the peals were echoed from mountain to mountain, each mountain making a new echo until New Creek and Knoby Mountains seemed to bellow back the storm. The rain fell so thick and fast that it hid everything from view. There was a fearful gloom, illuminated still more fearfully by the streams of lightning which glittered among the rain drops. I had never beheld such an absolute warring of the elements; it appeared as if the storm was tearing its way through the mountains, and had brought all the artillery of heaven into action.

By degrees the storm passed over. The clouds rolled away to the east, where they lay piled in feathery masses, tinted with the last rays of the setting sun. The distant play of lightning might still be seen about their dark bases, and now and then might be heard the faint muttering of the distant thunder.

Over and Over Again.

Over and over again,
No matter which way I turn,
I always find in the Book of Life
Some lesson I have to learn.
I must take my turn at the mill,
I must grind out the golden grain,
I must work at my task with a resolute will,
Over and over again.

Over and over again
The brook through the meadow flows,
And over and over again
The ponderous mill-wheel goes.
Once doing will not suffice,
Though doing be not in vain,
And a blessing failing us once or twice,
May come if we try again.

For the Pious Youth.

The First Temptation.

As long as I live I shall never forget the first temptation. It happened on a certain Sunday in 1872. Only a youth of fifteen, but a member of the church, I was at home the greater part of the day, and being tired, I took a walk, but hardly got fifty yards from my fathers house, before I met two of my schoolmates. After talking a few moments one of them asked me if I would not go along to one of our neighbors. I said, I would. We then started. After getting there I found some more boys engaged in playing ball. I was tempted, by Satan, to join in with them, breaking one of the ten commandments which says, "Remember the Sabbath to keep it holy." Now then boys, remember the first temptation, and don't forget to keep the Sabbath holy. Satan is going around as a roaring lion, seeking whom he may devour, and the only way to keep away from him, is to remember the first temptation, whatever it may be, and to ask the Lord to give us of his Spirit, which is ever willing to reprove us of sin and lead us in the path of duty.

Remember me in your prayers that I may hold out faithful.

Jacob L. Caylor.

Carroll county, Md.

Are you good at arithmetic? I will give you some losses to add up and calculate how much they come to. It is a good sum for boys. They are losses made by strong drink.

Loss of money.
Loss of time.
Loss of health.
Loss of business.
Loss of character.
Loss of friends.
Loss of good conscience.
Loss of feeling.
Loss of mind.
Loss of life.
Loss of the immortal soul.

It is a long and terrible account to run up; but it is an easy one to begin, and I see even boys beginning it at the beer-shops—young men adding to it at the tavern and billiard saloon. Stop, stop! and reckon up all the losses before you go further. Can you afford such losses in the long run of eternity?

Home Cheerfulness.—Many a child goes astray, not because there is want of prayer or virtue at home, but simply because home lacks sunshine. A child needs smiles as much as flowers need sunbeams. Children look little beyond the present moment. If a thing displeases, they are prone to avoid it. If home is a place where faces are sour and harsh, and fault finding is ever in the ascendant, they will spend as many hours as possible elsewhere. Let every father and mother, then, try to be happy. Let them look happy, let them talk to their children, especially the little ones, in such a way as to make them happy.

Life.—As the trials of life thicken, and the dreams of other days fade one by one, in the deep vista of disappointed hope, the heart grows weary of the struggle, and we begin to realize our insignificance. Those who have climbed to the pinnacle of fame, or revel in luxury and wealth, go to the grave at last with the poor mendicant who begs by the wayside, and like him are forgotten. Generation after generation have felt as we feel, and their fellows were as active in life as ours are now. They passed away as a vapor, while nature ever wears the same aspect of beauty. The heavens will be as bright over our graves as they are now around our path; the world will have the same attraction for offspring yet unborn that she had once for ourselves, and that she has now for our children.

"That's How."

After a great snow storm, a little fellow began to shovel a path through a large snow bank before his grandmother's door. He had nothing but a small shovel to work with.

"How do you expect to get through that drift?" asked a man passing along.

"By keeping at it," said the boy cheerfully, "that's how!"

That is the secret of mastering almost every difficulty under the sun. If a hard task is before you, stick to it. Do not keep thinking how large or how hard it is; but go at it, and then little by little it will grow smaller, until it is done.

If a hard lesson is to be learned, do not spend a moment in fretting; do not lose a breath in saying, "I can't" or "I do not see how;" but go at it and keep at it,—study. That is the only way to conquer it.

If a fault is cured or a bad habit broken up, it cannot be done by merely being sorry or trying a little. You must keep fighting until it is got rid of.

If you have entered your Master's service, and are trying to be good, you will sometimes find hills of difficulty in the way. Things will often look discouraging, and you will not seem to make any progress at all; but keep at it. Never forget "that's how."—The Household.

The rays of the sun are now generally believed to exhibit three forces; light, or luminous power; heat, or caloric power; and actinism, or chemical power. Whether these are regarded as distinct forces, or only as modified forms of one, the three are essentially dissimilar, representing respectively the heat-giving, the light-giving, and the chemical rays of the sun. The chemical principle of the sun's rays is relatively most active during the Spring; as Summer advances, this power diminishes, and the luminous force increases; while in Autumn the caloric radiations are relatively increased. Thus the conditions of the sun's light are varied with the varying seasons, to suit the necessities of vegetable life.

If we have been made to feel the evil of sin, no one can persuade us that it is not an evil.

A veteran observer says: "I never place much reliance on a man who is always telling what he would have done had he been there. I have noticed that somehow this kind of people never get there."

Multitudes in their haste to get rich, are ruined every year. The men who do things naturally, slowly, and deliberately, are the men who oftenest succeed in life. People who are habitually in a hurry generally have to do things over twice.

Christian Family Companion.

DALE CITY, PA., JAN. 10, 1873.

The Work of Destruction.

The loss of life, by land and by sea, that have occurred during the past several weeks must create emotions of sorrow everywhere. Broken rails, wheels and bridges have in a moment crushed rapid trains of cars, and mangled passengers, and the scattered coals from broken stoves have ignited the wrecks and burned to ashes the helpless victims who lay wedged between the immovable timbers. Fearful winds have blown over cities both in this country and Europe, unroofing houses, and destroying structures of various characters, and involving loss of life. In several instances the floors of churches have given way beneath the weight of assembled crowds intent upon the enjoyment of Christmas festivals, in a moment crushing to death and mangling dozens of men, women, and children. At sea there have been fearful gales, raging waters, and great disasters. Vessels have been disabled, dismantled and wrecked, involving immense loss of life, reaching the frightful number of 800 or 900.

While all over Christendom the people have been making merry over Christmas, the elements have combined strangely to bring sorrow to hundreds of households.

Apropos to this subject we have a very sad case of burning, which occurred in Wheeling, W. Va., of which the papers give the following particulars:

Mr. Daily started for the business portion of the city at an early hour in the evening, leaving his wife alone in the house. Mrs. Daily, who is said to have been a very neat housekeeper, was evidently cleaning the dust off the mantle piece with a cloth when her clothing was set on fire by the grate below. This is evidenced by the partially burned dusting cloth found lying on the floor in front of the fireplace.

After she found her clothing in a blaze she screamed for help and ran down stairs into the basement, where, overcome by the flames, she ceased her efforts to extinguish them and sat down on a stool and was literally roasted alive. The water she had used in her efforts to extinguish the fire and the burned stool from which she fell after death were found beside her in the basement.

A bright light was seen to flash up before 9 o'clock in the room occupied by the family. and a few cries were heard, by the neighbors. They, however, did not suppose that anything serious was transpiring, as the light was seen but a moment and the noise quickly died away.

About 10 o'clock her husband returned home and stumbled over her charred and blackened remains. Going up stairs he procured a light and returned to see the terrible sight of his wife's roasted body. He at once gave the alarm and in a short time the place was filled with the horrified neighbors.

Place of Next Annual Meeting.

It was decided at last Annual Meeting that the next meeting should be held "with the Brethren at Elk Lick congregation," which is the congregation in which the COMPANION is published; but it was only at a council meeting of this branch, held on Christmas day that the exact place of holding the meeting was decided upon. This congregation has had the meeting several times before. Then there was no railroad nearer than Johnstown, Frostburg, or Cumberland. Therefore a few miles one way or the other made no material difference, and accordingly the meeting was held at what we called the Mechanicsburg meeting-house, two and a half miles from Dale City; but now, the brethren and sisters then assembled in counsel thought the meeting would better be held nearer the station, and according decided that the meeting should be held in Dale City. No doubt this will be good news to those that expect to attend the meeting, as there will be no tedious journey to make by wagon, or on foot, after they get here, but will be within a furlong of the meeting. A very large barn has been rented, called the Olinger barn, which is no more needed, the farm having been laid out in lots. This barn will be remodeled, and arranged with galleries, so as to make one of the most convenient council chambers that could be found

It was also thought best to hold the meeting at Dale City, for the accommodation of the adjoining congregations, who are expected to assist in serving the meeting. So that when they come to town, whether by railroad or otherwise, they will be at the place of meeting, and ready to go to work, and need not tire themselves by a three mile walk. They can also take ministers to hold meetings, at Garrett, Mineral Point, and even as far as Somerset and Berlin, and return them in the morning in time for council.

And then we have such a large number of families of Brethren, living in town and the immediate vicinity, who can afford accommodations for the aged and infirm, that it would have seemed cruel to hold the meeting anywhere else. But we forbear further comment, lest we should embellish too largely, for we expect thousands of our readers to prove the matter for themselves.

At the same council meeting the following committees were appointed:

COMMITTEE OF ARRANGEMENT:

C. G. Lint, U. M. Beachly, Jonas A. Miller, Michael Hady, Daniel Buechly, John J. Fike, Jonas Lichty.

BUILDING COMMITTEE:

Martin Saylor, Daniel Shultz, John Schrock, Samuel R. Eike, Jos. B. Sell, Wm. Saylor.

COMMITTEE OF CORRESPONDENCE.

H. R. Holsinger, Manasses D. Miller, Jos. W. Beer.

FINANCE COMMITTEE.

Silas C. Keim, John W. Beachy, Samuel D. Livengood.

AUDITORS.

Samuel A. Maust, Samuel J. Miller, Manasses D. Miller.

POSTMASTER: John M. Olinger.

Of course these committee men are al brethren. The object of the Postmaster is, to have all letters, or mail matter, sent to any one during the meeting or before, sent in care of brother Olinger, and it will be delivered to the proper person. This was a new feature introduced by the brethren at last Annual Meeting, and it worked charmingly.

Thus it will be seen that we are pretty well organized. The next step will be to make arrangements to raise the means for defraying the expenses, which subject might be profitably discussed through these columns. And to open, we would suggest that the brethren of the District of Southeastern Ohio, will tell us how they managed that part of their business, last year.

There will be such announcements in the future as may be thought necessary for the public good.

A Disappointment.

We met with a disappointment in closing up the year 1872. For reasons which need not now be so minutely specified, we had concluded to issue a Supplement, or Extra to volume eight. But the excessive cold weather frustrated all our designs, by bursting our water pipe, and the engine pump, so that for a week no press work could be done in our office. We regreted it very much, but are nevertheless glad that the disappointment belonged to last year. The Supplement would have been gotten up in the form to which we had proposed to change the COMPANION, and would have contained a large amount of reading matter, and several advertisements that will not appear in our regular issue. It was designed for one, to fill up the long silence between the two volumes.

The Prospects.

Our prospects so far are quite good for volume nine. If a little extra efforts were made by all the friends of the Companion our circulation could be made to exceed five thousand. Do not relax, friends, now that the new year has set in. It is just as good a time towork as earlier. And with some persons better. Let every present reader try to yet induce some other person to take the paper. It can be done, almost to a man. Send for prospectus and specimen copies.

Dale City is Not a Postal Order Office.

Our patrons will please notice that Dale City is not a Postal Order Office. Postal Orders must be made payable to us at Somerset, Pa. We have had sent us several orders made payable at this office, and of course cannot use them. One was issued at South Bend, Ind., for $15,75, and the other at Belleville, Ohio, for $5,75. Will our correspondents be kind enough to have this changed?

Men Wanted.

The following is an item cut from an exchange. It is credited to "Sel.," but who Sell is, is a puzzle. It was handed to us by brother James A. Sell, but he spells his name with a double 'l,' and lays no claim to its authorship, though he thought, and we agree with him that it is good enough for the COMPANION. And that it may not be overlooked we place it among the editorial. Let all our brethren readers ponder it well, and let us all endeavor to be just such men, which the Church, and the world so much wants.

The great want of this age is men. Men who are not for sale. Men who are honest, sound from center to circumference, true to the heart's core—men who will condemn wrong in a friend or foe, in themselves as well as others. Men whose consciences are as steady as the needle to the pole. Men who will stand for the right if the heavens totter and the earth reel. Men who can tell the truth, and look the world and the devil right in the eye. Men that neither brag nor run. Men that neither flag nor flinch. Men who have courage without shouting to it. Men in whom the current of everlasting life runs still, deep, and strong. Men who do not cry, nor cause their voices to be heard on the streets, but who will not fail or be discouraged till judgement be set in the earth. Men who know their message, and tell it. Men who know their places, and fill them. Men who know their own business. Men who will not lie. Men who are not too lazy to work, nor too proud to be poor. Men who are willing to eat what they have earned, and wear what they have paid for. These are the men wanted to carry on the work of the church of God everywhere.

We feel thankful to our contributors and correspondents who are so richly supplying us with the best of reading matter. We hope many others are preparing manuscript for us, against a day of want, and that we may have a feast of good things during the entire volume. Let us have our hearts so full of the love of truth and righteousness, that it will shine through every article that may appear in our column.

Brethren's Almanac.

We are still prepared to furnish Brethren's Almanacs by the single copy, dozens, or hundreds. The Almanac gives good satisfaction wherever it is introduced, not only among members of the church but with intelligent persons of all classes. All orders are filled by return mail.

MARRIED.—At the residence of the bride's parents, on the second day of January, by the editor of the Companion, Mr. WM. MEYERS, of Mt. Pleasant, Pa., and Sister MARY COBER, daughter of brother Ephraim Cober, of Berlin, Pa.

CHARITY.—The last, best fruit which comes to late perfection, even in the kindliest soul, is tenderness toward the hard, forbearance toward the unforbearing, warmth of heart toward the cold, and philanthropy toward the misanthropic.

Afterward.

Now, the sowing and the reaping,
Working hard and waiting long;
Afterward, the golden reaping,
Harvest home and grateful song.

Now, the pruning, sharp, unsparing,
Scattered blossom, bleeding shoot;
Afterward, the plenteous bearing
Of the Master's pleasant fruit.

Now, the plunge, the briny burden,
Blind, faint gropings in the sea;
Afterward, the pearly guerdon,
That shall make the diver free.

Now, the long and toilsome duty,
Stone by stone to carve and bring;
Afterward the perfect beauty
Of the palace of the King.

Now, the turning and the tension,
Wailing minors, discord strong;
Afterward the grand ascension
Of the Alleluia song.

Now, the spirit conflict-riven,
Wounded heart, unequal strife;
Afterward, the triumph given,
And the victor's crown of life.

Now, the training strange and lowly,
Unexplained and tedious now;
Afterward, the service holy,
And the Master's "Enter thou!"

From the Brethren in Coos Co. Oregon.

Inasmuch as many are aware that a small body of brethren and sisters left Iowa for Oregon, and have not as yet learned where we have settled, we thought it necessary, for the satisfaction of the Brethren and sisters, and those who might take an interest in our welfare, to make a short statement of our travels in this country. There were three brethren and five sisters, in company with their families; namely, John Barklow and family, with his sister in-law Elizabeth Snyder, who resided in Keokuk county, Iowa, S. S. Barklow and family, and David Barklow and family, with our mother, who resided in Boon county, Iowa. We left Ontario, Iowa, on the 24th of April, and arrived at Red Bluffs, California, on the second of May. There we remained five days, whilst we fitted out teams, as the Rail road at that time did not go any farther. We then left Red Bluffs, and arrived in Rogue River Valley on the 20th of May, where we remained several weeks. There we former acquaintance with brother Wymer's and others. We had three meetings in Rogue Valley, also one in a small adjoining valley, called Apple Gate. Then we left our families in Rogue River Valley, while we traveled to other valleys in the state; namely, Umquaw Valley, Ten Mile Valley, where we had one meeting. From thence we went to Camaron's Valley: and as we wished to see the Coquelle country, and that country having no communication only from the ocean, by the river, aside from trails, we were forced to leave our wagon and go through on horse-back, the distance of forty miles across the coast range of mountains. After spending six or seven days travelling through this country, being better pleased with it than any we had seen, we concluded to try and get our families through and locate here; although it was very difficult getting through, as there was no wagon road completed entirely through. We then returned to our families in Rogue River Valley, after being absent nearly four weeks. We then, with our families left Rogue River Valley, on the 30th of July. After twelve days travel we arrived within 20 miles of the place where we wished to settle, and the way would not admit a wagon any farther, We then built a tent, as it was in the mountains, and no house near. There we remained for three days, while we prepared one-horse sleds, suitable to pass on a trail, by which we conveyed our goods through a dense forest of fir and cedar, over a small mountain, cutting our way through, and bridging logs by throwing smaller logs against them, so that a beast could pass over. In this way we worked through to the Coquelle River, the distance of eight miles, which took us six days. There we borrowed a flat boat, in which we comfortably placed our families, with goods, and rowed up the river thirteen miles, where we landed on the 19th of August. We can say through the mercies of God, our heavenly Father, we had a prosperous journey: Reasonably good health. Though some was quite weakly when we left the States, they improved greatly in health, even while on the journey. Our mother who was in her 77th year, stood the trip well. We have located at the forks of the Coquelle River, the head of navigation, 15 miles from the ocean by land, 40 miles by the river. After being here a short time, we notified the people that there would be preaching in the grove a short distance from our houses, on the coming Sabbath, where there assembled a good and attentive congregation: their hearts seemed to flow with gratitude, that they had the opportunity of assembling in public worship, as they were almost destitute of preaching by any order. They seemed to manifest a great desire for preaching, in different parts of the valley; which we by the help of God tried to do; and, we think, the Lord willing, churches will spring up in Oregon. But let me remind our laboring brethren, where they are so thickly settled, to think of the Far West, and how much you are needed there. In many places they have never heard a brother preach. There are good chances for large and flourishing churches; and we see nothing to hinder brethren from doing well, both spiritually, and temporally, here. The health is good. There has not been known a case of ague, or chills, in this valley. The soil is rich and productive, with a climate that is not surpassed any where: scarcely cold enough to freeze a house plant on an open porch, at any time. The last two weeks in October we had frequent showers; since that, up to the present, clear, no occasion to feed stock any, only those in use. We think that brethren desiring to locate in a mild climate, and a healthly one, could do well here in this place. Now, for fear of being to lengthy, we will close, by asking the prayers of all our dear brethren and sisters in our behalf.

address, S. S. Barklow.

Brother Henry:—The Companion has always been a welcome visitor in my house. I have taken it from its youth, or nearly so. I have every volume full except volume 1. Do not erase my name, unless so directed. I cannot do without the Companion. I am getting old and feeble, and cannot go to meeting regularly; but I can read, and be encouraged on my way to Zion; hear from the Brethren elsewhere, which is a great help to me. It is true, we read once in a while, that which we think does not correspond with God's word; but men have different opinions. So they had in the apostles' day. Who can help it? When we go to meeting to hear the brethren preach, we sometimes hear that which we think is not in accordance with the word. But that is no reason that we should stay at home, and do not hear all? Take the Companion and read it; go to meeting and hear what is said; then prove it, not with your opinions, but with the word of God, "and hold fast to that which is good," and we will never regret it, neither in time nor in eternity.—Brethren and sisters, let us bear with each other, and so fulfil the law of God, by obeying the truth as it is in Christ Jesus our Lord; so that, when time and timely things all cease with us here on earth, we can meet in yonder bright world, is my prayer.

John G. Neher.

From Clover Creek Congregation.

The brethren of the above congregation, met on Christmas day, Dec. 25, and transacted the following business, in the way which the Brethren have adopted, or, in other words, according to the long established order of the Brethren. We proceeded to set apart, to serve as deacons, in our congregation, three brethren, which I will here name: David B. Burget, S. B. Furry, David Bechtel. We also advanced to the second degree in the ministry, brethren Jos. Snowberger and T. B. Maddock, and one who perhaps is not worthy to have his name mentioned, and therefore I will not mention it.

JAC. L. WINELAND.

REMARKS: As the brother seems to have a delicacy in mentioning the name of one of the brethren advanced, to avoid misapprehension, we here state that it was the writer—Jacob L. Wineland. If we were sure that our brethren would not regard it as imprudent, we would farther say that he is a worthy brother. May the Lord enable him to perform faithfully all the duties of his advanced position. B.

Correction.

In Vol. 8. page 294, 2d column, 10th line of the 2d paragraph, you make me say the child "was erying," instead of the child was dying. On On page 316, 306th line of my article you make me say, "good," instead of God. Same column, second line from bottom, read white we walk, instead of "will we," &c.,

Query.

If it be to the welfare of the COMPANION and its readers, I would love to hear the brethren on the parable in Matt. 20: 1—6.

Notes of Travel.

WM. H. BAILEY.

BROTHER HENRY: It is by request that I send you these few lines for publication. I left home on the 15th of October, stopped over night with brother E. Maffet, Fayette county. I enjoyed their kindness. Left next morning. Stopped over night with J. S. Montgomery, Cannelton. On the 17th resumed my journey. Stayed over night with Alfred West, near Charleston the Capital of W. Va., thence 15 miles to Upper Falls of Coal. Attended night meeting at Gray's school-house. Preaching by a Missionary Baptist Elder, from England. Text Matth. 7: 13, 14, a good text and a good sermon. After he had spoken two hours, he then insisted on me to say something; So I arose to try and carry out the discourse, which my friend had done so well with so far as he went. He spoke at length on baptism, and while baptism is very good in its place. I insisted that he had left one or two rounds out of the ladder, that were just as good in their place. namely, Feet-washing, and annointing the sick with oil. After briefly admonishing the congregation. I gave up the subject to the Elder, and I had to confess my surprise when the Elder arose and confessed that feet-washing was a commandment, and turning to me exhorted me to go on and preach and practice feet-washing; then he turned to the congregation and told them that it was right, and that he did wash his member's feet, but he did it by doing something else in place of it: said he offered sacrifice. He said the Savior had two objects in view: one was to teach humility, and the other was necessity; but, that there was no need now, as we wear boots and stockings, and keep ourselves clean. With this he stopped, and I confessed my astonishment at such disobedience, or, in other words, such King-Saul-like obedience. The meeting was then dismissed. An appointment was announced for 11 o'clock the next day, the 18th, for the writer, who then and there did use the capital he had gained the day before, to the edification of all present. And it was the request of some of the Elder's own members, that I should have his confession published. Meeting in the evening at sister Adkins'. I tried to preach, but owing to a pain in my head, I got in a trance and could not tell whether I said anything or not.

19th. Meeting a small congregation at Elizabeth, at 11 o'clock. My head was better and my mind free. Good attention. Home with brother P. A. Fisher. Spent the evening and night with his kind family.

20th. At 11 o'clock at Mt. Moriah; good attention. Evening meeting at Alford school-house.

21st and 22, meeting on Sand Fork, Lincoln Co., 2 days and nights. Spent both nights with brother Wm. Stoner's. Bade them farewell. Thence back to Putnam. Took dinner with brother Fisher. Thence to Samuel Winehimer's, Upper Falls Coal, spent the night with him. Thence to Cross Lanes; visited old sister Sloan; found her as well as common. Meeting in the evening, at Short School-house. Thence to Rose Valley. Meeting at 11 o'clock, and night also. Went to Charles D. Furguson's, a reader of the C. F. C. Spent the best part of the day with his kind family.—Thence to Brother Oliver Perry's, tarried all night with brother Perry. Thence to two-mile school-house, two miles below the State Capital. Congregation small, but attentive. Home with brother J. H. Starkey, to the city. Meeting next day at Lynn school-house, at 11, and at night. Thence to Charleston. Lodged with brother Starkey. Thence to A. West's. Meeting at two o'clock. The word spoken had its desired effect. Stayed with uncle West. Thence to Cabin Creek, 38 miles. Meeting two days, and as many as would, were baptized. Good attendance, and they gladly heard the word. Thence 36 miles home. Found all in common health. Thank the Lord for his kind care over me and] mine. Home, November 3rd. The brethren and friends, that so kinkly treated me, have my kindest regards. I was gone 25 days, and tried to preach 22 times. Brethren everywhere should be up and doing. The harvest is plenteous, but the laborers are few. W. H. BAILEY.

Condolence.

BOTHER HOLSINGER: You will find enclosed the copy of a letter, written for the consolation of us who have lately been bereft of a dear child. I send it to you that it may find room in the columns of your paper, if you please. Your brother in the Lord.

SAMUEL MYERS.

East Berlin, Pa.

Dear brother and sister: I received your letter in due time, bringing the sad news of the death of little Mary Ann. The stroke seems to be very severe and almost heartrending: according to the ties of nature it cannot be otherwise, as these little branches are very near and dear to the hearts of the parents. You say, "This is the fourth one that the Lord called home." I feel confident, that this last stroke was the severest, and will be the longest remembered, from the fact that Mary Ann seemed to be stout and hearty. You undoubtedly had a hope, and rejoiced in this, "although the other three are gone, we have one yet left." But oh! she is gone; that little form is lifeless; those bright little eyes, closed; those sweet little lips, cold; everything is quiet; her voice is silent, her footsteps are not heard; her little playthings are stored away. When night comes, you feel lonesome. You feel disappointed; your hopes and anticipations are annihilated. You might say, "Lord why is it?' Well, the Lord knows. He is righteous in all his ways. He dealeth justly with all his people. His wisdom far exceeds our wisdom: his ways are not our ways; his thoughts, not our thoughts. So, then, cheer up, and commit yourselves to the Lord with the full assurance that "he doeth all things well." David of old, when one of his children died, remarked, "But now he is dead; wherefore should I fast? Can I bring him back again? I shall go to him, but he shall not return to me;" 2 Samuel 12: 23. It is indeed a consolation, that we can go to our children, but they cannot return to us. They are, as it were, resting in the bosom of a dear Savior. The Savior is proclaiming to us, "Come, and I will give you rest." Our children are calling, "Papa, mamma, yes, do come," So I would say. Then let us try and be faithful, and hold fast to our profession. Our interest in heaven is becoming stronger. You have four children there, we have one there. We have a good reason to believe we have a dear mother there. If we continue in the faith, walk in the Spirit, sacrifice all for Christ, we can all meet there as a family in heaven. Your brother both in the flesh and in Christ.

JOHN MEERS.

Camden, Ills.

Brother Henry: I have obligated myself to do for you what I could and I tried to do so; I have six subscribers for you, including our own. I can recommend your C. F. C, and do believe that it contains as much as all the others taken together; and we hope that you will not fear "the gates of hell" prevailing against the true church, that has the apostles and prophets for its foundation, and Jesus Christ for its chief corner. "Gates of hell" is a metaphorical expression, representing counsels of men, that are placing yokes upon the disciples' necks, that our fathers and we were not able to bear; as much as to say, "We are not going to submit to having such yokes put upon the neck of the disciples; but we will hearken to the mighty Counseller—the prince of peace:" "Come unto me all ye that labor and are heavy laden." It is generally understood that unconverted sinners are the subjects; but this is an indirect application. He had reference to those that were laden and burdened with the traditons and commandments of men: "Come unto me, and learn of me: my yoke is easy, and my burden is light."

Brother Holsinger, we do believe that there are hundreds of disciples that are weary of the heavy yoke, and would much rather bear the easy yoke of Jesus; but they fear "the gates of hell" that are opposing the council of God.

We admit no poetry under any circumstances in connection with Obituary Notices. We wish to use all alike, and we could not insert verses with all.

In Antietam branch, on Christmas day, Quincy, Franklin county, Pa. our beloved sister SARAH BROWN, aged 75 years 4 months and 5 days. She was a very fine sister. She was never married. Her remains were buried at the Antietam meeting-house, on the 27th.

JACOB FRIEDLAY.

In Pine Creek congregation, Nov. 27th, 1872, brother JACOB THOMAS, buried the 29th, age 65 years, 10 months and 27 days. He leaves a wife and eight children, four sons and four daughters, all members of the church except the oldest and youngest; having twenty-eight grandchildren living, and one dead. Funeral improved by Eld. Abraham Whitmore, from Rev. 14: 12 13.

DAVID CLEM.

Died in the Conemaugh congregation, Cambria Co., Pa. on the 4th of Nov., 1872, sister MARGARET GOCHNOUR, wife of brother Stephen Gochnour, aged 33 years, 9 months and 16 days. Funeral sermon by the writer, assisted by brother David Hildebrand.

Also on the 17th of Nov., brother HENRY W. SMITH, (better known by some of your readers as the Indian Doctor,) aged almost 75 years. Funeral sermon by the same, assisted by brother Hiram Musselman, of Shade branch.

STEPHEN HILDEBRAND.

In the South Bend branch, St. Joseph Co., Ind, on the 13th of Dec., 1872, of typhoid pneumonia, ABRAHAM WHITMER, aged 66 years, 10 months and 1 day. His funeral which was largely attended, took place on, Sunday at the meeting-house on his farm. Services by Eld. D. B. Sturgis and others. He was born in Lancaster Co. Pa. At the age of 16 years, he came to Montgomery Co, O., and soon attached himself to the church. At the age of 23 he was married to Catharine Bowman, daughter of Eld. Jacob Bowman. They had eleven children, ten of whom survived him, six sons and four daughters, all members of the church, save one. Two of his sons are deacons, and D. M. is a minister in the second degree. In Sept mber, 1831, he, with the Bowman family, came from Ohio to St. Joseph Co., Ind., where he was soon appointed to the ministry, and helped to build up the church from its infancy. He faithfully discharged his duty; and for nearly 30 years served as an ordained elder. Thus the widowed sister, children, and church mourn their loss, but not without hope.

ELD. C. WENGER.

In the Shipswanee congregation, Lagrange Co., Ind., Nov. 17th, 1873, sister CHRISTIANA EVANS, wife of friend David Evans, and daughter of brother George, and sister Sarah Bender, aged, 28 years, 5 months and 18 days. Funeral discourse delivered to a large congregation, by brethren David M. Truby, and Henry Gephart, from the words, "Prepare to meet thy God," Amos, 4 : 12.

The subject of this notice was afflicted for about a year, seemingly, with that almost incurable disease, consumption. Last January she became alarmed about her soul's salvation, and accordingly, brother Gephart was sent for. He, assisted by brother Samuel Supold and others, conveyed her to the Water Side, where she was carried into the water, and baptized. Coming up, out of the water, she desired to see her father. He being apprised of the fact, obeyed the summons immediately, when she said to him, "Father, I do not expect to live long, and I would like to see you baptized before I go." Her father being overcome by her exhortation, was baptized the same hour, and I think were both made to rejoice in the God, of their salvation. Having been made "babes in Christ Jesus," were in a few days, privileged to surround the table of the Lord, and to partake of the emblems of his broken body, and shed blood; after which time she grew weaker and weaker, until the above named morning. It being Lord's day, a day of rest, and I thought, while standing by her bedside, that it was a day of more than ordinary rest to her, from the fact that when the sun, the bright luminary of the day, made its appearance in the East, the marks of death were visible in the countenance of our sister; and like the last rays of the setting sun, so departed our sister, shedding a mellow light over the scene. With this solemn fact before us, from the language of the text, take warning and be ready to 'meet our God."

The Christian Family Companion. Is published every Tuesday, at $1.50 a year, by Henry R. Holsinger, who is a member of the Church of the Brethren, sometimes known by the name of "German Baptists," and vulgarly or maliciously called "Dunkards."

The design of the work is to advocate truth, expose error, and encourage the true Christian on his way to Zion.

It assumes that the New Testament is the Will of God, and that no one can have the promise of salvation without observing all its requirements, that among these are Faith, Repentance, Prayer, Baptism by trine immersion, Feet Washing, the Lord's Supper, the Holy Communion, Charity, Nonconformity to the world, and a full resignation to the whole will of God, as he has revealed it through his Son Jesus Christ.

So much of the affairs of this world as may be thought necessary to the proper observance of the signs of the times, or such as may tend to the moral, mental, or physical benefit of the Christian will be published, thus removing all occasion for coming into contact with the so-called Literary or Political journals.

Subscriptions may begin at any time.

The Bridegroom Cometh.

BY J. S. FLORY.

Apart from parental affection we cannot conceive of an object in this life, more endearing to our hearts, or more worthy of our confidence and love, than the one to whom we have given our hearts, and are willing to give our hand, and are assured we have the highest and most sincere affection in return. To illustrate: That blooming maid has loved one, and in return is sincerely beloved. To her, there is no cup so sweet as that of silent and peaceful love; no dreams so pleasant as those that bring to her mind the object of her affections. No hopes so bright as those centered in her beloved. In the company of others she may be a little careless or inattentive, but in his society she is careful, attentive and happy. She looks forward to the day her lover is to meet her in the character of the bridegroom. She looks forward, not with fear, but with joy, and in her preparations, how careful every object of apparel is selected, with a studied aim to please. "I wonder how he and his company will like to see me in this? and if such and such will not make me more attractive in his eyes?" is the oft inquiry. Every thing that might possibly be offensive is avoided. The white dress is prepared with care, lest it be defiled; spotted with the dust of earth will not be allowable. The ornaments must be the best, brighest and nearest the purpose to suit the ideal of loveliness. The long looked for day arrives. It is announced: "The bridegroom cometh!" How does she meet him! She blushes, but ah! it is only a blush of pleasure. A slight tremor in her voice, but t'is the effect of joy. He claims her for his own, blushing bride—they are one. It is a happy union, full of earthly hopes and pleasures.

But we turn from this natural illustration of life, to a more endearing scene. But as it is a matter of faith as yet we are so slow to comprehend. But we know in this, as in other matters of a like nature, "Faith is the substance of things hoped for and the evidence of things not seen."

The children of God have one that is truly an idol of their highest and holiest affections. He is their beloved in the highest term of that endearing apellation. And oh! joy unspeakable, to know that he loves so dearly, so wonderfully. Never one loved as he loves. In the language of Solomon, the soul breaks forth in praise to him who is our love: "Behold thou art fair, my love; behold thou art fair; thou hast doves eyes. I am the rose of Sharon, and lilly of the valleys. As the lilly among the thorns, so is my love among the daughters. As the apple tree among the trees of the wood, so is my beloved among the sons. I sat down under his shadow with great delight, and his fruit was sweet to my taste. He brought me to the banqueting house, and his banner over me was love. His left hand is under my head, and his right hand doth embrace me. My beloved is white and ruddy; the chiefest among ten thousand. His head is as the most fine gold. His eyes as the eyes of doves by the rivers of waters. His cheeks are as a bed of spices as sweet flowers; his lips like lillies dropping sweet smelling myrrh. * * * His countenance is as Lebanon, exellent as the cedars; his mouth is most sweet, yea he is altogether lovely. This is my beloved and this is my friend, O daughters of Jerusalem."

Such is our love, he is indeed "altogether lovely." Oh! do we love him as we ought? He is soon coming as our Bridegroom. Are we making ready for his coming? We have in our illustration shown how it is with the children of this world; shall it be truly said in this matter "The children of this world are in their generation wiser than the children of light?" Shall we not love our beloved—the Lord of life and glory—with all our heart? Are our purest affections centered upon him? Do we think of him every day, and have sweet converse with him by night? Are we daily engaged in making such preparation that when he comes we shall be prepared to meet him in love and joy? Is it our dilligent study and labor to be so "clothed upon," that we shall be attractive to his eyes? Are our garments "white" and unspotted?

Are we careful that they be not defiled with things that are "earthly?" Have we on such ornaments that will please our beloved? Such as a meek and humble spirit, and the bright and shining jewels of all the christian graces? We say we love him, we make a show of worship and praise in honor of him whom we look for. If we should now hear the cry: "Behold the bridegroom cometh, go ye out to meet him" would we receive the message with joy and gladness? or would we quake and fear with shame, because our garments are "spotted" and our adornments such as are here put on to please the world instead of our beloved? To be found without oil in our vessels will be a sad deficiency indeed. The bridegroom shall enter with his wise bride—with those that are ready to meet him—and the foolish will come too late to enter in. Oh! then, as we know not "the hour," let us have our lamps in readiness and oil in our vessels, for we are not ashamed to have faith in his coming. Others may calculate, reason and mystify the promises of God; to this we will cling, "The Bridegroom is coming!" Oh! what a happy day to the church—what a joyous day for heaven and earth. But the wicked world shall wail and lament, knowing destruction is nigh. Happy day for any faithful, trusting, and ready child of God. With joy we shall meet the beloved of our soul. The marriage and holy reunion of Jesus and his saints! Oh, what a day of glory, honor and praise that shall be! The eternal heavens shall ring with loud hallelujahs to him that liveth forever and ever, the Alpha and Omega, the first and the last.

The Lord at the Door.

"Behold, I stand at the door and knock."—Rev. iii. 20.

Can any man consider these words, and not feel that he is dealing with a personal Savior, or rather that a personal Savior is dealing with him? "There standeth One among you whom ye know not." There is One knocking at your heart's door, and that one is Jesus!

But consider well how and in what aspect he comes. It is not here in the "Song of Solomon," where he stands lowly and weary at the closed door, his "head filled with dew, and his locks with the drops of the night." Such is the guise in which he is represented in a well known and exquisitely suggestive work of art; but such was not the vision of the apostle, nor the form in which He knocked at the door of Laodicea's lukewarm heart. Read the description in Rev. 1: 14—16, to see how the Lord appears when, for reproof, correction, comfort or chastening, He "walketh in the midst of the seven golden candlesticks."

He who stands at the door is the Lord! "Behold I stand!" We may behold him if we will look; we may hear him if we will listen; but whether we look and listen or not, we shall see him one day, for the time will come "when every eye shall see him, and they also who pierced him"—pierced him by refusing his calls of grace.

"The kingdom of God cometh not with observation," neither does the knocking at the door come with observation, though the King is there! It is for us to beware how we trifle with that sound; to beware lest we suffer the world's noises to fill our ear so as to overpower it; to beware how we mistake other voices for his call; to beware how we delay to open, and, in the cases of those around us for whom we are interested, it is for us to trust them prayerfully and hopefully with the Savior, believing that at their door, too, He will knock, whether we hear it or not, and anxious chiefly lest we should in any way prove a stumbling-block in their path.

Those whose faces are only seen, and whose voices are only heard in seasons of religious revivals, are like the flowers that bloom in the morning and fade in the evening without producing fruit. They are not the evergreens of the church.

For Teachers, Too.—Beecher compares a text to a gate opening in the Lord's garden, and says that many ministers, instead of unlatching the gate and leading hearers in to pluck the fruit and flowers, content themselves by getting upon it and swinging to and fro.

Let the teacher take hold of a text as a boy does of a bough of an apple-tree—grasp it firmly, and shake, and shake, until the golden pippins of truth fall about him.—Rev. S. J. Knapp.

Selected by SARAH E. ALLEN.

The Price of Truth.

Great truths are dearly brought. The common truth,
Such as men give and take from day to day,
Comes in the common walks of daily life,
Blown by the careless wind across our way;

Bought in the market at the current price,
Bred to the smile, the jest, perchance the bowl,
It tells no tales of daring or of worth,
Nor perceives e'en the surface of the soul.

Great truths are greatly won; nor formed by chance
Nor wafted on the breath of a summer dream;
But grasped in the great struggle of the soul,
Hard buffeting with adverse wind and stream.

Not in the general mart, 'mid corn and wine;
Not in the merchandise of gold and gems;
Not in the world's gay hall of midnight mirth;
Nor 'mid the blaze of regal diadems;

But in the day of conflict, fear and grief,
When the strange hand of God, put forth in might,
Plows up the subsoil of the stagnant heart,
And brings the imprisoned truth-seeds to the light.

Wrung from the troubled spirit in hard hours
Of weakness, solitude, perchance of pain,
Truth springs like harvest from the well-plowed field,
And the soul feels it has not wept in vain.

Christian Development.

BY F. M. SNYDER.

It seems not a little strange, that, in this enlightened age, there is so little Christian development. Too many try to "put on Christ," when there is nothing in them save presumption. Putting on airs and apparel will not make you a Christian. I don't like to see men or woman try to exhibit to a dying world a Christ-like appearance, by being over tasty or slovenly. I'm down on slouchy Christians. Your religion is as your appearance. Show me a neat, clean-hearted Christian, and I will love him; not because of his fancy necktie, or the charming manner in which he wears it, or because he wears a hat of the latest style, but I will love him on account of his loveliness. I believe in attraction, and love beauty. So did our Savior. He spake of the fair lillies, and of the bright-plumed birds, as thought he were ready to think of them with delighted interest, and have us to become pure like unto them. Would you become pure and full of virtue, you must become Christ-like. Christian development will then necessarily follow; for if you possess Christianity, you cannot hide it. True the Bible speaks of "a hidden light;" but it is a light that illuminates not; hence it is little better than no light at all. Some persons do light a candle and "put it under a bushel," but they are not Christians. If they were; if, indeed, they had "put on Christ," and have his love shed abroad in their hearts, they would, as an illuminated light, lighten up the dark places of the earth, as do the stars of the firmament. Therefore to develop your christianity is the most easy matter imaginable, if you are a Christian indeed. The sun shines because there is brightness in it. Thus we might speak of the Christian. He is one of this world's bright stars, secondary in illumination to the Star of Bethlehem itself. For such an one, while in this state of holiness, to exhibit a Christless character, is a matter of utter impossibility. A few, however, will find exceptions here. They are ready to admit that the sinner must exhibit a sinful life, but, like a certian Parisian lady of renown, who understood perfectly well the use of the moon, because it i luminates our nights, but did not understand the use of the sun, because it appeared in the heavens at mid-day, they cannot tell why the experimental christian must necessarily exhibit a life of practical christianity. By being wrongfully taught, they are made to believe that a man may have experimental religion and develop at the same time a life contrary to the spirit of divine truth.

The Book of Doctrine.

While our elder, brother John Zug, was with us on a visit one day, we were talking of different subjects. At last, in speaking of baptism, he said it always was his belief, and more so, as he is growing old, that, if one reads the New Testament prayerfully, and with an upright heart to do the will of God, having no one to lead him astray from the simplicity of the gospel, he will be sure to come out right in the end; an example of which he related, that took place in the younger years of his ministry. He said, he, in company with brother John Pfatuz, and others, of Lancaster county, were at brother Steneg's, south of the city of Lancaster, where he had a meeting, being about thirty-five miles from home. While there, a strange, middle-aged woman and her son came there from the neighborhood of Havre de Grace, about ten miles further south. After being there awhile, she told sister Steneg, that she would like to speak with the minister. Brother John was accordingly called, and he asked her what she wished of him. She commenced and said, "I am a widow; my husband died about five years ago; I had a large family of children depending on me for support. This, as you may believe, caused much sorrow and grief. I commenced praying to God to aid me in my afflictions, and, after praying awhile, I felt more contented and happy. I then read the New Testament, and thought I understood everything better; and, among others, I learned that we are to be baptized on our faith; and having heard by chance that people have meeting here, who babtize in the water, I came up, and if you think me worthy, I should be glad to be baptized to-day." Brother John asked her, "How do you think baptism is taught in the New Testament?" She answered, "I read that Jesus was baptized in Jordan, and came up out of the water; that John baptized near Aenon, because there was much water there; also, that Jesus commanded to be baptized in the 'name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost.' I therefore think it should be by trine immersion." Brother John said, "Now, woman, be honest. Did any one tell you of our mode of baptism, or did you hear any of the brethren preach?" She said, "No, I learned it in the New Testament."

She had also learned feet-washing, and the communion, and after a little instruction the Lord's supper. It is needless to say that she was baptized, and went to her home, no doubt, as the eunuch, rejoicing on her way. Brother John said that this greatly strengthened him in the ministry, to see a living witness, who learned the true doctrine out of that inspired book alone, and, no doubt, he, too, went on his way rejoicing. He never saw her again, but heard that she died shortly afterwards, and hopes to meet her again on the sunny shores of everlasting peace.

CYRUS BUCHER.

"Ask for the Old Paths."

Where are the paths our fathers trod,
Like men of courage bold?
They lived by faith, and walked with God,
As Enoch did of old:
As priests to God, like Aaron, they Were called from above,
To bear to men without delay,
God's messages of love.

Ah! woe is me, they each one say,
If I refuse the call;
I freely give myself away,
To Him who died for all.
My home is sweet, my friends are dear,
With them I fain would dwell—
But dearer still do souls appear,
So home and friends farewell.

Silver nor gold ne'er called them forth,
Nor stopped them on the way;
They preached to men Christ's precious Truth,
And looked to him for pay:
The love of Christ, a mighty cord,
Constrained them night and day:
To cry "behold the Lamb of God,
That taketh sin away."

They had no creeds to yoke the meek,
Nor notes to preach by rule;
They did not stop to study Greek,
Or go to priestly schools.
They learned the gospel from their King,
And ran where they were sent;
Trusting in God for everything,
Like flames of fire they went.

O're hills and vales, through storms and calms,
They ranged the country through;
Feeling that naught could do them harm,
If they are good and true.
They preached to men enthralled,
To flee from death and woe;
God gave the sign that they were called,
Wherever they did go.

They saw the power of God displayed.
And hundreds bow the knee;
They were opposed, but not dismayed,
And sought for liberty.
No high nor low were in ther ranks,
But all of one degree;
E'er praising God and joining thanks,
For love and unity.

The above hymn was clipped by Eld. John Dennis of Maine, from the Rising Sun and pasted on the inside of the lids of his Hymn Book, and therefrom copied for the C. F. C. by D. M. Holsinger.

Prayers.

The Bible is abounding with exceeding great and precious promises to all who pray. Hear the following: "Every one that asketh, receiveth." But what will they receive? "All things whatsoever ye shall ask in prayer, believing." Read carefully the parables of the friend at midnight, and the importunate widow; Luke 11: 5—8; 18: 1—8. "The effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much." If these, and a host of other passages, do not give encouragement to all to pray, words certainly can have no meaning.

Prayer is one of the most simple acts of the Christian religion; and yet it is not natural for man to pray; "for the carnal mind is enmity against God." The imagination of a man's heart is evil from his youth." Ever since man sinned, his desire is to hide from God, and to have nothing to do with him. It is one of the characteristics of the wicked, that they call not on God. And although God withdrew his glory from man, his Spirit is yet striving, and, if not quenched, will not only convince us of our sins, but will also assist us to call upon the Lord, like Saul of Tarsus.

It is one of the first acts of the child of God, to call upon the Lord. "Behold he prayeth," may be said of the sinner who desires to be delivered from sin; but when once born of God, prayer is as indispensable to him as breath to the new born infant. "Prayer is the Christian's vital breath;" Therefore "men ought always to pray."

According to Paul we are to "pray everywhere." Examine the history of the saints of God, whether in or out of the Bible, and you will most assuredly find that they prayed effectually and fervently. There are wonderful examples in the Bible, where God answered the prayers of his people. God did not cease giving, until Abraham ceased praying for Sodom. God delivered the Hebrews from bondage in answer to prayer. He divided the Red Sea. He gave them water from the rock, and bread from heaven. The prayer of faith won the victory over the fire in the furnace; the lions in their dens; the destruction of the army of Sennacherib. It has healed the sick; it has raised the dead. But blessed be God, it has been answered to the conversion of thousands of souls. It brought the Holy Spirit on the Pentecostians. Nothing seems to be too great, too hard, or too difficult for prayer to do. It has secured things that seemed to be impossible.

I have often remarked, that there is not another duty, or act of man, that is more profitable and necessary than prayer. The readers of the Companion need not wonder when they find it often dwelt on in the columns of the paper; for if it should be found in every number, it would do but what the Bible teaches, by the record of examples of prayer, or commands to pray.

If we put no fuel on the fire, it will soon die. Cease to receive food for the body and it will soon grow weak, and die. So with the soul: if it lives without prayer, it is neglecting that which will bring every blessing from above, and soon it will grow weak, and finally die. Christ knew the great need of spiritual food for the soul: therefore he exhorts us to daily entreat God for it: "Give us this day our daily bread."

As there is so much importance attached to prayer by God, the holy prophets, Christ, and the apostles; and as such mighty achievements have been accomplished by prayer, one would naturally inquire, when, where, and how am I to pray? Christ tell us when; namely, "always." Paul tells where; namely, "everywhere."

But how are we to reconcile the words of Paul where he says, "I will that men pray everwhere," with those of Christ when he says, "When thou prayest, enter thy closet, and when thou hast shut thy door, pray to thy Father which is in secret; and thy Father which seeth in secret, shall reward thee openly?" The majority of writers—to say nothing of speakers—contend that Christ here taught us to go to some private room, or retired place of secrecy, when we pray. If this were indeed so, the two passages would conflict; for Christ gives this rule of prayer without any limitation. Christ would have us to pray only at a certain place, and Paul everywhere. Nor would Christ's words in this passage agree with other expressions of his; as, "My house shall be called the house of prayer," &c. Christ evidently referred to the manner, or spirit of prayer, when he gave the above rule, as I will further explain.

How are we to pray? in what manner? With what spirit! First of all, I will remark on this part of the subject, that to pray with the spirit of disobedience is an abomination before God: "He that turneth away his ear from hearing the law, even his prayer shall be an abomination." "Why call ye me Lord, Lord, and do not the things which I command you?" But farther, I would remark that, if we were to pretend to pray to God for the purpose of being seen by man, we would also pray to our condemnation. This is what Christ condemned in the Pharisees. Experience has taught me the necessity of being guarded against this fault; and while I have improved on this point, yet I feel that it is necessary to do as Christ told us, namely, "watch and pray." Observation and the Bible convinced me long ago, that I have not been the only one who needed reformation in this. Brethren, bear with me if I dwell on this part of the subject; for Christ did the same, and he certainly knew that it was necessary. He knew the hearts of men, and he said, "This people draweth nigh unto me with their mouth, and honoreth me with their lips; but their heart is far from me." James was giving warning as well as instruction on this subject, when he said, "Draw nigh to God, and he will draw nigh unto you." We can do no better, than to do as Christ told us; that is, enter into our closet and shut our door. Our bodies are the temples of the Holy Spirit. Paul calls them "earthly houses." A closet is a room for retirement, or privacy, where all are excluded but the party who enter there for private business. So Christ looks upon our body as a dwelling-place for the soul, and this heart as the secret place, or place of retirement. Now as all Christians have been betrothed unto Christ, he claims the right, as our bosom friend, to withdraw from the world with our mind into our closet, or heart, and hold communion with our mind, the living and immortal principal. Christ desires our hearts; he desires our affections; and in our prayer to him, he would have us first to withdraw from all worldly things; namely, all treasures, glories, and honors of this world. Yea, not only to enter our closet, but also to shut our door so that these things cannot enter during our prayer, and then and there get our affections on heavenly things.

Some contend that Christ condemned long prayers, and those offered in conspicuous or public places; but by a careful examination of the subject we learn that he only condemned long ones, when offered "for a pretense;" and those offered in conspicuous places, when offered "that they may be be seen of men." I would not be understood to oppose secret prayer, but, to the contrary, I would encourage it. We will never find a prosperous Christian, or a fruitful branch of the Vine, where this duty is neglected.

One theme of the subject I will yet notice, and then withdraw for the present. We have the assurance of receiving whatever we ask for, if we ask in faith: (Who can doubt?) but if any one should doubt, "let not that man think that he shall receive anything from the Lord." But we must have the obedient spirit already referred to: that is, to use all the things that we pray for as God commands us; for James says, "Ye ask, and receive not, because ye ask amiss, that ye may consume it upon your lusts." "Watch and pray, that ye enter not into temptation."

License or No License.

To my dear Brethren in the state of Pennsylvania: Whereas intemperance is one of the greatest evils of the day, and an evil like many others, that is growing; and, whereas, the Legislature of our state, on the 27th of March 1872, passed an act, that, on the third Friday of March, 1873, it shall be left to the people, and so every third year, to say, by their votes, whether license shall be given or not, in a county or city, as this is no political question, but one deciding what is best for the human family, or our fellowmen, would it not be advisable, therefore, for every brother to think seriously upon this matter? And, if we could feel satisfied from the Scriptures that it is wrong to make drunkards, and as we are to use our influence for good, and on the side of right, would we not be doing good by going to the polls and casting our vote NO LICENSE?

Perhaps some of my dear brethren may think brother Miller is a Politician. No, not so; I think I have not voted for twenty-eight years, and have no great desire to vote on any subject that pertains to this world; but if I should be spared until the time, and go, and say by my vote, "No License," would I not do good and throw my influence on the side of virtue and holiness?

I am aware that some will say, "We ought to be tempted in everything." I agree in this; but our Legislature grants us the privilege in a few simple words to say what we think is best for the people.

From where I am writing, I can count eight taverns inside of two miles, besides a number of saloons, &c., and how many drunkards I cannot say. But whilst I am writing, I am seriously thinking about some of my dear sisters in Christ, whose husbands are drunkards, and who had to see them come, home reeling, and not looking in any way lovely. Well, how did they become drunkards? Why, just beginning on a small scale, first taking a little dram, and only one at a time; but the thing grew.

Sometimes we hear brethren say, "A dram will hurt no one." I am sorry to hear such sayings. I knew an old man some thirty-five years ago, who used to say, "A dram will hurt no one;" but, sad to tell, he did not stop at one; and in consequence he sold his beautiful farm, went west, became poor, died, and, as much as I know, is filling a drunkards grave. Some twenty years ago, I went from home a few miles on business, and on my return, I passed a cottage, where lived a poor family, the man a lover of strong drink. As I was about even with the house, a lad, some ten or twelve years old, stopped me, saying, "Man, please come in, father came home drunk last night, and is abusing mother all morning." I hastily dismounted and hitched my "critter;" and as I walked around the shanty to enter, a voice seemed to say, "Take care when you go in where the man is drunk, and man and wife are fighting." But I entered. Here, in one corner, was the bed upon which lay the man, with a stick in his hand. The wife a cripple, in an opposite corner on a chair, sprang up and made for the stick, which was about three feet long and some three-fourths inches thick. This she broke into three pieces, swearing, he should not hit it across her back any more. This he denied, whilst she affirmed. Some of the children, were in. I called a boy on the witness-stand, asking him if his father struck his mother. This was rather hard for the lad. Eyeing his father, then me, finally he nodded, which meant, "Yes, he struck her." The poor crippled woman said she had to work hard, and sometimes had scarcely enough to live; crying and fretting, saying, "He came home last night drunk, and was still drinking through the night." And what caused the fight was, the vessel was ready and the boy was to go and bring more. (One dram would not do any more). This the mother would not allow. Oh! the tears of the poor woman and children? I felt that if I had the power, I would drain every grog-shop; thinking, "This is one family of the many that are suffering in this way; and, if the tears were all brought together that are shed in this way, or through intemperance, it would make, perhaps, not a little stream.

But, my brethren have minds to think for themselves. I only wish "to stir up your pure minds;" and oh! that our minds may be right pure on the subject, and not be made impure by anything like self-interest or party politics. Let us simply labor for the good of the souls of the children of men and the glory of God. I belong to no fraternity or society, but that which Jesus Christ has established. Here I find temperance, benevolence, or charity, and all that is necessary for salvation. But though the grog-shops do not hurt me, I see they hurt my neighbors; and as charity seeketh not her own, but another's good, I simply ask my brethren, which will be best for us—to go and say "No LICENSE," or stay at home and say, "We are temperate." It would not do to say, "We are Christians," and stay at home, and not use our influence on others. With my love to the church, and my well wishes to the cause of Christ, I am fraternally yours.

Peace.

"For they shall be called the children of God."

"Peace" is a very short word; yet it comprehends a great deal. We believe it to be the duty of all Christian people to strive to keep peace in the country where they live, and especially in the church wherein they reside.

In COMPANION Vol. 8, page 715, brother Henry said, that if, during the coming year, the peace principle does not operate more profitably, we shall again adopt the principle of our Savior; "I am not come to send peace, but a sword." By reading on two or three verses farther in the record of Matthew, we understand what our Savior had reference to, and we can also see the effects of it in a great many households. If brother Henry intends to send that kind of peace through the C. F. C., I agree with him; but if he intends that its columns should be open to all kinds of controversy that some feel disposed to engage in on the account of their different opinions on different subjects, I cannot agree with him. Here let me offer a few reasons.

Paul says, "Let us reason together." If we use reason, in its true sense, we will not use harsh and unbecoming language toward each other. He too gives us to understand what shall befall the contentious: "How beautiful are the feet of them that preach the gospel of peace." To the Corinthian brethren he says, "Be of one mind, live in peace; and the God of love and peace be with you."

He also tells them that "God is not the author of confusion, but of peace, as in all churches of the saints."—Let us now hear what the heavenly hosts said, when the angels proclaimed the glorious news of the birth of our Savior, to the shepherds, whilst watching over their flocks: "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will toward men." Yes, glorious news, indeed, that there was to be peace and good will amongst the inhabitants of this earth. The apostle James says, "The fruit of righteousness is sown in peace of them that make peace." Brother Henry believes that we have entered an age of the world that there is no peace. I am almost persuaded to believe that in this he has told a sad truth. If it be so, who shall be able to restore this forsaken peace? I shall leave it in the hands of the true shepherds, that are keeping watch over their little flocks, to answer.

Sometimes for a little worldly gain, or for the intent of getting even with some one or other, as the old saying is, the ill will of those persons with whom we have been dealing; and those uncalled for acts, may follow us to the silent graves.

Brethren, we should be very careful how we offend; for God has said in unmistakable language, that we shall not render evil for evil; but that we should strive to live in peace with all men, and more especially with them of the house of God.

Let us learn the wisdom from above, which is first pure, then peaceable, and easy to be entreated. We that are alive, and enjoying health, can draw but a faint idea of the felicity of mind that dying Christians enjoy, when conscious of the fact that they are about to leave the world in peace, and in peace be received of God their Heavenly Father in the mansions of eternal bliss.

When our divine Master knew that his time had come, and that he should soon be called from amongst his beloved disciples, he talked very kindly to them, to cheer their drooping spirits; for they were very sad to think that they must be deprived of so dear a friend. But he says to them, "Peace I leave with you, my peace I give unto you."

In conclusion, let me ask of our brethren and sisters who are able to contribute to the pages of the COMPANION, to labor for the truth as it is in Christ Jesus, that we, the pursuers, may journey on together, side by side in the narrow way that will lead us to a peaceful home beyond the grave.

The Missionary Cause, and Fulfilling the Commission.

"Go ye therefore and teach all nations." Matthew 28: 19.

This subject is somewhat touchy in its nature, and I feel a delicacy in attempting to write about it; but being impressed with it for a long time, and finding a great many who don't appear to know where the fault lies that the cause is not more advanced, I will try to drop a communication through the COMPANION: and if it does not coincide with all the brethren and sister's views, we hope they will cast in their mite too, and thereby give more light on the subject, and devise plans to carry it out successfully.

We find some who think the work rests upon the ministry—that the ministers should go and preach the gospel in the neglected parts of this moral vineyard. Others think the fault is with the laity—that the members should pay their ministers and send them to preach the word. And, again, there are a great many who are quite unconscious about such a thing as a "Missionary cause," and about their fellowmen, and appear to think, "If it is well with us, it is well with all men; and if they want to come to the knowledge of the truth, the Lord will direct them in the right way; 'for whosoever shall call upon the name of the Lord shall be saved." Rom. 10: 13. But such we must ask "How shall they call on him in whom they have not believed? and how shall they believe in him of whom they have not heard? and how shall they hear without a preacher?" Rom. 10: 14. "So then, faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word of God." Rom. 18: 17. And the ministers may ask "How shall we preach except we be sent?" We will here say we believe it is not altogether the fault of the ministry, nor the laity, that the missionary cause is so much retarded; but it is the fault of both the ministry and laity.

As the duty of a father of a family to instruct, admonish and warn his his children, rather than to be instructed by them, even so it is more fitting and becoming for ministers to instruct the laity; because they stand in the same relation to each other as a father and his children.

Therefore, we would say, let ministers put the laity in remembrance of this subject; let them preach it and tell the members that we cannot live to ourselves only, but that we must live one for another. If we wish to get to heaven, we should try to get as many more there as we can; for this was the mind of Christ; and if we want to be followers of him, we should also have this mind in us. I think if the laity were rightly impressed with this subject, it would not be so hard to act upon it.

Let us look around us, and see what others have done in that direction. They store away thousands and tens of thousands of dollars for this purpose; build church edifices that cost from $3,000 to $50,000, and still have money left. We need not be so extravagant as they in building, and could have more to spare for the real purpose. We need not even go to a foreign country; but we can find work plenty, for a while, at home in the neglected parts of our church territories. I know it to be the case, that at places where the church has existed, flourished for fifty and more years, and not twenty miles distant the inhabitants have never as much as once heard our people preach. Our religion appears to be hid under a "bushel" for fear men should get to see it and be converted. I would suggest that we make a move to devise a plan by which we may more enlarge the borders of Zion. My plan would be, first, to visit the neglected parts of our church-territories, and make known the glad tidings of salvation to all around us. This I think could be done with but a trifling expense to any one. To accomplish this, let each branch of the Church have its Mission Fund. Then let the ministers see around, and find out whether there are not some places in their district, or branch, where the Brethren have not yet preached. Every bishop knows how far his territory extends; and if he knows of places in its bounds where there is no preaching of the Brethren, he ought to see that there be a move made in that direction.

Then there might be a general mission fund of each state district, or of the whole church, which might be used and distributed in places where the home mission would be unable to do all the work, or, as necessity would demand, to send general missionaries to preach in places where our doctrine is not known, as in the states of New York and Canada, &c.

As we have school-houses and halls throughout the land, they would be a great help to us; for we could get them opened almost anywhere, if we would pay for them, which we should. We should not owe nor impose on any one, and by the aid of the mission fund we would at all times be able to pay a fee for such houses, defray expenses of travelling ministers if it be at a distance from home. In this way we would, perhaps, soon find some who would extend invitations, and entertain those who come among them to preach; and so the way would be speedily opened; and if their efforts would be in vain, they could stop off after a fair trial, and our skirts would be clear.

This is part of my idea; and I think if each individual congregation would try this plan, we soon could bring quite a number to become obedient to the will of their heavenly Master; and those congregations who perhaps have no unoccupied territory, could help those who have, and who would otherwise perhaps have more to do than they would be able. The church branches need not reign as monarchs, and wield a despotic sway over each other, and not allow others of adjoining branches to come and preach in unoccupied places in their territory.

The question might here be asked, "Whom shall we send to preach in such places? We have none to spare; we have an appointment for every Sunday, and we are unable to fill any more appointments." By the rule by which we are governed, to send by two's and three's, we have quite a lack in the ministry. We venture to say, that we could, at least in some places, use double the number of ministers that we now have. And here, we think, we mistake somewhat, and oftimes in this way a babe in the ministry is compelled to do a man's work This is hardly rational. And not only this, but the ministers are bound down to their posts so that they are hardly able to make a visit to a neighboring congregation, on this account, which visits, we think, are always more or less profitable and encouraging to the ministry and the laity. Of course, if we do nothing at the missionary cause, we have ministers enough; but even then, it would not be amiss to have more, if they would work together in union and love. They need not all speak at the same meeting; let those who have a revelation speak, and let the others keep silent and be edified by hearing the others speak. Then the brethren would not need feel so reluctant to rise, or offer an apology when they get up to speak; if they would be at a loss to speak, they could keep their seats. My article is becoming very lengthy, and perhaps wearisome, so I will try to close for the present, hoping others will cast in their mite too; and thereby enlighten each other. This was in one respect, what caused me to write. Hope none may be offended. "Let us journey hand in hand, ever striving for the Master; until we reach the blissful shore, where joys and peace will ever reign."

Annointing the Sick with Oil in the Name of the Lord.

This is a performance which has become almost extinct in this our days; and oh! what a pity, seeing that it is connected with such great promises! The apostle James, Chapter 5: 14, 15, verses tells us, "Is any sick among you, let him call for the elders of the church, and let them pray over him, annointing him with oil in the name of the Lord; and the prayer of faith shall save the sick: and the Lord shall raise him up; and if he have committed sins, they shall be forgiven him." I was in conversation with a member of the Lutheran Church. He quoted this passage of the apostle James, and said, "It is a command, but we do not practice it in our church; do you?" I told him that we do; but all those who desire to have this holy work performed upon them ought to be perfectly reconciled unto the will of God particularly in regard to their recovery from a bed of affliction. I also told him that we do not baptize any, except they are willing, and believe that Jesus Christ is the Son of God, and it is the bounden duty of the children of God to visit the sick, and administer to their relief as far as lieth in their power; and it is the privilege of the sick, then to call or send for the elders of the church: and if it is their desire to be annointed with oil, let two of the elders, in the fear of the Almighty God perform this holy work, by applying oil to the head of the sick, in the name of the Lord.

A few years ago, I was along with two of our elders, by a bedside of a beloved brother, where this holy work was performed. A few Sundays after that, being at meeting where this was talked over, a brother, now a minister, said he never knew that this was practised among the Brethren. Why do not the Brethren preach more upon this important subject? When our good Lord sent the seventy disciples it was a part of their commission to perform this holy work as we can read in Mark 4: 13: and they cast out many devils, and annointed with oil many sick, and healed them.

God asks no impossibilities. When your will is yielded to do just what he bids you, trusting Him for all consequences, you are where the Holy Spirit will guide and empower you to take the leap of faith into the Savior's arms. You are utterly helpless as to purchasing or winning salvation, but this one thing you can do—that is yield yourself to trust just what God tells you in His Word. The result is sure. Commit yourself universedly to Him.

Suavity of Manner.

BY J. E. M'C.

The highest popularity which men have attained in the various walks of life has not arisen from their great talents, or wealth, or position, or even their great goodness, half as much as from their infinite tact in address and suavity in manners. When this is possessed, the power of the person over his fellows becomes almost unlimited. It is this that has caused many of our political men to distance far abler competitors. Every man with whom they spoke, whose hand they took but an instant, acknowledged their magic power, and became, from that moment, a friend and ally.

It was this which gave Aaron Burr his great success as a politician, and his wonderful power for evil in society. Talleyrand owed to it the power which made him a leader in the days of the first Napoleon; and so did Marlborough in the days of Queen Anne.

There are persons who affect to despise this quality in others; who point you to worthless men who possess it as a proof that it is beneath the attention of the wise and good. As well might one despise a graft of the choicest fruit because it grew on a worthless tree. This suavity of manner is a Christian grace which every one is in duty bound to cultivate. With some it is a great deal harder than others; but there is no one who, with the grace of Christ, cannot so master himself as to be civil and courteous toward others. No one has a right to conduct himself with a bear's gruffness, whatever his natural talents in that direction may be.

If you wish to succeed in life, this suavity of manner must become habitual to you. Not even the lowliest must be treated with coldness or rudeness. A man's fortune has often depended on the casting vote of the lowest men in his circle of acquaintances. We can never foresee when the good will of the humblest may serve us.

But there is something higher to live for than self-interest. If we would do good to men, we must be courteous toward them. The heart is the mainspring. If its sympathies are quick and warm, this suavity of manner will be no affectation.

Let us cultivate this talent to its highest extent, whatever age we may be, and however firmly fixed may be our old habits. But let us especially influence the young to begin right, and from the very cradle cultivate their sweet graces, which will render them lovely and beloved through life.

Only A Careless Mood.—Two persons meet after an ordinary day's activity. Each, unknown to the other, has met a series of annoyances, irritating circumstances, unkindnesses—and so, coming home, can brook no rude approach, no ungentle touch; the pent-up constraint and self-control of the day seeks to revenge itself. A little careless, selfish word is uttered with no unkind intent—but the oversensitive listener misunderstands it; it sounds cruel and is inexcusable in its bluntness, still it would not have been ordinarily noticed; but there was no healthy equanimity to meet it, only tired nerves and depression. The result is a painful division, an unaccountable coldness; each feels some apology or explanation due him. At length by struggling it comes; but how sore have been the hearts of these true and tried friends!

The only sensible and right thing to do, at such times, is to take rest before hardly trusting one's self to speak or be spoken to.

Selfishness vs. Charity.

The two spirits, Selfishness and Charity, are strangely associated in life. Side by side they walk in contrast. One ever disseminating, the other ever absorbing. One demanding of others, the other granting of itself. Selfishness claims the world owes him a living; Charity believes he owes a life to the world. The one is jealous of his good name, desiring a reputation he does not deserve, while the other, meriting applause, shuns the praise of an unstable public. The one is resentful of real or supposed injuries while the other "suffereth long and is kind." Selfishness claims services and gifts and deference, and when denied moans, "Why am I defrauded of my due?" Charity is full of thankfulness for blessings possessed, claiming but one thing—that its gifts may not be despised, that they may be appreciated and be fruitful of much good. Human nature desires returns for investments; this is a motive power—Charity is human, therefore he desires to see his efforts productive; he desires also to see others using their latent powers. These desires he does not always obtain, for Selfishness, languishing in miserable discontent, is ever defrauding Charity. Selfishness has a thousand excuses from service, and so shirks his responsibilities upon Charity. He claims to be too tired, or too weak, or too incapable, or too hurried, or too refined, or too burdened to perform disagreeable duties. So Selfishness is often the "hen with one chick," and Charity, with a dozen chicks, must care for some other one's brood.

Thus it goes, burdens are unequally borne. The generous become the victims of imposition; but they should not, therefore, fail in courage, but ever remember that they are richer in their loss than the selfish in their gain.

But who are the selfish? Is there one in the world who is selfish—in his own eyes? If we may not we may know the selfish about us by their fruits. No man who sits with his fourth newspaper, and sees a slender woman—even a servant—carry a burden so heavy that it nearly doubles her sideways, can be unselfish.

"See ourself's as others see us,"

No able woman, who habitually allows a wearied husband, or father, or brother, to return to an untidy home, and a late, unpalatable meal, can be unselfish. No man who receives a well-meant kindness unthankfully can be unselfish. No one who is careless of the discomfort of others, who never dresses well, nor arranges a room, nor beautifies the grounds surrounding the house, nor does one or more of the thousand nameless little acts that gratify the tastes, or refresh and gladden the hearts of others—no one who scorns these things can be quite unselfish.

He who has never a smile nor a tear, nor an impulse of kindness toward others, is unfit to live.

Happy are families when the government of parents is the reign of affection, and the obedience of the children the submission of love.

No man deserves to be praised for his goodness unless he has strength of character to be wicked.—La Rochefoucauld.

The Accumulation of Wealth.

An equal diffusion of riches, through any country, ever constitutes its happiness. Great wealth, in the possession of one, stagnates; and extreme poverty, with another, keeps him in unambitious indigence; but the moderately rich are usually active; not too far removed from poverty to fear its calamities, nor too near extreme wealth to slacken the nerve of labor; they remain still between both in a state of continual fluctuation. How impolitic, therefore, are those laws which promote the accumulation of wealth among the the rich—more impolitic still in attempting to increase the depression of poverty. Bacon, the English philosopher, compares money to manure; if gathered in heaps (he says) it does no good; on the contray, it becomes offensive; but being spread, though ever so thinly, over the surface of the earth, it enriches the whole country. Thus the wealth a nation possesses must expatiate, or it is of no benefit to the public; it becomes rather a grievance, where matrimonial laws thus confine it to a few.—Ex.

False Shame.—The false shame which fears to be detected in honest manual employment; which shrinks from exposing to the world a necessary and honorable economy; which blushes more deeply tor a shabby attire than for a mean action; and which dreads the sneer of the world more than the upraiding of conscience—this false shame will prove the ruin of everyone who suffers it to influence his thoughts and life.

Small Matters.—The nerve of the tooth, not so large as the finest cambric needle, will sometimes drive a strong man to distraction. A mosquito can make an elephant absolutely mad. A coral rock, which causes a navy to founder, is the work of worms. The warrior that withstood death in a thousand forms may be killed by an insect. The pettiest wretchedness often results from deep trials. A chance look from those we love often produce exquisite pain or unalloyed pleasure,

Leave nothing that is necessary in any matter undone—we rate ability in men by what they finish, not by what they attempt.

Biographical.

Habits of Literary Men.—John Calvin commenced his daily studies at five or six in the morning, reading and writing in bed for hours together If business required him to go out, he would rise and dress, but on his return, again went to bed. As he advanced in years, he wrote little with his own hand, but dictated to secretaries rarely having occasion to make any corrections. Sometimes his faculty of composition would fail, then he would quit his bed, attend to his outdoor duties for days, weeks, and even months together, and not think of writing until he felt the power had returned. Then he would go to bed, send for secretary, and resume his labors. The great Cardinal Richelieu, who was a dramatist as well as a prime-minister of France, usually went to bed at eleven, slept three hours, would rise and write till eight in the morning, now and then amusing himself by playing with his cats, of which he was very fond. Duffon, the naturalist, rose early, and worked perpetually. His great "Studies of Nature" cost him fifty years of labor, and he recopied it eighteen times before he sent it to the printers. He composed in a singular manner, writing on large-sized paper, on which, as in a ledger, five distinct columns were ruled. In the first column he wrote down the first thought; in the second he corrected, enlarged, and pruned it; and so on, until he had reached the fifth column, within which he finally wrote the result of his labor. But even after this, he would recompose a sentence twenty times, and once devoted fourteen hours to find the proper word with which to round off a period. Cuvier, who raised comparative anatomy to a science, never had occasion to copy his manuscript. He composed very rapidly, the proper words falling into the proper place, and everything being arranged in his mind in a very orderly manner. Bossuet, the French divine, who left fifty volumes of his own manuscripts, rose at four, wrapped himself up in a loose dress of bear-skin, and wrote until, from sheer fatigue, his hand refused to hold the pen. Then he would return to bed, take a sleep of exhaustion, and, on awaking, go through the same process again.—Appletons' Journal.

Christian Labor.

The first sentence in the Bible predicates the necessity of labor, to material existence: "God created the heaven and the earth;" and Jehovah was the first laborer. Six days he labored in laying the foundation and rearing up the universe. On the seventh day he rested from all his work which he had made. He rested, implying a cessation from toil. And labor is impressed upon man in the first chapter of the same book: "Be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth, and subdue it." To subdue the earth required labor. It is sometimes argued that sin created the necessity of work, but we have already proven that to be a mistake. In fact the advantages and benefits resulting from physical and mental labor, and which can only be enjoyed be the exercise of our own powers and faculties, is as necessary to our pleasurable existence, as the motion of the earth itself. The development of muscle of the body, and of every faculty of the mind, gives scope to our powers of enjoyment. We have feet to convey us, and we need the labor of those limbs to transport us to the various placed that will afford us enjoyment. We have hands, and the exercise of those parts are indispensible, to administer to our comfort. It is labor that adorns and beautifies the earth, and makes it a place desirable for man to dwell in. Without it, the earth would be a sty, fit only for the habitation of animals of the lowest order. We need it to cultivate our fields, prune our orchards, and dress our gardens.

And just as necessary as is physical and mental labor to the material, so necessary is it to our spiritual development, growth, and enjoyment. Not only for the accomplishment of our work, but for adornment. Our natures require subduing, cultivating, pruning, dressing, adorning. There is house labor and field labor. And in the spiritual as in the natural, no man liveth unto himself. We could not, by ourselves, be happy, in either nature. It is not good for man to be alone. Hence all the labor we perform unto another adds to our own enjoyment, if in no other way, by the exercise of doing it. And herein no doubt lies the great secret of our spiritual prosperity. We must not be slothful in the Master's business. The Savior tells us "My Father worketh hitherto and I work." "I must work the work of him that sent me, while it is day: the night cometh, when no man can work."

It is the design of this article, to show the necessity of exercise and labor, in the spiritual life. There are so many laborers in the church, and yet there appears to be so little accomplished. When we have many men working in our fields, and there is little accomplished, we conclude there has been a lack of application, for when all are alive and earnest, the result will be different. Think of a company of harvesters, in good health and spirits, entering the field to commence their labor. How earnestly they go to work! And for what reward? A perishable farthing. Our heavenly Father offers so much remuneration; his servants receive an incorruptible reward, even eternal life; wages that are well worth striving for. There is soil to prepare and seed to be sown; there are flocks to herd and lambs to feed. If we desire the prosperity of our Father's kingdom, oh! let us be engaged. Yea, more, if we desire our Father's approbation, and a share of the inheritance, we must not stand idle in his vineyard. The devil wants no better invitation than standing idle. A company of idle Christians is like a group of street corner loafers. They will propagate evil. Satan always finds some mischief for idle hands to do. Indolent Christians are to the church what loafers are to the world, not as good as drones are to the hive, who appear to be a necessary evil. They will neither enter in themselves, nor suffer those who would. Remember the slothful servant who buried his master's talent. Outer darkness was his portion. He could not be admitted within, where those were who had given meat or drink, or clothing, or visits, or in any way ministered to the wants of one of the least of the brethren of Christ.

Brethren's Tune and Hymn Book.

Many of our customers have been disappointed by not having their orders for the Tune and Hymn Book filled with our usual promptness, in the book business. To relieve ourselves of any reflection we make this announcement. We commenced advertising the books about the time the first lot was promised to be ready. Orders came in, which we entered upon our order book. As the books arrived from the binders we filled the orders commencing with the first order entered. And so since. To-day (16th) we have orders entered for 293 books, and not one in the house. But a box of 300 copies is due, and we have the binder's promise for 300 copies a month. We are happy to receive orders but they must be upon the condition to take their turn as the books come to hand. Price, cash accompanying the order $10 per dozen. Single copy $1.25. None sold on commission, or to wait until sold.

Almanacs.

We have still a good supply of the Brethren's Almanacs on hand. The year has just fairly commenced, and many more could be sold by making extra effort. Price only ten cents a single copy, postpaid, 75 cents a dozen, or 40 cents per half dozen, all postpaid.

Our Philadelphia Correspondence.

BROTHER HOLSINGER:

I wrote to you some time ago that the brethren in this city are in a transition state. They are manifestly so in more than one respect. They at present hold their meetings in a hall on Girard Avenue above 6th street.

The intention was to have their new meeting-house so far completed by New Year that they could worship in it; but the cold weather in November put a termination to the further progress of its erection until next Spring, the walls being but little more than half their intended height. Thus you see the brethren will have to meet for a considerable while longer in an "upper room;" but if the Master will at all times meet with them, as he did with his disciples of old, and say, "Peace be unto you," it will make no difference if they never worship anywhere else but in this humble apartment.

Brother Heury, we are still a little flock in the midst of this large and populous city, and there is a firm conviction upon the mind of your present correspondent, that the fervid eloquennce even of a Paul would arrest but few of those who are swept forward by the current of the popular, and fashionable religion of the day and bring them unto our plain assemblies: but along with this conviction there is a deep and abiding impression that there are hundreds in Philadelphia, who, from a sense of the utter worldliness and emptiness of the great mass of the professed Christianity of the times, have ceased altogether to attend religious meetings. Many of these are "Weary and heavy laden" with the burden of an overwhelming disappointment, and starving for the food of which their souls long to partake in the church of God, and if they could find a people who are not influenced by the nearly universal teudeucy towards "Mystery Babylon;" but are trying to live out the self-denying doctrine of the cross, they would "flock as doves to their windows." Is there such an organization in this city? The Brethren certainly profess to be, and hence ought to draw these "weary heavy laden" souls into the fold of the true Shepherd. How can this be done? The brethren can accomplish it by abandoning all the pride, pomp, show and appliances of Rome and her daughters, and letting their light shine in the humility, meekness, self-denial, long-suffering, non-resistance, forbearance, peace and harmlessness of their lives. In order that world-sick, sincere and seeking people might be attracted to them, they should manifest outwardly that they possess the Spirit of their Master, as indicated by the virtues and graces enumerated above, through a plainness and simplicity in their dress, houses, language and manners, and if needs be, to accomplish their object, put on the uniform of the Brotherhood, and place a stone in the front wall of their house of worship with the inscription, DUNKER MEETING HOUSE, upon it.

It is self-evident that the element in our population described above is that alone upon which the Brethren in Philadelphia can operate with any decided success, and that they can do this only by living their professed principles. Preaching in itself, though a necessary auxilary in the great work, can accomplish nothing. Unaccompanied by the meek and lowly spirit of Jesus in a church, it is as sounding brass and a tinkling cymbal to the earnest seeking soul. It can scarcely be estimated what a powerfully and double repellent force is exerted by teaching Christian humility, and, at the same time, practicing the pomp and pride of the world. The teaching repels the proud and the practice the humble.

We lately had a visit from brethren Trostle and Stoner of Maryland, and brother Young of south western Pa. These plain men are a true type of the Dunker preachers, and we think of the Christian minister. "Their preaching is not with enticing words of man's wisdom, but in demonstration of the spirit and of power." Evidently they have not "itching ears" for blasphemous titles, such as Reverend, Doctor of Divinity, His Holiness &c. &c. Their hearers are compelled to "endure sound doctrine," even the doctrine of the cross; for they seem not to have the fear of man, or the love of honor or "filthy lucre" before their eyes; but in conscious independence of man draw "the sword of the Spirit" and wield it with powerful effect.

Brethren Trostle and Stoner also visited Germantown and preached there, but they evidently came away with sorrow in their hearts. The fathers of the Brotherhood sleep there, but alas! how few of their decendants fill their places in the church! The world-spirit has crept in through the channel of pride, pomp, and the innovations and appliences of fashionable religion, and is making sad havoc among the little flock.

Oh, Lord at Joseph's humble bench,
Thy hands did handle saw and plane;
Thy hammer nails did drive and clench,
Avoiding knot and humoring grain.

That Thou didst seem, thou wast indeed,
In sport Thy tools Thou didst not use;
Nor, helping hands or finshes need,
The laborer's hire, too niee, refuse.

Lord, might I be but as a saw,
A plane, a chisel, in Thy hand!
No, Lord! I take it back in awe,—
Such prayer for me is far too grand.

I pray, Oh, Master, let me lie
As on thy bench the favored wood;
Thy saw, Thy plane Thy chisel ply,
And work me into something good.

No, no, ambition holy, high,
Urges for more than both to pray;
Come in. Oh, gracious Lord I cry,—
Oh, Workman, share my shed of clay!

Then I, at bench, or desk, or oar,
With last or needle, net or pen,
As Thou in Nazareth of yore,
Shall do the Father's will again.

A Letter to Brother S. G. Arnold, Limestone Congregation, Tenn.

Dear Brother in Christ: According to promise to you before I left Tenn., I now write to you, to give you a short history of our travels and welfare, from the time we left Tenn., to the present.

Myself and family, and neighbors, eighty-six in number, men, women and children, of which eight were members, left Limestone Depot, Tenn., on the morning of the 24th of Sept. Went along smoothly, until we landed at Topeka, on the night of the 26th, where brother Manley Broyles and family bade us farewell. But we took courage. Hoped we would meet again. The remainder of the party traveled on, hoping to land safely at the end of our route by rail; which we did, on the night of the 27th, at Kit Carson, Colorado, something over 1600 miles from our starting point. According to arrangements, we were met by brother Browning, C. H. Swatsell, and N. Blackwell, with eight wagons. On Saturday the 28th, at 11 o'clock, we started across the plains. We were about seven days crossing, 150 miles. Landed at my place on the Purgatory or LosAnimas River, all in good health, for which we felt to praise God for his goodness and mercy to us. The party soon all found houses to winter in; the most of them found employment, some by the day, others by the month, and some for the winter. Wages, 1.00 per day, and boarding from $20 to $25 per month. Carpenters, from $2.50 to 3.00 per day. When we first landed, some of the party did not like it very well; others were well satisfied, myself and family were well pleased when we got here, and now are getting better satisfied every day: in fact, all are now. I think they will all make their homes here.

This is a fine grain growing country; that is, wheat, oats, and barley: not so good for corn. Vegetables grow finer here than I ever saw anywhere. The amount of wheat per acre is from 25 to 40 bushels; oats, from 50 to 80; depending on how a man farms his land. All farming is done here by irrigation. This is not a hard matter, if a man has the right kind of land, which is not hard to get here at this time. Farming can be done to a good purpose on the mountains, without irrigation. There, there is always enough snow and rain in the winter and spring, to make a good crop of grass. I would say, in my judgment, farming is more than twice as good a business here as it is in Tenn. But stock raising is the principle business here, from the fact that they need not be fed in summer or winter. Cows, horses, and sheep are fatter here now than they were when we landed here, the first of October. As to health, I do not think that any other part of the world can be better: and as to the climate in this country, I can only speak from what I have seen from the first of October until now. Through October we had as fine weather as I ever saw. In November we had a few very windy days. The nights were tolerably cool, the days pleasant. Through December we had fine weather. On the whole we have had the most pleasant winter, so far, that I ever experienced. All the party that came with me say the same. We have had four small snows. They fell in the night and all melted away the next day. Although we are in sight of the snow range, where the snow is lying all the time. But down in the settlements, I am told by old settlers, the snow never lies on the ground more than two or three days, at most.

The Indians don't stay in this part of the country. It is about 150 miles to where they live. They come into our towns to trade with the whites; but they are very peaceble. The Shyanes came within about 40 miles of us in September, and stole about 200 head of horses, which the Chief gave up to the owners. They did not interrupt any of the citizens otherwise. The old settlers don't seem to have any fears, only that they may come in and take horses.

The people here in this part of Colorado are about one-half Mexicans and Spaniards. They are very kind; but they live quite differently from the Americans. The other half are made up from nearly all parts of the world.

Now, dear brother, please pardon me for spending so much time in writing on the things which must soon perish; I have done it for the information of my dear brethren and friends, who may wish to come west. I will now come to the point which we, as children of God, are more interested in. I have often thought and said, that I believe everybody has a religion of some sort, either pure or impure; but never have I seen it so plainly until now. Here we have it. Anything is religion here with some men. But thanks be to God, we find some good-hearted people here. I have heard of but two brethren in Colorado. I received a letter from brother Edward Robinson and wife from Mo. He writes that he expects to come and unite with us, next spring. Thank the Lord. He now is living about ninety miles from us, at Pueblo. May the good Lord send more.

In regard to the prospect for building up the church here, I think it is as good as could be expected in a new country. Everything looks favorable. I have been preaching every two weeks up to this time, as I had but two places to preach at. On Christmas week I held a four day's meeting. Had good attendance; the congregation increasing every day. Some told me that they had not heard any preaching for five years. Some of my congregation came forty or fifty miles. There was a great interest taken in hearing this "new doctrine," as they called it. There were two other doors opened to me, in private houses. This now gives me work every Sabbath. I also have had a call to go to New Mexico, to preach. I promised to pay them a visit in the spring, if the Lord be willing. I have also an invitation ro have meeting near the Greenhorn Mountains, which I promised to do next summer, if the Lord be willing.

Now brethren, I have heard much said among the Brethren about spreading the gospel. If that is your hearts desire, come on, here is the place If you want to preach to a few honest-hearted people, you can find them here; if you want to teach the heathens, you can find them here; or if you want to enlighten the barbarians, surely I think you can find them here. Oh! what a pity that so many of our dear ministering brethren are idling their time away, whilst here are thousands of poor souls, starving for bread of Life. May God, through his power put into the souls of some of our brethren to come and help us, is my prayer. Amen,

M. M. Bashor.

Church Chronicle.

The Tulpenhocken branch is composed of parts of Lebanon and Berks counties, Pa. There were several families of Brethren living in this congregation about the year 1870, which held to the Conestoga and White Oak branches, Lancaster county. These brethren had meetings in their houses, held by the ministering brethren of the above named branches. In the year 1813, brother Abraham Zug (son of Elder John Zug of the White Oak branch) moved into this congregation, formerly of Conestoga, about one mile south of the Tulpenhocken Creek. At that time there were four families in this branch, making in all nine members of the church. Two families held with the Conestoga and two with the White Oak. In the year 1815, the above named brother Abraham Zug, was chosen as minister of the word, by the Conestoga branch. He ministered about 27 years as preacher and Elder; died in 1841, in the 70th year of his age. There were then about 50 members in this branch, part still held to the Conastoga and part to the White Oak branch; but as there was no minister or deacon here, after the death of Elder Abraham Zug, the elders of the adjoining congregations, came on a visit, and counseled the brethren of this district to organize, and choose a minister of the word, and two deacons. The majority took the advice of the Elders, and held an election on the 5th day of October, 1841. After the majority of the votes were taken the church was informed that the choice fell on brother John Zug (son of Elder Abraham Zug) as minister, and brother Jacob Oberholzer and brother Daniel Royer as deacons. The churches then received the name of Tulpenhocken, according to the choice of its members. Afterwards brethren were called to the ministry, as the church was in need of them, four of which since 1841, went the way whence none ever returns, and will receive the wages for their labor. At the present time (1873) there are four ministering brethren and five deacons in the church, and about 200 members. Till the present the Lord was with us. Him alone be all the honor. The above is given to the best of my knowledge.

To the Companion.

Thou Dear COMPANION and traveling messenger, I feel like having another interview with thee. Thou hast been traveling over our American continent for a term of eight years, paying thy weekly visits, to many habitations of the Christian family over this widespread continent.

In the outset of thy mission, thou wast a weekly visitor to my family circle, and we were much delighted with thy company; and the good tidings thou then did bring, but after the first two years of thy visits, thy company was not as agreeable as at first. But thou didst continue thy visits for two years more. In the meantime thou didst not manifest as much of the Christian spirit as thou shouldst have done; but seemed to manifest a great deal of the spirit of controversy, which trait of character I did not approve of. So thy visits became loathsome to m d thou wearidst me with thy c tions; and at the end of four years, I did not bid thee welcome again.

But thou hast continued thy mission through our land, and visited the hearth and home of many warm hearted friends; and, occasionally, I had the privilege of meeting with thee while on thy mission to my neighbors and friends; and a few times thou didst find the way to my door, thus affording me an opportunity, to have a few short interviews with thee, and I discover, that by thy travels and labors thou hast gained much knowledge, and hast become much reformed. Thou seemest to manifest the spirit of meekness and forbearance now, as a Christian herald should. Thy conversation, seems to be intelligent, thy tidings interesting, and thy whole department seems to be governed by that Christian Character that should ever characterize the Christian's life. So, by those traits of character, thou hast aroused my affections towards thee so that I will give thee a cordial invitation to make thy return to my family circle again, willing to pay thy traveling expense, and also to remunerate thee for thy service; hoping we may become greatly cheered and built up on the way to Zion, by renewing our interview again.

Yours in brotherly love.

LEVI GARBER.

We wish to inform the readers of the COMPANION, that sisters Margaret Autlebarger and Miss Kate Beck have not forgotten how to donate their Turkeys and Chickens to the Brethren ministers of Tyrone, and also their choice fruit and good butter, &c. They are delicious, for we have tried them, presented from their generous hearts and liberal hands, and we think we know how to appreciate such things, and for the same we return our best thanks. We cannot think that it is a crime to give such gifts to poor ministers, that have a large family and loose much time serving the churches.

God says in his word that he loves a liberal giver; and that we should give as the Lord prospered us. Every congregation should see that their ministers are not burdened, especially so much that they are not able to provide for their own household. Poor brethren have told me that they have almost been constrained to turn back from their appointments, when they would think of the quotation. "He that provides not for his own household is worse than an infidel." Remember, brethren and sisters, that we do not live in apostolic times. You all know that traveling expenses are much greater, and it costs much more in every department. I speak not in this wise for myself alone, but I think of other poor ministering brethren, especially some of my co-laborers. I expect to write on the above subject soon and give gospel reasons why poor ministers should not be burdened.

Yours in Christian love.

BROTHER EDITOR; Please say to the churches of the Southern District of Ill. that the Committee of Arrangements for A. Meeting, wishes to say to them, that all the churches that have a location to offer for the A. Meeting, should send their request to the Committee soon, as they expect to examine the places, and determine the location this winter; and if no more places will be offered before the Committee will make their examination, the selection will be made out of the places now offered. I would also say that I have yet a few copies of the minutes of District Meeting. If any of the churches failed in getting them, they can yet be supplied by notifying me.

Brother Henry: For the first time I have made an attempt to write a few lines of encouragement for the benefit of the COMPANION. I have been a reader of the COMPANION for two years or more, and have always found it a companion indeed. It always brings a word of comfort to the weary, and shows that the brethren and sisters are not asleep in the good work, but are awake in the calling of their Master. May God grant grace, and knowledge, and power from on high, to all the brethren and sisters who may endeavor to write for the C. F. C., so that all that is written may redond to the honor and glory of God, and to the salvations of souls. I have always found the COMPANION to hold forth the doctrine of our Master in full, and my prayer is that it may continue in the same. I think every family ought to have a copy of it, and I hope that during the year we have just begun there may much good reading matter be found contained within its folds. Unto the pure all things are pure. But unto them that are defiled and unbelieving is nothing pure; but even their mind and conscience is defiled. They profess that they know God, but in works they deny him, being abominable and disobedient and unto every good work reprobate.

Brother Holsinger: On the 6th of December, brother Jacob D. Trostle and myself started on a visit to the brethren in the vicinity of Philadelphia. Arrived in the city on the evening of the same day. The brethren in this place having sold their meeting house, have their meetings in a hall, while their new house is being erected, consequently we had no meeting. Lodged with brother Christian Custer.

On the 7th visited brother J. H. Umstead, who is now suffering from disease of the heart, and thinks that his time is short. In the evening, met at the Green Tree meeting-house; had pleasant, and, we think, profitable meetings,(in all fourteen) with the brethren at this place.

On the 15th I accompanied brother Jacob Gotlwals to the Skippack M. H. In the evening we met again, and for the last time, with the church at Green Tree. Meeting very large, a number could not get into the house. I think we should have continued longer here, but we were under promise; so we bade farewell to many that we had learned to know and to love, and visited the church at Indian Creek. Had two meetings here. The church here is under the oversight of Samuel Harley. From the latter place we went to Hatfield church, under the care of Jacob Reiner; had one meeting. Next we went to Dublin. At this place brother John U. Slingluff is the oldest in the ministry. There we visited the the church at Germantown,at present under the charge of brother Davis Younce.

We then returned to Philadelphia. On Saturday visited some places of note: Independence Hall, the place where the Continental Congress assembled. Stood on the spot where the reader stood who read the Declaration of Independence, nearly one hundred years ago; and as we gazed on the people below, we thought of the changes that time has wrought in the political, as well as the religious world. In the Germantown meeting-house we stood behind the table, from which the brethren preached one hundred years ago. We thought of the language of the Bible, "Our fathers, where are they? and the prophets, do they live forever?" But enough of this.

On Sunday we met twice with the brethren in Philadelphia. Old brother Fox was present in the morning. The old sister, his companion, has been blind for fifteen years. On Monday morning, 23rd, we bade farewell, and started home, where I landed on the evening of the same day, and found all well. Thank God for his preserving mercy.

Now, brethren, I think I have used all alike. If I should have commenced to talk of your kindness and love to us, I would have failed, I am sure. You all have done faithfully what you have done for us. Our earnest desire is, that you may go on to perfection,strengthening the things that remain; and that the Father of mercies may abundantly bless you all for your labor of love to us; and if we meet no more in this world, that we may all be so unspeakably happy as to meet at home, in our Father's house, where there will be no parting given, no farewell tears shed. This is the prayer of your brother in the Lord.

Ephraim W. Stoner.

Dear Brother: I will tell you my excuse for not sending for the Companion. I have spent some time for subscribers, and got but one, and she is a poor widow woman, and blind; but she has a little boy that can read a little. She has heard me read the Companion, and she loves to hear it read. So does my father,who is also very nearly bliud. He did not read the first paper yet on account of his eye sight. He says he wishes he could see to read, so that, when I am absent, he could know what was in the paper. But thank God that it is as well with us as it is.

Now I will tell you our condition. I am a young member in the church. I united with the Brethren on the 22nd of Sept., 1872; and I will try to stand the trials and temptations until death. Also my father and mother, and one brother belong to the church. We are alone here. The times have changed, as it were, from peace and happiness to a wilderness of wo. I often think of the Son of God, when he was nailed to the cross. It seems to me I could lay down my life for my Master. But we cometimes become discouraged, and almost forget our Master. Then we again think of what he said when he was nailed to that dreadful cross between the two thieves, and bled for us all.

I was almost ashamed to send for the Companion; but I do want it: it is the best paper that I ever read. We are very poor in this world; but we have been sick ever since the 10th of August, 1871. There are thirteen of us in the family, and there were just two that kept their health in that time, my brother and myself; and it has taken about all that we own in this world, but we do not care so much for that; because we could not take anything with us when we die. If we had the world and all it had in it, it would not do us any good, for then this world is concerned. I hope you may pray in our behalf.

Paul a Robber of Churches.

An explanation is asked in the Companion of Jan. 7th, of the language of Paul recorded in 2 Cor. 11: 8; viz., "I robbed other churches, taking wages of them, to do you service."

The object of the question,no doubt, is to bring a plain Bible truth to the minds of the faithful; which is, that "the laborer is worthy of his hire."

The language simply means, I think, that Paul preached to the Corinthian church; and, while thus engaged, other churches assisted with money, or whatever was necessary for his support, that he might continue this ministerial labors. As he labored for the Corinthian church, and the benefits of his labor, measurably, accrued to them, it seemed like robbery to receive support from other churches while laboring for the Corinthians. He saw, however,that, if he pressed his claims upon them for the wages due him at that time, they might think he was laboring more for the fleece than the flock. While they were but babes in Christ, he was willing to labor with his hands and receive gifts from other churches, instead of demanding the wages that were due from them; knowing that, when they had grow to mature manhood in Christ, they would not only be willing to give "the laborer his hire," but that they would joyfully offer all they possessed, if necessary, and their bodies a living sacrifice, for the glorious gospel of Christ.

Every minister of Christ, who devotes his time, as Paul did, and exercises a power for good over the churches, and influences the wicked to flee from the wrath to come, ought to have wages from the church.

Isaiah 32: 8.

Three different translations of this passage of the Scriptures having lately been published in the COMPANION, and it is believed an additional one will be read with interest; being the Jewish translation, according to the Masoratic text, on the basis of the English version, after the best Jewish authorities, by Isaac Leeser, Philadelphia, 1853.

The Christian Family Companion. Is published every Tuesday, at $1.50 a year, by Henry R. Holsinger, who is a member of the Church of the Brethren, sometimes known by the name of "German Baptists," and vulgarly or maliciously called "Dunkards."

The design of the work is to advocate truth, expose error, and encourage the true Christian on his way to Zion.

It assumes that the New Testament is the Will of God, and that no one can have the promise of salvation without observing all its requirements, that among these are Faith, Repentance, Prayer, Baptism by trine immersion, Feet Washing, the Lord's Supper, the Holy Communion, Charity, Nonconformity to the world, and a full resignation to the whole will of God, as he has revealed it through his Son Jesus Christ.

So much of the affairs of this world as may be thought necessary to the proper observance of the signs of the times, or such as may tend to the moral, mental, or physical benefit of the Christian will be published, thus removing all occasion for coming into contact with the so-called Literary or Political journals.

Christians The Light of the World.

"Ye are the Light of the world." Matth. 5: 14.

This is part of the sermon the Savior delivered on the Mount. It is evident that he had direct reference to Christians. In the same chapter, verse 16th, he says, "Let your light so shine, that men may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven." The question might arise, How are we to let our light shine? The answer is, "By an upright walk and a chaste conversation;" and teaching men to deny themselves of ungodliness and worldly lusts; to live soberly, and righteously in this present world. This has reference to the actions of the Christian professor. As the proverb says, "Actions speak louder than words." The Christian is expected to be a pattern, or example, to the world. If he makes a misstep, the world will see it; if he utters an improper word, it will be like a careless spray of water thrown upon polished steel, staining it with rust, which no after scouring can efface. In view of this how important that we act wisely, and live as our profession requires.

It is evident, if we are to be the light of the world, that we are to be looked upon as such; for it is natural that men look upon the light, when in darkness. Let us walk, then, so that none may have cause to say, "We are just as good as that Christian." "Let us, then, be up and a doing, with a heart for any fate," still acting the part of wise people; and we will not regret the time we spend in doing good. May we then be like a city set on a hill that cannot be hid; and let our light shine far and wide on God's terrestrial globe.

But we have quoted the proverb that says, "Actions speak louder than words." All right. The unconverted say, by their actions, "There is no reality in religion! This some would be ready to deny; but how can you, if you say that "actions speak louder than words?" Here the sinner might very easily entangle himself. Some will say, "I never said so." But by your actions you say it, which you say, "speak louder than words." If you do not do as you think is right, you are not honest to yourself, to your country, or your God. If you are outside of the ark of safety, you say by your actions, "There is no real enjoyment therein." O unconverted! where are you, if this is the case with you. You are saying by your actions, that this and that need not be done, in order to gain admittance into a world celestial. We say, reform from the error of your ways, enlist under the banner of King Emmanuel, and hold out faithful until you die, and be saved from that lake of irretrievable woe, "where the worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched."

M. H. MEYERS.

Sipesville, Pa.

SOME people talk a great deal about ministers, and the cost of keeping them, paying their house rent, table expenses, and other items of salary. Did such persons ever think that it costs thirty-five millions of dollars to pay the salaries of American lawyers; twenty millions of dollars to keep our crininals; ten millions of dollars to keep our dogs alive; while only about six millions of dollars are spent annually to sustain six thousands ministers in the United States. These are facts, and statistics will show them to be facts.

A CELEBRATED writer says, "If one could but read it, every human being carries his life in his face, and is good looking or the reverse, as that life has been good or evil."

BLESSED are they who have nothing to say, and who cannot be persuaded to say it.—From Jones Lewell.

"TO MORROW will never come to us. We cannot find it in our little deeds. The man who owns whole flocks of real estate, and great ships on the sea, does not own a single minute of tomorrow! It is a mysterious possibility not yet known."

Entire Consecration.

Who doubting asks, what shall I give ?
And what shall I withold ?
Whose heart can be, when Christ demands
So thoughtles and so cold ?

O think of all his love to thee !
Think what thy ransom cost !
The blood of God's dear Son above,
Avail'd to save the lost.

Think of the blessings He has bought,
The debt thou could'st not pay,
And of the place prepared for thee,
In realms of endless day.

And wilt thou then withold from Him ?
Aught that his grace bestows ?
No ! let us give our all to Him.
Whose love no limit knows.

And what a privilege to feel
That we are wholly His,
With all we have, with all we are,
Oh ! this indeed isbliss.

Come let us, then, without reserve,
Dovote ourselves to God ;
He will accept the sacrifice,
Cleansed in a Savior's blood.

For the COMPANION.

An Appeal to the Brethren and Friends in Pennsylvania.

In looking over the decisions of our brethren made in Annual Council, I notice, that, when the subject of intemperance,in connection with the making and selling of spirituous liquors in any shape or form, thereby making a traffic of the same, whether under cover of license or not, was considered, they made it a test of membership. This is certainly praiseworthy, and is worthy of being imitated by all religious denominations. Yet, notwithstanding all our apparent oneness in trying to subjugate the baneful evil of intemperance,ithas been steadily moving along with us, and occasionally raises its serpentine head within the pales of the church, and churches all around us bring this lamentable cry to our ears. Not only is the cry going up from the churches against this growing evil, but thousands of what we are ready to call moral men, are, daily, lamenting this one great evil in this our otherwise happy country.

But again, the cries and prayers of a Christian people are not left to go up before the throne of God alone: they are accompanied with the more pitiful and plaintive cries that are emanating from the hearts of those upon whom is brought to bear more directly the damnable curse. Oh ! pause, and think of the many fond mothers, that, were it not for Rum, and rumsellers, would live as happily as any of the most envied of our land ; and their dear children, which are to them as so many gems of priceless worth. They must not only see them pointed out as the children of intemperate fathers, but must lay them down to sleep with the last faint whisper dying upon their ears, "O mother ! I am so hungry !" another, " Give me more cover." "I would freely, child, but papa has pawned them for liquor." Where shall I stop? Time would fail me, were I to particularize upon the thousand and one evils that are brought upon thousands of families in in our commonwealth through drunkenness.

It does not necessarily follow, that the children of a dissipated father must and do become slaves to liquor. We have instances where children of such parents have gained a name and character equaled by few, and, perhaps, surpassed by none. Yet, at the same time, it required a great deal more labor and ambition to gain this height, than it would have done had they had sober and industrious fathers. But, fathers and mothers, you who are of sober and temperate habits, you who have your children thrown into society, to school, or to some other employment ; and, while away from the parental roof, they are led by the hand of an assumed friend into some Satanic pit, with the window blinded and the counter protected with what is called license ; and there, for the first time, they take the fatal glass, which has damned its thousands. I appeal to you, brethren and friends, will we leave this thing pass by without giving it a sober, second thought? Can there be a father so indifferent in this matter? Nay, verily not. You would shudder at the thought of your son filling a drunkard's grave. The veriest sot himself does not want it said that his sons are drunkards.

But, again, is it not a self-evident fact, that drunkenness, in a measure, either directly or indirectly, is at the foundation of our poor-house pauperism? Moreover, are we not safe in saying, that ninety out of every one hundred commonwealth cases that are brought into our courts, had their foundation laid in some of these loathsome, fiendish hell-holes, called drinking saloons? thus incurring unnecessary expenses upon the sober yeomanry of our commonwealth. After looking the stubborn facts in the face, the question presents itself, what had we best do? Methinks I hear the answer come up from every lover of peace and order, "I shall make use of the privilege that the legislative body of Pennsylvania, has placed in my hands ; namely, on Friday the 27th of March next, irrespective of party,to cast my ballot AGAINST LICENSE, and thereby set aside the old rickety, lame, and unfair method of obtaining license." Have we not frequently made use of the old method of not having men licensed to sell intoxicating liquors to no purpose? In some cases a dozen of men for license, would have more weight before court, than one hundred names of the first men against license. This I have seen to my sorrow. It is, therefore, clear to every mind, that the old system is a grand failure, and that, in place of doing good, it is doing us hurt. Liquor saloons are increasing rapidly ; and as they increase in number, our children are the more in the danger of taking up with the great evil.

It has been said, and that by some of our good citizens, that the license law is a good law. They assume that it, in a measure, carries with itself a prohibitory principle. This I admit in part ; they have certain things to perform in order to obtain the right from the courts to sell liquors ; but not to make drunk. But it often happens, that some lover of whiskey becomes intoxicated, not in these licensed liquor saloons, but upon the public highway, outside of the licensed houses, thus becoming a grand nuisance to the public ; and while thus intoxicated, becomes abusive, using profane language, oftentimes reels home to his family but to abuse them and make sad the hearts of loved ones at home. All these things are done under cover of license, granted to certain parties by our courts ; and as a matter of justice, these licenses granted must be protected and held inviolable by said courts. It certainly would not be considered just for them to punish a man for a crime that they granted him the right to commit. No sooner is a license granted and signed by the proper officer than the court throws itself under obligations to protect said instrument of writing; hence so many of our license holders go unpunished.

Brethren and Christian friends, we have a remedy at hand; and if we make not use of it, I fear we make ourselves responsible, in the future for some of the crimes, at least, if we stay away from the polls on the 27th day of March next. May we not legitimately conclude, that every drunken person, reeling home to abuse his family, and every groan that emanates from the heart of a beaten mother, and starving children, as well as every drop of innocent blood that stains the hand of drunken murderers under the cover of license, from, and after that day, may be charged on our indifference, in regard to this matter.

Now, then, brethren, neighbors, and Christian friends, upon this subject call me what you will, I shall, God giving me the privilege, perform a duty on that day, that I think I owe to my God and fellow men; that is, to cast my voice, with a prayerful heart. NO LICENSE.

In conclusion let me say to the Brethren in Pennsylvania, let us, as one man, stand up in vindication of the decisions of "Annual Council," in regard to the liquor question; and let us show by practice, (and a good opportunity we have so to do,) what we hold in theory; if not, the world will have just cause to censure us for our indifference upon this important question.

Advice to Young Men.

Life is an unceasing battle. It always was and ever will be so. Life is the same unceasing battle to-day as it was yesterday; and there is not the least bit of use in allowing yourself to be discouraged. The darkest hour is just before day, in business as in time. Remember, young man, that no one cares for you on general principles. You are a good orange, so long as society's children can squeeze juice out of you: no longer. People never care for your troubles; they have enough of their own. People are willing to give everyone's property but their own. So with secrets. They will turn yours loose and keep theirs in the stable; and they always keep the nicest for themselves, giving the poor that which they will not use themselves. Remember, man is a perfect machine. He is ready for life and its duties. God made us all correctly; and his machines are not the ones to fail. Keep a firm resolution. Keep up your nerve. Help yourself. Light your own lamp; make your own position; and if you will live with a conscience void of offence toward God and man, you shall have treasures in heaven.

For the COMPANION.

Customs.

I learn by observation, as well as, from rules written, that, in the ordinance of baptism, Christians use the following phrases: "Thou shalt, for the remission of thy sins, be baptized in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." In the above we see, that a small part of one of Peter's sermons is attached to the commission as given by our blessed Lord, as though the commission was imperfect in itself, and needed the finishing stroke of puny man.

I am of the opinion that we have no authority from God's word to attach anything, or to add anything, to the commission, as quoted above. I will farther say, that we are not authorized by the gospel of Christ, to make the assertion that "Baptism is for the remission of sins." Peter did not say to the Jews, "be baptized for the remission of your sins," but he taught those Jews that already believed on the Lord Jesus, to "repent and be baptized," and that, "in the name of Jesus Christ;" and upon these conditions they should obtain pardon for their sins. The doctrine of Christ and his apostles is, first, believe on the Lord Jesus Christ; secondly, repent of all your sins; and thirdly, be baptized in the name of Jesus Christ, and by obeying these commands, all your sins shall be pardoned.

In conclusion, I will say, faith, repentance, baptism, and the name of Jesus Christ, are separately connected, for the remission of sins.

Secret of Happiness.

An Italian bishop, who had struggled through many difficulties without repining, and been much opposed without manifesting impatience, being asked by a friend to communicate the secret of his being always happy, replied, "It consists in a single thing, and that is, making a right use of my eyes." His friend, in surprise, begged him to explain his meaning. "Most willingly," replied the bishop. "In whatsoever state I am, I first look up to heaven, and remember that my great business is to get there; I look down to earth and call to mind how small a space I shall soon fill in it; I then look abroad in the world, and see what multitudes are in all respects less happy than myself, and then I learn where all my cares must end, and how little reason I had to murmer, or to be otherwise than thankful. And to live in this spirit is to be always happy."

The Way to the Crown.

We must taste the gall, if we are to taste the glory. If justified by faith we must suffer tribulations. When God saves a soul, he tries it. Some believers are much surprised when they are called to suffer. They thought they would do some great thing for God; but all he permits them to do is to suffer for his sake. Go round to every one in glory; each one has a different story to tell, yet every one a tale of suffering. But mark all were brought out of them. It was a dark cloud, but it passed away. The water was deep, but they reached the other side. Not one there blames God for the way he led them thither. "Salvation!" is their only cry. Child of God, murmer not at your lot. You must have a plain as well as a white robe. Learn to glory in tribulations also.

Prayer.

Prayer is the expression of our desires unto God. It is a privilege with which our Maker has favored us, to "pray without ceasing." In everything, by prayers, and supplications, with thanksgiving, to let our requests be made known unto God; praying always, with all prayer and supplication. 1 Thess. 5: 17—18. God is the only object of prayer, his throne of grace is to be approached by sinful and dying men, through Christ the one mediator between God and man, and an entire dependence on the Holy Spirit to help our infirmities.

People talk of originality. What do they mean? As soon as we are born the surrounding world begins to operate upon us, and so on until the end; and after all what can we truly call our own but energy, power and will! Could I point out all I owe to my great forerunners and contemporaries, truly there would remain but little over.—Goethe.

Climbing up Zion's Hill.

"I'm trying to climb up Zion's Hill,"
For the Savior whispers "Love me"
Though all beneath is dark as death,
Yet the stars are bright above me.
Then upward still, to Zion's Hill,
To the land of love and beauty,
My path before shines more and more,
As it nears the Golden City.

CHORUS:

I'm climbing up Zion's Hill,
I'm climbing up Zion's Hill,
Climbing, climbing, climbing up Zion's Hill.

I know I'm but a little child,
My strength will not protect me;
But then I am the Savior's lamb,
And he will not neglect me.
Then all the time I'll try to climb
This holy hill of Zion,
For I am sure the way is pure,
And on it comes "no lion."

Then come with me, we'll upward go,
And climb this hill together;
And as we walk, we'll sweetly talk,
And sing as we go thither.
Then mount up still, God's holy hill,
Till we reach the pearly portals,
Where raptur'd tongues proclaim the songs
Of the shining-robed immortals.

A Clean Heart.

In touching upon the subject of heart purity, we are forcibly reminded of the language of Infinite Purity, himself: "Blessed are the pure in heart." "Create within me a clean heart," should be the prayer of every one professing Godliness. We should long-sigh for it. Our salvation depends upon it. True happiness is in it. Whenever I hear a lazy, careless, or indifferent prayer, I fear that the heart is unclean that utters it. Whenever I hear men talk of their secular affairs with greater interest than they do on the subject of religion, I fear that the heart is unclean. If people are bent on going to heaven, it is strange that they say so little about it. Announce an excursion to where the good people can resort for pleasure, and see what an excitement you will raise. The cars will be crowded with cheerful ones, whose talk was all about the Falls or Islands from the very time the liberal inducement was first held out. Would that more would accept the great inducement that the gospel holds forth, and get ready to go to heaven. By saying, get ready, you know what I mean. You understand that there is something for you to do; and that something is the cultivation of your own heart. To do this you must know what you are by nature and what you are by grace. Compare your own life with Christ's. Is he pure? seek to be pure like unto him. Is he lovely? seek to be lovely like him. Is he honest and upright? be thou likewise. Did his life result in much good? live so that yours may do the same.

You would do well to look at Christ's life frequently. Too many, who make his sufferings and death their chief study, seldom thinking for what he lived. If we are not to become like him in holy living, how are we to become like unto him? I once heard a minister say that he 'could take the sinner in his arms right to heaven.' Whether he had any preference in regard to sex, I am unable to say. But somehow he left a wrong impression. I could not help but think that he was not quite right at heart. Had I not known that he had gone through a process of training—education—through enough to teach him that it would be forfeiting his own right to the tree of life to take an unclean sinner right into the pure society of heaven, I would have made more allowance for him, charged ignorance with the fault. Nothing but a clean heart is the joy of our God.

"A Thought Suggested by the Epizootic."

The epidemic among the horses, which has spread so rapidly through this country and caused much suffering amongst the poor, raising the price of food and fuel because of the difficulty of transportation, and taking perchance, some poor man's only means of support—the horse with which he hauls, and gains a livelihood for his family—has shown us at least one feature of modern civilization—its complexity. Although one figure (and we would suppose, at a casual glance, but a trivial one) of the daily account was wrong, the whole balance is destroyed. The disease was general, and in a measure we were prepared for it; yet it would show us how near a general calamity the nation has been brought. Each day the papers tell us of the farther spread of the disease, and stoping of business in some new place. This is but a passing circumstance—a pausing of the vital current; but when protracted, becomes death; as in the human body, when the veins and arteries refuse to do their work, the body becomes diseased and death ensues. This sickness stops business, both wholesale and retail—the bread and milk carts, on which so many persons daily food depends—the physician from visting the sick—the dead from burial; in fact, there is scarcely anything. This done without the aid of the horse shows us how dependent we are on the animals God has given in our keeping, and how it behooves us to be careful of and kind to them. As an inconvenience, merely, this could be born; as a temporary trouble, it could be received; but were it a thing of time, life would have to be remodeled, and this would cost us no little trouble or time. For instance: We saw the other day a visionary project for having an underground railroad through the large cities, from the cellar of one business houses to another, and from thence to the wharfs and depots, to transfer merchandise. Think of the great cost and trouble. It were well for those to think of this who would make life the assured product of a fixed law, and leave God from their universe. The secret of law is ever beyond man's grasp; and its unknown quantity not to be discovered; and it shows how very slight the protection from distruction: the most trifling thing withdrawn or added, and disease is everywhere; and when we resolutely refuse to see the Almighy's wise hand in the phenomenon of life, we must be compelled to feel it in the simplicity of the causes of death.

JAMES 2: 14; 17.

The Brethren of the Buffalo branch met in regular council on New Year's day, and after transacting and settling up all local church business and difficulties on hand, also considered the proposition of Elder Grabill Myers, lately published in the COMPANION, in relation to the building or purchasing of a meeting-house, for the use of the brethren living in Altoona, particularly, and of the brethren of the Middle District of Pa., generally. The consideration of this subject presented one of the most discouraging spectacles in church affairs, that has ever fallen under our notice in this arm of the church. The proposition of brother Grabill is so manifestly within the scope of proper home missionary labor, that no one can possibly object to it, save he alone, who objects to the obligation or necessity of incurring any expenses, of any kind whatever, in the work of she Master, or of his cause. The plea, therefore, that we are not commanded to build meeting-houses, cannot be other than the inspiration of a covetous or an avaricious mind. The special plea, often put in, that towns and cities are not spiritually healthy places for the brethren, and that the brethren do not generally get along well in towns, as brethren, and that there is not much use in procuring or building meeting-houses in large towns, furnishes food for much serious reflection; and would form a prolific text for various and unpleasant animadversions upon the rules and practices of the ruling element of the church at large, and naturally gives rise to the query, whether the standard of religious ethics and the maxims and direction of eclesiastical effort, maintained by this ruling element in the church, is not radically at fault. Do the examples of the apostles of Christ, of planting churches and of ordaining elders in every city, go for nothing? and do they amount to nothing? Instead of seeking the centre of population, as Paul did, are we excusable in only seeking and organizing such feeble, two-penny efforts, in out of the way and country places? Or, is it, indeed and in truth, only because it is cheap to do so? Might not the want of spiritual prosperity, and the cause of discouragement in towns, brethren, arise from the fact of their being tied fast to such exceedingly cheap, slow, country coaches of churches, where parsimoniousness is proverbially the rule, and being "rich toward God" the exception. Luke 12: 21.

The plea, that the brethren of Altoona may keep their meetings in their houses, like we used to do, proved, in the event, as a matter of course, to be more valuable to the pleader, than fifty cents, and will, probably, be adhered to There was a day, when the Puritans of New England considered it sacrilegious to have a stove in a meeting-house. This plea belongs to that age.

The plea, that a man should get along well in worldly prosperity to inspire confidence in his evangelical judgment, and that a well organized church in the west asked for assistance and did not succeed, and that this case was probably near about the same, are ministerial conceptions, of broad and comprehensive elaborateness, equal to the emergency, and scarcely less liberal and benevolent, in their aggregate, than Mahomet's mouse. When the grocer says his new lot of pepper is half peas, (P's,) his customers will become dubious. When the agent says the insurance company, may not be solvent, who will insure?

Perhaps this was too direct a test of covetousness, or of avariciousness, perhaps not. Perhaps there is more pride than covetousness in the church, perhaps not. I know of a man in the flesh, who would undertake to stand good for the pride, before he would for the other beast.

An expression was finally reached. The members were interrogated in turn, "Will you give? How much? Pretty generally the sum designated, near about two to one, "Aye," on the brethren's side: the sisters probably catching inspiration from the agents, pretty generally respond, "No." The poor, the young, and moderately circumstanced, very generally respond affirmatively; the older, the well situated, generally, negatively; and those right well off, "No," to a man.

The Scriptures say, "It is more blessed to give than to receive." But that is old. Perhaps it also is more blessed to keep than to receive; and perhaps the accumulation of wealth for one's own gratification, and to keep it, is not covetousness: perhaps not, and then, again, perhaps it is. Who knows? And yet again, perhaps the Lord is able to furnish his own funds, with which to carry on the work of promulgating the true gospel.

But, perhaps, this sketch is too true to be popular, or, so true as to be offensive. How is this? Are we not plied with homilies and exhortations against pride, from one years end to the other? And are not covetousness and avariciousness, parsimoniousness and niggardliness, sins of a more beastly nature than pride itself? And are they not denounced by the Master twice to pride once? Does not covetousness drive us ten miles through wind and weather to every one mile that charity and benevolence drive us?

It appears, that, because all the world (nearly) is madly striving and jostling to get gain, thrusting Christ into and out of the way corner, at least, six out of seven days of the week, the brethren seem to have caught the same disease, and they are encouraged in it by men who ought to know better. I have had ministers and elders voluntarily, and unceremoniously, thrust an account of their means and possessions upon my notice, upon my first acquaintance with them. What is this?

But, "I trust that the ministers of the churches in the Middle District of Pa., instead of being too pleasant, that thrift may follow fawning, speak out boldly in the Lord upon this subject, as well as they do upon others and educate their several charges up to the true standard of Christian liberality. The proposition of Elder Grabill Myers in such a reasonable one, and the contributions required so moderate, that I cannot but conclude, that nothing but outright stinginess can defeat it, if the matter is judiciously handled and prudently managed throughout. The twenty-four churches of the district are, at least, good for $1200, if the matter is fairly and truly presented for their approval "The Lord said unto Moses, Speak unto the children of Israel that they move forward."

The New Commandment.

In number 47, volume 8, of the COMPANION, is an article in which the writer agrees that the new commandment which Christ gave to his disciples, and which is recorded in John 13th chapter, 34th verse, was the origin of the rite of feet-washing. Those who want to accept the teaching of Christ and his apostles have abundant evidence to prove that feet-washing was an actual service to be perpetuated in the church: and those who do not believe our arguments, based on the gospel narrative, where Jesus washed his disciples' feet, and said unto them: "If I, your Lord and Master, have washed your feet, ye ought also to wash one another's feet," will also not be convinced if we strain passages of scripture, that have not any reference to the subject. When Jesus said "A new commandment I give unto you, that ye love one another as I have loved you, that ye also love one another." It is very evident that he meant that they should love one another, and nothing more. The apostle John, when he writes to the elect lady, gives no new commandment, but that which he had from his Master, that we love one another.

"By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye love one another." Love is one of the distinguishing features of the christian religion. Wherever the gospel was preached this new commandment was preached; and love was manifested, and the heathen world, taking note of it, were led to exclaim; "See how these christians love one another!" Thus they showed to the world that they were his disciples. Let us not reason away the new commandment by quoting only part of it, and arguing that it means something else than love. It is an easier matter to observe the outward ordinances, than to have that love in our hearts. It is hard for human nature to love those who have injured us, but without a forgiving love we cannot be christians.

Who Shall Separate us from Christ.

"Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? Shall tribulation, or distress, or persecution, or famine, or nakedness, or peril, or sword?" Rom. 8: 35.

Shall any of these things separate us from Christ? We answer, No. Then who or what will separate us from him who has given himself up to die that we might live? Will we let the world, with all its pomp and splendor, draw us down to degradation, misery, and woe? Alas! brother, sister, it is to be feared we, hearken too much to the delusive words "I don't see any harm in it." Remember, "whatsoever is not of faith, is sin;" and here is where we may begin to be separated from his love. Let us not love the "world, neither the things that are in the world." And why not? Because the world passeth away, and the lust thereof." But, brethren, he that doeth the will of God, endureth or abideth forever. Then look to the word, and not to the world, for counsel, and the spirit which guides into all truth will not be grieved, nor caused to take its flight, until its mission is ended, and we are safely landed beyond Jordan's dark waters, in the regions of endless bliss, where all is joy and happiness forever and ever. Are not those temptations and trials working a more exceeding weight of glory? and who shall separate us from it? Shall life, or death, or angels, or principalities, or powers, or things present, or things to come, be able to separate us from our beloved Creator and blessed Redeemer? Let us keep our hopes, our hearts, our treasures, in that blissful clime of immortality. And you, my beloved brethren, according to the flesh, who stand daily separated from the love of Christ, what are you doing? Why yet delay? Is not his reward rich enough, or his promise sure? You are serving, you know not what. Your Master promises you pleasure here, but you find none: nothing but misery in this life, and endless death in the world to come. Arouse! Break the chains that bind you! Look to Christ who will give you light. Oh! think for a moment. Your days are passing away, and you have never made an effort for your soul's salvation. All your time has been spent in gratifying the lusts of your carnal minds. It's in this life only that you have hope, and you are of all men most miserable. Then arise from the dead, thou that sleepest, and Christ shall give thee light. I have written from pure motives. Yours in hope of Eternal salvation.

The Resurrection.

TO SISTER M. H. OF MO.

Dear Sister, by your request I will pen a few thoughts upon the subject of the Resurrection; and in doing so, I shall try to avoid traditionary or speculative influences, which, in these last days, are so common as touching scriptural doctrines. The doctrine of the Resurrection from the dead, is one of the fundamental principles of the gospel, and one of the grounds of our hope; because God, in his great mercy, "hath begotten us again unto a lively hope, by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead."

Martha believed in the doctrine of the resurrection from the dead; and, in connection with her confession of that faith, Jesus says to her, "I am the Resurrection and the life. He that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live, and whosoever liveth and believeth in me, shall never die." John 11: 25, 26. We here see that, through faith in Him, we, though dead, are made alive to Christ; and our life is such that we cannot die. The doctrine of such implies a two fold Resurrection: first a spiritual Reserection, a Resurrection from being "dead in tresspasses and sins;" and, secondly, Resurrection from the grave—notfrom death—but from a "sleep in the Lord;" for he that believeth in Christ "shall never die."

Jesus Christ gave evidence of his power to raise the mortal body, in the case of Lazarus and others. On that point we need have no doubt; for the "Mortal shall put on immortality;" such immortality as Christ has brought to light through the gospel. As a strong proof that Christ is "the Resurrection" we would refer to the fact that, when Christ arose, the bodies of many saints which slept arose and came out of their graves;" being the first fruits, after Christ, of a trumph over death and the grave, as the consequent result of faith in him who is ultimately going to put the last enemy under his feet.

We have sufficient in the facts recorded in the Scriptures, to prove that, through Christ and the power of God, the mortal body shall be resurrected, not only a mere germ of the body, but the body itself. Lazarus came forth the same body. "The bodies of the saints which slept arose." Jesus Christ's body was resurrected, and then ascended to God a glorified body. His body was like ours (except it was not vile); for "he took not on him the nature of angels; * * * it behooved him to be made like unto his brethren." If he actually arose and ascended to His Father, may we not truly believe that, if, through His atoning merits, we become justified in the right of God, we, too, shall really arise, and our vile bodies be changed, that they "may be fashioned like unto his glorious body?" Then we, too, shall be like him, when we see him as he is. The apostle well observes that, "if in this life only we have hope in Christ, we are of all men most miserable." But as Christ is risen, we have hope in the next life. The very fact that we have been "buried with him by baptism into death," and planted together in the likeness of his death," is evidence that we have faith and hope in the resurrection, having thus been "baptized for the dead;" or, as Dr. Macknight renders it, "Baptized for the resurrection of the dead," that is, we are baptized into the death of Christ, that, inasmuch as we expect to live for and with Christ, we are willing and desirous to be baptized into his death, that we might be in the likeness of his resurrection. No one has ever died, so far as our knowledge goes, that we are commanded to be "baptized for," save alone he that died for us. It being evident there is to be a Resurrection from the grave, or abiding place, of all those who have lived and passed away, we will next consider the order.

Paul says, "In Christ shall all be made alive;" but every man in his own order: Christ the first fruits, afterwards they that are Christ's, at his coming." 1st Cor. 15: 23; also, "The dead in Christ shall rise first." 1 Thess. 4: 16. It is quite certain, that those who are "a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a peculiar people," shall rise first. In the 8th chapter of Revelations we learn that John saw that an angel ascending from the east, having the seal of the living God; who with a loud voice forbid the hurting of the earth, the sea, and the trees, till they had sealed the servants of their God in their foreheads. Of the tribes of the children of Israel were sealed "one hundred and forty and four thousands." He also saw a great multitude which no man could number, of all nations, and kindreds, and people, and tongues, who stood before the throne and before the Lamb, clothed with white robes, and palms in their hands. In Rev. 14: 1, we learn that those who were sealed stood with the Lamb Then in chapter 20th, we learn that the great Dragon, Satan, was seized, in the vision John saw, and was bound a thousand years. We also learn who were to reign with Christ a thousand years; but the rest of the dead lived not again till the thousand years were finished. This is the first resurrection." Blessed and holy is he that hath part in the first resurrection; on such the second death hath no power, but they shall be priests of God and of Christ, and shall reign with him a thousand years." It is evident that those who are the servants of Satan, and refuse the seal of the living God, can have no part in the first resurrection. At the end of the thousand years, Satan shall be loosed a little season; and go out to deceive the nations. Then the time is to come when he is to be "cast into the lake of fire and brimstone." Then will appear the great white throne, and from the face of him that sitteth thereon, will flee the earth and the heaven, and no place will be found for them. We here understand the earth and the elementary heaven surrounding the earth. Then cometh the general judgment day, and the Resurrection of all, both small and great, who must stand before God and be judged out of the books that will be opened. All will be judged according to their works, not accord. to their faith alone. Also the book of life will be opened, and whosoever will not be found written in the book of life, will be cast into the lake of fire.

We now conclude our thoughts as to order, by saying, it seems clear that Christ came forth from the grave in his order, as the first fruits of them that slept, and a number of the saints, also, at the time. At the second coming of Christ, the chosen of God will come forth in the order of the first resurrection, and reign with Christ a thousand years. Then will come forth all, both small and great, in their order, as those that will constitute the general resurrection.

A few thoughts as to where Christ shall reign with his saints, during the millenial dispensation; that is, during the period Satan shall be bound, which is to be one thousand years. We think it plain that this earth is the place. 'Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth." The kingdoms of this world are to become the kingdoms of our Lord. When Satan is loosed, he goeth into the "four quarters of the earth." Those that are deceived by Satan, will go "up on the breadth of the earth, and compass the camp of the saints." When Christ comes as KING OF KINGS, AND LORD OF LORDS, to make war upon them "that know not God, and that obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ," the wicked "shall be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord and from the glory of his power," "when he shall come to be glorified in his saints, and to be admired in all them that believe;" for, truly, he is coming, "without sin unto salvation, to all them that look for him."

That day is near at hand. Dear sister, are we looking for him? Full of hope, and with hearts established in the doctrine of our blessed Master, should we be ready and waiting for the appearing of Jesus. "We shall not all sleep;" but our vile bodies shall be changed in a moment of time, and we shall be blessed with those that have part in the first resurrection. And should our Savior not appear until we taste death, we shall only sleep a "short season." When the trump of God, "with sweet salvation in the sound," shall awake us, by the power of God, we shall spring forth into immortal life. "Roll on, roll on, sweet moments," and haste the day when this mortal shall put on immortality, this corruption shall put on incorruption, and our bodies shall be fashioned like that of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ.

That we may meet in the "camp of the saints," let us daily seek such supplies from the fountain of all good, that we may more and more conform to the image of God's dear Son. Oh! can we say every day, "To live is Christ?" may the grace of God be with you and yours, now and evermore.

I have now made an humble effort to comply with your request, and have a request to make of you or brother A. who doubtless have made the above subject a matter of deep study. Please answer the following questions through the medium of the COMPANION. Will all the righteous of every age have part in the first resurrection? Will those that reign with Christ be judged at the time "both great and small" stand before God to be judged? or who shall be judged at the general judgment?

J. S. FLORY.

"Who hath Made us Differ?"

The providence of God to us, often seems severe and unequal, and we complain at Divine goodness because our physical conformation, our personal appearance, or our situation in life, seems not so symmetrical or favorable as that of many of our neighbors and kindred. There are two sisters or brothers; the one so highly endowed with mental and physical charms as to appear a favorite of the Creator, while the other is feeble of mind and uncomely in visible personal. Who hath made them to differ? The same merciful God created them both; and shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?

How ready we are to honor the rich, caress the beautiful, and magnify the virtues of the intellectual. All this is well enough, for wealth is a great blessing if rightly used; beauty is a charm of God's creation, and intellect is, perhaps, the most choice of subluuary favors; and he or she who devotes these bestowments to that channel designed by the good Father in heaven, surely deserves well of all men.

But, on the other hand, how ready we are to catch up an odium against the poor, to support with the ungracefulness of the homely, deformed or unfortunate, and to depreciate the mental capacities of those sparingly endowed with faculties. We say, in the hearing of our children, that this one is more beautiful or lovely than that, and thus injure both by feeding the vanity of one, and mortifying the finer feelings perhaps, of the other.

Did you stare in the face of that man or woman who had lost an eye or nose, as you passed by? Did you gaze at the maimed or deformed boy or girl whom you met in the streets? Did you get off a derisive smile at that plain, or homely, or rude one, whom you saw the other day? Did you flaunt by him who used to be your friend—or fail to bow to the old man or matron? And did you know that all this is evidence of littleness on your part? "Pride goeth before a fall." Bodily deformity is nothing so bad as moral imbelicity.

We once sat near the fountain of a fashionable watering place. Gay children, ladies and gentry sported on the grounds. A country girl, of ten summers, with a person much deformed, but a lovely face, came leaely and took a seat not far from us. A gay train of young people came walking by. One young lady, in thoughtless merriment, exclaimed:

"Look at the little wretch's back—what a hump!" All turned, and with mirthful eyes stared at her and passed on. We observed the flush on her face, and saw her eyes overflow with tears. Oh, there was a blush which would have given increased charms to any face in that gay train; and those tears indicated a pure sensitiveness to which they seemed utter straagers. Approaching the child, we caressed her little hand and attempted to say something to console her. She looked up, almost blinded with tears and said: "Thank you sir, for your kindness, but it hurts me mightily; but my Sabbath school teacher tells me I love my cross I have on my back. Proud people laugh at me—boys call me ugly names, and other little girls will not play with me, and I have to live lonely." We referred her to Jesus as the Friend that sticketh closer than a brother, and, to our great joy, she said: "Yes, sir, I have learned that He is so. He is all my comfort—He and good mamma." We could not avoid the opinion that her condition, after all, was far better than that of any of those who proudly passed her by and laughed at her.

When we meet the unfortunate, we should never forget the question—"Who hath made us to differ?" Why is our condition better than theirs? Let us try to cheer, comfort and encourage all such—make life pleasant to them; for it may yet be seen by us that in slightingthem we slight God's richest jewels.

The Scriptures.

The Scriptures are divided into the Old and New Testaments, familiarly termed, the Bible. In other words, the Scriptures are a revelation from God to man, and contain a history of God's arrangements and dealings with man, from the creation of man or the world to the ushering in and winding up of all things.

The Old Testament scriptures were originally written in the Hebrew tongue, and were first translated only a few centuries before the birth of Christ, into the Greek language. This version is called, by the learned, the Septuagint Translation, on account of seventy men having been engaged in the work.

The second version of the scriptures, was the translation of the Bible into the Latin, for the use of the Latin church. This translation, if I mistake not, is the only one still accepted by the Roman Catholic church, and is called the Vulgate.

Previous to the discovery of the art of printing, a Bible cost as much as an ordinary farm or a good house, and, consequently, but very few people would have the pleasure, in those remote ages of the world, of reading, and much less of owning, such a precious treasure as the Bible. Well might the poet break forth in such ecstatic language, while musing upon the inexhaustible treasury of divine blessings, contained in the Scriptures of truth.

"Precious Bible! what a treasure
Doth the word of God afford!

Before the art of printing was discovered, the Bible, as well as all other books, was written with the pen. This gave employment to a class of persons in ancient times called Scribes. Parchment was used to write on, formerly, instead of paper now. Likewise scrolls,—writings formed in rolls,—were then in use instead of the more convenient book form at the present day. It was not long, however, after this great discovery was made—an epoch in the history of the world, which served as the starting point, and gave rise to a power mightier than the sword itself,—that the first Old and New Testament Scriptures were first published. However tedious, slow and expensive book-making must have been in the earlier ages of the world. Solomon, who flourished nearly 3000 years ago, could already say, in his time, that of "making many books there is no end." But the facility for making books then, as compared with our time, is only as a drop of water in the bucket. Through the instrumentality and power of the press, thousands of copies of the Scriptures are issued daily, and scattered broadcast over the land. All who have a desire, can obtain and read the Scriptures. "Whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely."

To this end Bible societies have been organized in various parts of the world, for the express purpose of distributing the Scriptures. Let me refer the reader to the "British and Foreign Bible Society," which issued even as many as one copy of the Scriptures, every minute for free distribution; making as many as one thousand four hundred and forty full copies of the Bible every day; while the "American Bible Society," at the same time, far exceeded this, and issued over two millions of copies in a single day.

What an influence for good must this have wrought upon the children of men! How many destitute minds have been made glad in the reception of the same! Whilst, in the thirteenth century, it required a poor man, at the standard wages in those times, to work not less than fifteen years, to honestly earn a single copy of the Bible, a common day laborer, at present wages, can earn a substantial and well bound Bible in less than one day, so that no sane man or woman, living in this enlightened age of the nineteenth century, can plead ignorance in the day of Judgment on account of not knowing the Scriptures. In fact, it is within the reach of all, especially in this land of Bibles and gospel priveliges. We have sermon upon sermon, "line upon line," and "precept upon precept." In the face of all this light and free pirvileges, if we neglect our salvation, our final doom will be so much the more awful.

"When Thou Art Converted Strengthen Thy Brethren." Luke 22: 32.

The term conversion is used for regeneration, or a change of both heart and life. This change is produced by power of divine grace, or, in other words, by the agency of the Holy Spirit, in all who truly see the Lord. We learn from the holy Scriptures, that this change is necessary to our seeing God in peace. The necessity of it is found in the corruption of human nature and action. The testimony of God concerning our race is, that they "have corrupted their way," that "there is none (by nature) good; no, not one;" that "the imagination and thought of their heart is evil, only evil, and that continually;" that they are "by nature children of wrath;" and, therefore, that they must be "renewed in the spirit of their minds," and have the whole course of their lives changed. But it is unnecessary to go largely into the proof of the necessity of such a change in this article; it is, however, of importance to those who would become converts, that we point out the way according to which conversion may be obtained.

Many, understanding that conversion is the work of the Holy Spirit, too hastily conclude, that human agency and means have no influence in bringing it about, and, therefore, that we must wait the pleasure of the Lord, as in any providential deliverance. The extraordinary manner of his reviving his work in our day, and our manner of speaking of it, have a tendency to produce that impression. We see that God pours out his Spirit at some places, more than at others. How natural, therefore, to conclude that we must wait for the seasons of refreshing from his presence. This is, however, a great and fatal mistake. There are divers operations of the same Spirit; and we must distinguish between his ordinary and extraordinary operations. Those to which I have alluded above, are the extraordinary, and may be compared to the pouring out of water. The ordinary are like the gentle, insinuating dews; and yet nothing more is necessary to conversion. Let any sinner as a rational, accountable agent, bring to bear onhis understanding the nature, necessity, and means of grace; seek a change of heart; the Holy Spirit is in every effort he makes, and in all the means he uses, and will certainly convert and save him, if he persevere. It is not necessary that his understanding should suddenly be fully opened; that his mind should be agitated with fear and despair, in order to obtain pardon and be assured of an interest in the divine regards; but he may say that his mind is dark, stupid, and barren of everything good. It is well that he has a sense of these things. But he means to say that he has no adequate sense of them, but he has a sense of them adequate to present necessity; and, if he goes on, the Lord whom he seeks will give him deeper conviction, when that shall be necessary. Prayer is one of the chief means to be used: the prayer of confession at least; and this will lead to the prayer of supplication, which will in due time bring into his soul the kingdom of God, which is righteousness, peace and joy in the Holy Ghost. This conviction and these efforts constitute that repentance which precedes conversion.

Faith also is a condition of conversion, But faith, here, is not that luminous, judicious faith, which "is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen." The elments of the faith I now speak of are a conviction of sin, both original and actual; a renunciation of our own righteousness; and an earnest desire for renewal through the merits of Christ alone. He that understandingly uses all the means of grace within his reach, shall find increasing desires, until they are all embodied in the "love of God shed abroad in his heart by the Holy Ghost given unto him." Then, not and till then, is he a real convert, a new creature, a child of God. But let him not, on the one hand, conclude that he is truly converted, because he sees and laments his situation; nor, on the other, despair, because he cannot convert himself. The Lord, whom he seeks, shall suddenly come to his temple, and make his abode with him, even the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost.

But if these gentle convictions alone be necessary, and be attainable by man, as a free agent, in the use of the means, why is conversion ascribed to God? Let me not be misunderstood. When I say that man may obtain conversion, I do not mean that he can convert himself. But though he cannot convert himself, he may as a free agent, use the means on which God has promised to convert him; and these means must be used, or the sinner will never be converted. In John 3: 1—8, Jesus answered "Verily verily, I say unto thee, except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the Kingdom of God. That which is born of the flesh is flesh; and that which is born of Spirit is spirit. Marvel not that I said unto thee, ye must be born again. The wind bloweth where it listeth, and thou hearest the sound thereof, but canst not tell whence it cometh and whither it goeth; so is every one that is born of the Spirit." But if the question be confined to those distracting fears and despairing horrors, to these distressing anxiety and perplexity of mind, which frequently attend conviction of sin, the answer is, that God may permit these for a season, to subdue the obstinacy of the sinner, and deter him from the path that leads to eternal death. Many would never reflect on their course were they not thus compelled; and it is no wonder that a sinner, on discovering his guilt and danger, should feel all the painful passions of his mind put into motion. But his conversion is not hastened, but frequently retarded thereby. His conversion is none the sounder for these things; nor is it certain that his Christian course will be the more even and steady on their account. Paul was dealt with in the extraordinary way, the twelve apostles in the ordinary, and yet their conversion, was as sound as Paul's. Many things often mingle in the exercise previous to conversion, which are not essential to that work. Let us then learn to separate the dross from the gold. Conversion is a thing of the utmost importance to every individual. Let us not rest without this, and the evidence of it.

Pardon.

Reader, do you know how your sins are to be pardoned? Do you know how a just and holy God can forgive your many transgressions, and yet be just and holy still?

Let me suppose for a moment that you are anxious about your soul. You are pressed down by a bad conscience. The remembrance of your sins is grievous to you. The burden of them is intolerable. Now what ought you to do? Whither will you go? Which way will you turn? What will you trust in for pardon and forgiveness? Listen to me for a few moments, while I speak to you about this.

Will you turn to ministers and put your trust in them? They can not give you pardon: they can only tell you where it is to be found. They can set before you the bread of life: but you yourself must eat it. They can show you the path of peace; but you yourself must walk in it. The Jewish priest had no power to cleanse the leper, but only to declare him cleansed. The Christian minister has no power to forgive sins—he can only pronounce who they are that are forgiven.

Will you turn to rites or ordinances, and trust in them? They cannot supply you with forgiveness, however diligently you may use them. By ordinances faith is confirmed and grace increased, in all who rightly use them. But they can not justify the sinner. They cannot put away transgression. You may go to the Lord's table every Sunday in your life; but unless you look far beyond the sign to the thing signified, you will after all die in your sins. You may attend a daily service regularly, but if you think to establish a righteousness of your own by it, in the slightest degree, you are getting further away from God every day.

Will you trust in your own works and endeavors, your virtues and good deeds, your prayers and your alms? They will never buy for you an entrance into heaven. They will never pay your debt to God. They are all imperfect in themselves, and only increase your guilt. There is no merit or worthiness in them at the very best. "When ye have done all those things which are commanded you," says the Lord Jesus, "say we are unprofitable servants." Luke xvii 10.

Will you trust in your own repentance and amendments? "You are very sorry for the past. You hope to be better for time to come. You hope God will be merciful." Alas! if you lean on this, you have nothing beneath you but a broken reed. The judge does not pardon a thief because he is sorry for what he did. To day's sorrow will not wipe off the score of yesterday's sins. It is not an ocean of tears that would ever cleanse an uneasy conscience and give it peace.

Where then must a man go for pardon? Where is forgiveness to be found? Listen, reader, and by God's help I will tell you. There is a way both sure and plain, and into that way I desire to guide every enquirer's feet.

That way is, simply to trust in the Lord Jesus Christ as your Savior. It is to cast your soul, with all its sins, unreservedly on Christ—to cease completely from any dependence on your own works and doings, either in whole or in part—and to rest on no other work but Christ's work, no other righteousness but Christ's righteousness, no other merit but Christ's merit, as your ground of hope. Take this course and you are a pardoned soul. "To Christ," says Peter, "give all the prophets witness, that through His name whosoever believeth in Him shall receive remission of sins." Acts x. 43. "Through this man," said Paul at Antioch, "is preached unto you the forgiveness of sins, and by Him all that believe are justified from all things." Acts xiii. 38. "In Him," writes Paul to the Colossians, "we have redemption through His blood, even the forgiveness of sins." Col. i. 14.

The Lord Jesus Christ, in great love and compassion has, made a full and complete satisfaction for sin, by His own death upon the cross. There He offered himself as a sacrifice for us, and allowed the wrath of God, which we deserved, to fall on His own head. For our sins He gave himself, suffered and died—the just for the unjust, the innocent for the guilty—that He might deliver us from the curse of a broken law, and provide a complete pardon for all who are willing to receive it. And by so doing, as Isaiah says, He has borne our sins—as John the Baptist says, He has taken away sin—as Paul says, He has purged our sins and put away sin—and as Daniel says, He has made an end of sin, and finished transgression. Isaiah liii. 11, John i. 29, Heb. i. 3. ix. 36, Dan. ix. 24.

And now the Lord Jesus is sealed and appointed by God the Father to be a Prince and a Savior, to give remission of sins to all who will have it. The keys of death and hell are put in his hand. The government of the gates of heaven is laid on His shoulder. He himself is the door, and by Him all that enter in shall be saved. Acts v. 31, Rev. i. 18, John x. 9.

Reader, believe on this Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved. Come to Him this day with all thy sins and wickedness—with all thy doubts and fears—with all thy feelings of unfitness and unworthiness, and He will not cast thee out, nor refuse thee. He has said it. He will stand to it. He never breaks his word. "Him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out." John vi. 37.

Reader, do you want to have your sins pardoned. You have heard of the good way. Walk in it, and you shall be saved. —J. C. Ryle.

Salvation No. 2.

BY S. R. ZUG.

Thus far we have endeavored to show what the lost object was, implied by the context. Now I will try and confine myself more to the term "Salvation," what it implies, and what the terms are by which we are to be saved.

Christ, having come into the world to save sinners, he must needs come with the means. By way of illustration, let us suppose a man falls into a deep pit, from which he is not able to extricate himself. Aware of the danger of perishing there, he will naturally cry out for help. Some one says to him, "I will send you help."—"The seed of the woman shall bruise the serpent's head." We may suppose he would anxiously wait for the promised assistance. It is highly probable he would, in his imagination, form some idea as to how he would be saved; yet if he have full confidence in the ability of the person making the promise to save him, he will let him adopt his own means, If the deliverer, at his own expense, procure a ladder, set it down into the pit, calling on the one in distress to lay hold of the rounds of the ladder and mount up, step by step, and thus be saved, how unnatural and even ungrateful, if he would refuse, because he cannot reach the uppermost round first, or would probably wait for a rope to be let down: in short, if he would not accept or lay hold of the means and be saved in his savior's own appointed way.

Just so with Christ. He came to a fallen humanity; assumed flesh and blood, and became as one of us, the more closely to come to the object to be saved. He brought with him the means to save, and all we have to do is to lay hold of the same, do as he says, and be saved.

Man, by nature, is possessed of a carnal mind, which is at enmity with God, or, as Paul says, Rom. 8: 6, "For to be carnally minded is death, but to be spiritually mind is life and peace." Consequently, we behold that, first of all, a change of mind must be effected. This change is brought about by faith and repentance.

Faith is essential first, because, "Without faith it is impossible to please God." "He that would come unto God, must believe that he is, and that he is a rewarder of them that diligently seek him;" without which it is simply impossible to repent.

Thousands upon thousands of people have lived, and do yet live, in this enlightened age, who believe there is a God, the creator and preserver of all created worlds, through whose power the heavens and the earth received their existence, by whose power the sun is fixed in the centre of the solar system, the planets revolve in their proper orbits, and the myriads of stars are fixed; and that Jesus Christ was the Son of God, sent into the world to proclaim the counsels of the Mighty God to the children of men; but their faith is dead, not working by love.

"To be carnally minded is death;" and "the wages of sin is death;" sinners are therefore under sentence of death unless rid of their sins. Christ suffered death and was raised up again the third day, "that repentance and remission of sin should be preached in his name, among all nations, beginning at Jerusalem."

The conditions upon which we are saved from ours sins, are given in Peter's sermon on the day of Pentecost, when those who believed that "Jesus was made Lord and Christ," called out, "Men and brethren what shall we do?" Peter answers, "Repent and be baptized, every one of you, in the name of Jesus, for the remission of sins, and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost."

Faith, repentance, and baptism are the conditions upon which remission of sins is promised; and short of these there is not the promise given between the two lids of the New Testament that sins shall be forgiven.

"What"! say some of my readers, "baptism is not essential for salvation, or the remission of sins; but these Dunkards will always poke baptism in—it is nothing but a Dunkard arrangement," &c.

Well, if it is a "Dunkard arrangement," we have the consolation that Peter was a Dunkard; for he took a firm hold of this arrangement, and must therefore have been a Dunkard; and if we are Dunkards, we must surely belong to the same church Peter did, and who dare say he did not belong to the church of Christ?

By nature man's mind is fixed on things carnal, and temporal, but after faith, repentance, and baptism, it is changed to things spiritual and eternal. Before the change, he is inclined to carry out and obey his own will; but afterwards the will of God sways the mind. Where the life of a man, after his initiation into the church, does not exhibit the fruits of a full surrender to the will of God, we are led to draw our conclusion of the cause from the effects; and there must be a defect in faith, repentance or baptism, or perhaps in all.

Some believe, are sorrowful for sin; and, I believe, are sincere in seeking for the means of salvation; but by erroneous teaching, are led to believe man rather than God, and are waiting for remission of sins, and the gift of the Holy Ghost before complying with the terms upon which they are promised; thus telling God, in effect, "If you will change your terms, we will follow your commands, and comply with your conditions." If the brethren are all free from aiding the devil to delude the simple by a doctrine so detrimental to the welfare of precious souls, they are certainly not hurt by the exposure of a presumption, that would almost make a Judas blush with shame.

Scarcely anything has done more to injure the cause of Christ, than a false Christianity. It has done more than all the writings of Paine, Voltaire, and others of the same stamp. It pretends, professes, and presumes; it operates upon the senses and animal feeling, by eloquence, magnetism, and in scores of ways, and terms it the operations of the Holy Ghost.

Brethren, let us hold fast to the faith once delivered to the saints. let us take the word of God as the man of our counsel; and let us shun a desire to gain the favor of a false Christianity. Let us tell the Scribes and Pharisees that they are hypocrites, for Jesus is our example. Let us tell the people that the Ark wherein Noah and his family were saved is "the like figure whereunto baptism doth also now save us;" for Peter says so. Let us proclaim and obey the whole counsel of God, and we will receive our reward with the sanctified.

It is with diseases of the mind, as with those of the body; we are half dead before we understand our disorder, and half cured when we do. —Colton.

Brother Davy's Visit.

We were favored with a visit from brother H. D. Davy, of Ohio, since our last. He had been called upon a committee, to sit upon a case at issue between brother Martin Meyers, of Illinois, and brother Cornelius Berkley of this congregation. Brother Meyers was here, but saw proper to leave a few days before the committee was to meet, and therefore nothing could be done. So brother Davy employed his time in preaching for us, and visiting among us. On Tuesday evening he preached from Heb. 1 : 1. He labored mainly to impress the congregation with the importance of obeying the commandments, or speaking of God. His sermon was very acceptable to the brethren, and we hope it will be received by the people. On Wednesday forenoon he again spoke in our meeting-house, in town. but we could not attend.

On Wendesday evening he Spoke from James 1 : 25. He advocated the perfect law, and dwelt feelingly upon its perfection, and what it cost to have it enacted and proclaimed. We feel certain that good impressions were made. We had the pleasure of having the old brother in our family, for the first time, to enjoy his society in the home circle. On Thursday noon he took his departure homeward, having left appointments in Stark county, Ohio, for over Sunday.

Jacob Conner : Thank you. If you are satisfied, we have no reason to complain. You have a credit on Charity Fund of $2 40.

We give room for the following items of correspondence, in this department, rather than crowd them out of this number.

Brother Henry : In the Ashland branch we had a series of meetings, commencing on Christmas day, and continuing over a week, at three different points in the district. We had attentive meetings, good attendance in the evenings. At first there was some lack of strange speakers. The brethren with us were J. B. Shoemaker, brother Bock, from a distance ; others from adjoining districts. A good impression has been made. Old believers were revived ; and some were almost persuaded to be Christians. May they soonbe altogether such. Some few have since followed Jesus into the watery grave.

There was also a series of meetings held in the Maple Grove congregation, when two young persons from the Ashland branch were received by baptism. The ice, some say, was eighteen inches thick, and the day very cold. One young lady from Medina county, was also baptized during the meeting at Ashland. Oh ! that they may all prove faithful, and be ornaments to the church, and that others may follow after, and the good work go on, is our wish and prayer.

Explanation.

For the gratification of your readers, I will explain the circumstances of the thieves, and the voice which spake to Paul.

1st. According to the writings of the evangelists ; both the thieves reviled him up to the sixth hour. Now darkness prevails, the one thief becomes penitent ; pours out the desire of his changed heart before a yet living, and wonder working Savior, and here receives the promise of salvation by a miracle.

2. The voice of conviction is heard by every one of mature age ; but all are not called, "Saul, Saul," &c. God knows how to call us all. He called to Adam, "Where art thou ;" to little Samuel he called, "Samuel, Samuel." God calls the sinner in the most powerful way under heaven. He called Saul in the articulate words, "Saul, Saul," &c. The men upon seeing the phenomena, stood speechless, and heard the voice of conviction, but not the language adopted to Saul's case. Love to the good cause has prompted me to reply. Search carefully those scriptures referred to in the queries. God's word is a perfect work, and harmonizes from beginning to end.

Angels in the Way.

H. L. F.

To find a reference in my reading this morning, I turned to Genesis xxxii. and the first wonderful verse seemed to me so full of richness and goodness—of encouragement and cheer to the Christian, that I rested and feasted upon it a long time. "And Jacob went on his way, and the angels of God met him." He went—walked—on his way—not his own way, only in that it was God's way for him, and while obeying the command of God—or the leadings of the Spirit; such a wonderful blessing was vouchsafed to him, as meeting the angels of God. They might have come to him, it is true, had he remained in his place, but he saw them sooner for going "on his way," not one, but many; and he knew them, for he said, "This is God's host."

We all know that beautiful history—his fear of Esau—his tenderness in providing for the safety of his family. And who can read unmoved that remarkable prayer, verses 7, 12, where he takes God's own words and promises, and lays them before Him as though he could not be denied; "the Lord which saidst unto me, return unto thy country, and to thy kindred, and I will deal well with thee, and, "Thou saidst I will surely do thee good."

To every Christian, they will but go on their way—go forward in the path of duty whatever it may involve; a sacrifice of our own ease and pleasure for the good of another—a call to a word of exhortation or prayer—an appeal to some impenitent when we know not how it may be received; to stand by the couch of suffering which we are powerless to relieve; to see another struggling under a burden we cannot lighten; in any and all the daily and hourly experiences of the Christian's life, if we will but go on in God's strength we shall surely meet the angels. But the trouble is, we do not know them when we meet them.

Dost thou believe frail, suffering one, that there is ever an angel at thy side in that long-continued pain and trial which God has laid upon thee,—in that new made grave, where lies that which was dearer to thee than thine own life?—in that estranged friendship more bitter than death?—in privation and poverty? Ah! our eyes are holden that we cannot see them; and our weak hearts refuse their tender ministries. In our weakness and sense of want we pray to be filled with all His fullness—to be made like Christ, and yet we shrink from the trial and suffering that He designs shall make us so; we do not know our prayers in their answer; but in our anguish cry, "Did I ask this of Thee?" O, how sweet to trust Him fully—to know that we shall meet "God's host"—that He has given them charge concerning us, to keep us in all our way—in humility and gratitude to plead those precious promises, which are, "Yea and Amen in Christ Jesus," "I will never leave thee nor forsake thee," "the eternal God is thy refuge, and underneath thee are the everlasting arms." "Commit thy way unto the Lord, trust also in Him, and He shall bring it to pass."

O, then, with the eye of faith fixed on God, and His work and His way—though to our dim, mortal vision there is only trial and darkness and sorrow around and before us; we shall walk with the angels in His light, as children of the light and of the day, and by His light we shall walk through darkness.

"The angel of the Lord encampeth round about them that fear Him, and delivereth them."—Guide to Holiness.

The Boy of the Palace Gate.

A little boy in England wished very much to see the queen; so he determined to go at once to her palace, and ask to see her. But the sentinel on guard before the gate only laughed at the boy, and pushed him aside with his musket. Still the lad could not give up his purpose, now he had come so far. Not till the soldier threatened to shoot him did he turn and run away. One of the young princes saw him crying, and, on learning the cause, said, with a smile, "I'll take you to the queen;" and past the guards he walked, into the very presence of his royal mother. With surprise, she asked her son about the lad; and when she heard his story, she laughed, as any kind-hearted mother would, and with some kindly words, sent the delighted boy away with a bright piece of money in his hand.

It is a hard matter for the poor to gain admittance into the presence of an earthly sovereign. But the way into the presence of the great King is always open, and even the beggar in his rags is welcome. Just as this prince brought the child who longed to see her into her mother's presence, so Christ takes us by the hand and leads us into the presence of His Heavenly Father. For the dear Son's sake we are made welcome. Without Him we can never be admitted. Never forget, when you pray to God, to ask all blessings for the sake of Jesus, who would have us first to withdraw from all worldly things; namely, all treasures, glories, and honors of this world. Yea, not only to enter our closet, but also to shut our door so that these things cannot enter during our prayer, and then and there get our affections on heavenly things.

Some contend that Christ condemned long prayers, and those offered in conspicuous or public places; but by a careful examination of the subject we learn that he only condemned long ones, when offered "for a pretense;" and those offered in conspicuous places, when offered "that they may be be seen of men." I would not be understood to oppose secret prayer, but, to the contrary, I would encourage it. We will never find a prosperous Christian, or a fruitful branch of the Vine, where this duty is neglected.

The Result of an Accident.

More novelties are the result of accident than is generally supposed. The origin of blue-tinted paper came about by a mere slip of the hand. William East, an English paper-maker, once upon a time, set his men at work and went away on business. While the men were at dinner Mrs. East accidently let a blue-bag fall into one of the vats of pulp. Alarmed at the occurrence, she determined to say nothing about it. Great was the astonishment of the workmen when they saw the peculiar color of the paper, and great, the anger of Mr. East when he returned and found a whole vat of pulp had been spoiled. After giving the paper warehouse room for four years, Mr. East sent it up to his agent in London to be sold "for what it would fetch." "For what it will fetch!" said the agent, misunderstanding the meaning; "well, it certainly is a novelty, but he must not expect too much." So he sold the whole at a considerable advance upon the market price, and wrote to the mills for as much more as he could get. The surprise of Mr. East may be imagined. He hastened to tell his wife, who found courage to confess her share in the fortunate accident, and to claim a reward, which she received in the shape of a new cloak. Mr. East kept his secret, and for a short time supplied the market with the novel tint, until the demand exceeded the supply, and other makers, discovered the means used, competed with him.

To Our Relatives.

BROTHER HOLSINGER: Having a number of relatives in the different states, and especially in the West, in Kansas, I wish to correspond with them through the medium of your welcome messenger; hoping that those lines may interest the generality of the readers also.

Dear Uncles, Aunts and Cousins, through your request, by the help of the Lord, I will try to communicate a few thoughts, and also give you our addresses. Now, as we have started out on a New Year's journey, let us all trace back through the old year; and see where we have come short or been neglectful in discharging our christian duties, as becometh the followers of Christ; and try, by the help of the Lord, to fortify ourselves against those weak places, so that we may come a little closer the mark of the prize of our high calling, in Christ Jesus our Lord. Let us ever try to keep "the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace;" ever look unto Jesus, who is the author, and finisher of our faith; so, that, when our days are numbered, we may be prepared to meet all those who have gone before, "who have washed their robes, and made them white, in the blood of the Lamb." I have no doubt but we all have some relative, either father, mother, brother or children, in the realms of bliss. I well remember the words of one who had a great anxiety for the welfare of his children while on his death bed. For three weeks before his death, his mind was entirely drawn from the objects of this world, and he uttered no desires, only that he wanted to go home; neither did he wish to take any medicine. He died April first, and was buried on the 3rd, in the year of our Lord 1870. Funeral services by Elder Jacob Miller and Jacob Cripe, both of South Bend, Indiana.

Those are the names of the children of John and Sarah Heckman.

Now I will close, by asking an interest in the prayers of God's children; and may the blessing of God, and the communion of the Holy Spirit abide with us all, is the prayer of your unworthy and weak brother in the Lord.

K. HECKMAN.

DEAR BROTHER HENRY: Again the COMPANION lies before me, starting in with the New Year, with its pages well filled with good literature; containing news from all parts of the brotherhood. What a pleasing thought, that, by means of our church papers, we can hear from our dear brethren and sisters in regard to their Christian faith, and their views on the sacred Scriptures, by which means we can all become edified and built up in our most holy faith. By our church papers we can hear the brethren preach from all parts of our fraternity; and, if we read carefully, it will do as much good as if we were sitting under the sound of their respective voices.

Through the colums of the COMPANION we hear the news of the "Maine Mission;" and we pray God that much good may eventually be the result. May God bless the two aged brethren who performed the labor; and may the results of their labor be the planting of the true church among the craggy mountains of the Eastern States.

The COMPANION brings us news, pleasant, as well as, sorrowful; nothing the departure of some dear relative or friend, which causes us to feel sad, and impresses upon our minds the very solemn truth, that we, too, are hastening to our eternal home.

It also brings to us the cheering news from the different branches of the church, of sinners being made willing to join with us, to march under the blood-stained banner of King Emmanuel."

We also hear, from many parts, the Macedonian cry, "Come over and help us." Oh! could the cry be heard by all who attempt to preach the everlasting gospel, then could we see the holy union—one mind—prevail. Missionaries would not need to go to foreign lands: but all could hear the blessed news of peace and good will to all from their own door-steps.

We can see through its columns the many contributors, and the many who are supporting the publishers and editors. But could not our papers have a wider circulation? Let us try. Let those of us who contribute, be careful how we write; let our words be well seasoned with grace, that all we say may tend to the upbuilding of the church.

Through our church papers we also hear the cry of aid for the poor. The different branches of the church are exhorted to lay the matter before their members; soliciting but a trifle from each member, which would aid materially in supplying the wants of the poor. But is this attended to? It is too much neglected. Brethren, when we are sitting around our warm hearths amidst plenty, we are apt to forget the poor. Let us be careful. How can we pray, "Lord, remember the poor?" Brethren and sisters, let us be awake to our every duty. Let our chief aim be the salvation of the soul, the conversion of sinners. Let us all have our lights to shine as a "city upon the hill, which cannot be hid." Let us all "watch and pray."

BROTHER HENRY: To-day was the time for our quarterly council meeting, in the Upper Miami congregation. The weather was very cold and stormy; nevertheless, there was a goodly number of members present, considering the inclemency of the weather. The business done in the house of God consisted in a few small items, which were disposed of in good order, love, and union. Brother Samuel Coppock was promoted from the first to the second degree in the ministry. Love and union apper to be the ruling elements in this arm of the church, at present; and my prayer to God is, that it may remain so.

BROTHER HENRY: As far as I know, there is union among our members, and the ark of the Lord is moving onward and taking into it those that shall be saved. The number is not as great as we would like to see it; but it is still between twenty-five and thirty new members, for last year's labor. It is still encouraging to our ministers and members to keep the ark moving. We have a number of extra, and another series of meetings to be held. What the rusult will be, the Lord knows.

Yours in the bonds of the Gospel.

R. ROYER.

BROTHER HOLSINGER: Will you, or some other brother, give your views on Mark 13: 34? If the man taking a journey, represents Christ, the house his church, the servants his apostles or ministers, every man the laity, as some brethren think, who is the porter?

Queries.

Who will answer?

"But he who is least in the kingdom of heaven is greater than he." Matth. 11: 11. What is the antecedent of the first pronoun he?

Will some one please reconcile the following scriptures?

"For all the prophets and the law prophesied until John; and if he will receive it, this is Elias which was for to come." Matth. 11: 13, 14. "And they answered him, what then? Art thou Elias? And he saith, I am not." John 1: 21. The difficulty is, from the prophecy of Malachi 4: 5, the Jews had conceived the idea that the coming of the Messiah would be preceded by the coming of Elias. Christ, in speaking of this in Matthew, seems to substantiate it; for he says, "This is Elias which was for to come." When John had thoroughly aroused the Jewish people, by his preaching, as one sent of God, the priests and Levites of Jerusalem sent a deputation to him to inquire of him who he was. The first inquiry was, "Are you the Christ?" And he confessed, and denied not, but confessed, I am not the Christ;" John 1: 20. Again they ask, "Are you then the Elias that was to come before Christ, in the fulfilment of Mallichi's prophecy?" And John answered, "I am not," thus making a contradiction between them: Jesus saying that John was Elias, and John himself saying that he was not. Please give a proper solution of the above.

Luke 20: 40. "Why durst they not ask him any more questions?

Matthew 16: 18. "The gates of hell shall not prevail against it." If so, what was the cause of so many denominations? Certainly Peter did not plant two or more kind, of churches; and if only one denomination is right, and all the rest wrong, what else could have dissolved the church but the gates of Hell?

Matthew 5: 47. "If ye salute your Brethren only, what thank have ye?" Why is it that in the church we do not salute more than members? A member would hardly be found saluting an outsider, even after Christ spake in this manner.

Dear Brother: I wish to ask a few queries.

1st. What do we understand by these words, which we find in the New Testament: Justification, justify, justified, justifier, justly? We find the first word twenty-seven times; the second, three times; the third three times; the fourth, four times; the fifth, twenty-eight times; the sixth, one time, and the seventh, two times. These words occur sixty-eight times altogether, in the New Book.

2nd. What do we understand by these words: Sanctification, sanctify, sanctified, sanctifieth? We find the first word five times; the second, six times; the third fifteen, times; and the fourth, four times. These words occur thirty times in the same book. Will some brother or sister explain the difference between justification and sanctification?

Fraternally yours.

Answer to Queries.

In the issue of the Companion, for Jan. 7th, it is asked for "some brother to reconcile the three evangelists in their reference to the two thieves upon their cross." I can see no discrepency in the accounts given. Both reviled him, no doubt; but one repented of his railing, and asked Jesus to have mercy on him.

An explanation is asked, in Companion of same date, of the accounts given of Paul's conversion, as recorded in Acts 9: 7, and 22: 9.

Luke says, in his account of Paul's conversion, that "the men who journeyed with him heard the voice." But Paul, in giving an account of his conversion, in the twenty-second chapter, says, "They heard not the voice." This may mean that they understood not the voice.

These different readings are the strongest evidence that the Bible was not compiled by designing men. They did not try to harmonize with each other, but wrote the facts they record as they saw, heard or understood them.

May our Father help us to receive his word as little children, and reconcile our bodies and spirits to his blessed Gospel.

In Dupage county, Ill., January 6th, brother Jacob Grove, aged 61 years 9 months and 29 days. Disease Small-pox. He took sick on Christmas Time of sickness 31 days. On the 7th his body was buried in the Brethren's buring ground, by another man and myself in presence of the sister and three of her children. Oh! what a dread disease! The sister and her three youngest children have the small-pox at date of writing; but they are not dangerously sick.

John Hollinger.

Near Kentuckeytown, Grayson county, Texas, October 9th, 1872, Henry Grove, son of brother Jacob and sister Mary Grove after a sickness of twelve days, with the typhoid fever. His body was burried on the praric; but his parents desired to have his body brought home to Naperville, Du Page county, Ill. On the 28th of November, the writer, in company with brother Grove, started for the body, and returned home on the 13th of Dec. On the 15th the body was buried

In the Brethren's burying-grounds. He was aged 30 years, 9 months and 9 days. Funeral improved by the brethren to a large audience.

JOHN HOLLINGER.

In the South Bend congregation, St. Joseph county, Ind., January 8th, brother PETER WALDSMITH, aged 67 years and 10 months. He was a worthy brother in the church. Served in the office of deacon for many years. Sister Waldsmith preceded him in death several years. He leaves b other George and sister Maggie Waldsmith, with whom he lived, and was cared for in sickness and health, deeply mourning the loss of an affectionate Christian father. A daughter in Iowa, and many grandchildren and relatives who could not attend his funeral, will be sorely bereaved at the sad intelligence. On the 10th his remains were co veyed to their final resting place, beside his companion. Thus sleep father and mother Waldsmith in the promises of God, waiting for that happy reunion, with their children and church triumphant in heaven. Funeral services by Elder C. Wenger and the writer, from 1 Cor. 2: 1.

JACOB HILDEBRAND.

In Mt. Union, Huntingdon county, Pa., Decemb r 24, 1873, our much esteemed deacon, WILLIAM MILLER, of Apoplexy, aged 6 years, 11 months and 2 days. He was afflicted for several months, but able to go about most of the time. The morning before his death he had visited some of his children in town. He came home about 10 o'clock and said to his wife that he felt very queer, and then in a few moments fell with the stroke. He lay, seemingly, in an unconscious state; and breathed his last about 5 o'clock P. M. He left a kind widow, and seven intelligent and affectionate children to mourn his loss. We believe he left the strongest evidence of a glorious Immortality. Our beloved b other gave the strongest evidence of a living faith in Jesus. His daily talk was religion, in his own house and out of it. His life shed forth that bright and heavenly lustre, that gives evidence that there is a reality in the religion of Jesus. If space would admit we could write pages in proof of his heavenly life. His desire was to be buried at the Spring Run meeting-house, Mifflin county, Pa. The brethren at said place were at the station awaiting the arrival of the deceased and friends, with ample conveyance. Funeral services by Jos. R. Hanawalt and others, from 2 Kings 20: 1.

WM. H QUINN.

In the Mohegan branch, Ashland county, Ohio, sometime in October last, sister MATILDA FACKLER, wife of brother Joseph Fackler, aged 24 years 3 months and 20 days. Funeral services by Elder Jacob Garver, and Moses Weaver, from Rev 14: 13.

In the Ashland branch, Ashland county, Ohio, on the morning of Jan. 14th, 1873, of consumption our beloved young sister FRANCES BURKHOLDER, aged 23 years 1 month and 27 days. She was the daughter of brother Wm. and sister Susanna Burkholder. The subject of this notice was a fine, respectable young lady. She would no doubt have passed with many for a good christian, had she made a profession; although loved the vanities and pride of life. But when she began to see that her days, in all probability, would not be many in this life, she resolved yet to prepare for death. She was carried to the water, where the thick ice was cut out, and was baptized according to the directions of the Lord. When carried back again to the house, she exclaimed several times, "Oh! I am so glad!" This took place on last Christmas day. She afterwards requested a little communion meeting; but she took sinking spells so that she was too weak. She was then on the same evening, anointed with oil, according to James 5th chapter, and died next morning. Before she died she said to her associates and sister she must leave them; and admonished them to prepare to meet her in heaven. Oh! that they may take warning, and not delay to wait for a death bed to prepare. They may not have the opportunities that she had to do so. Delay not, delay not. Funeral services to a large concourse of sympathizing neighbors and friends, from the Psalm 103; 13—18, by Elder Moses Weaver, Alphens Dickey and the writer.

The Christian Family Companion. Is published every Tuesday, at $1.50 a year, by Henry R. Holsinger, who is a member of the Church of the Brethren, sometimes known by the name of "German Baptists," and vulgarly or maliciously called "Dunkards."

The design of the work is to advocate truth, expose error, and encourage the true Christian on his way to Zion.

It assumes that the New Testament is the Will of God, and that no one can have the promise of salvation without observing all its requirements, that among these are Faith, Repentance, Prayer, Baptism by trine immersion, Feet Washing, the Lord's Supper, the Holy Communion, Charity, Nonconformity to the world, and a full resignation to the whole will of God, as he has revealed it through his Son Jesus Christ.

So much of the affairs of this world as may be thought necessary to the proper observance of the signs of the times, or such as may tend to the moral, mental, or physical benefit of the Christian will be published, thus removing all occasion for coming into contact with the so-called Literary or Political journals.

Subscriptions may begin at any time.

License or No License.

May we not call the attention of the Brethren in Pennsylvania to the fact, that our Legislature has enacted a law giving the citizens in each county the privilege to vote whether or not license shall be given for the sale of intoxicating liquor in their respective counties? Some of the brethren, at least, think that something should be said to bring the subject fairly before the church. We claim the Church of the Brethren to be the oldest temperance society in the United States; and now should the old pioneer who stood unquailingly at his post through dark and trying times, refuse to act when there is a faint ray of hope to strike the death blow to the monster drunkenness? I am not an advocate of voting at political elections. As an evidence of this I have yet the first vote to cast for a political ruler. But I have no hesitancy in urging the Brethren to vote in a case of this kind. We are not to vote for men to put power into their hands. We are simply saying we do not want liquor sold in our country. It is not a political question, rather a moral duty. Brethren, here is an opportunity to test our sincerity in the glorious temperance cause, an opportunity to assist in banishing one of the worst curses that ever fell upon our race. We have been waiting for the day when God shall tread upon and crush this mass of corruption that is robbing the earth of its beauty, and filling the land with mourners until it shall be everlastingly and eternally dead But let us remember that God works by means, and his hand is doubtless in this work, and can we be doing our duty to fold our arms, sit down and refuse to make use of the means that God has placed within our reach? Remember, the servant who received the one talent was not condemned for abusing it, but for not improving it. When we think of the baneful effects of drunkenness, methinks we will put forth every effort to stop the terrible tide of evil that is sweeping thousands to ruin every year. It is vain for advocates of temperance to write, speak or labor for reform while this shameful business is carried on. "We loath this liquor traffic with a lasting, uncompromising, bitter hatred, and humanity may well weep over this withering, wide-sweeping, boiling river of death, that is so thickly covered with the wrecks of those who might have been pillars in the grand temple of God!—Hate is too feeble a word to express our abhorrence of this hell beverage that is strewing our land with graves, and a hell with the damned. And instead of the gems of thought, and mighty intellects to shape and guard the future of our country, we hear the disgusting babble and quibble of the bloated sot, the screech and vacant stare of the maniac, the cry of those in poverty and distress. Young men and ladies drink the social glass because it is fashionable, and fashion has cursed human forms, and damned millions of human souls. They do not look into the future, but, without heeding the warning voice, they rush madly on until their souls are with the wailing multitude of the lost."

Now the question is license or no license!
Vote yes! and the lava-tide of death
Over cottage, hall and bower,
Shall roll its dark, blood crested wave
While madness rules the hour.

Vote no! and the white winged angel, peace,
Shall dwell in the drunkard's home;
And beams of temperance truth, and light,
Dispel the withering gloom.

Vote NO! and the mother's heart shall leap,
The sister's eye be dry,
The poor inebriate clasp his hands,
And raise his voice on high.

By the cherished heart's great wrong
By the spirit's deathless woe—
In the name of God and the name of man,
Let every vote be NO."

Stylish Churches.

You published a letter from me in the COMPANION of this week. In corroboration of the assertion therein, that there are many souls in Phil'a., who are sick of "stylish worship," I send you the following lines. The pompous unchristian Christianity of the day is doing more to drive weary sinners from the gospel's shining way than all the books of infidels.

SILAS THOMAS.

The Old Man in the Stylish Church.

BY JOHN H. YATES.

Well, wife, I've been to church to-day—been to a stylish one—
And seein' you can't go from home, I'll tell you what was done;
You would have been surprised to see what I saw there to-day;
The sisters were fixed up so fine they hardly bowed to pray.

I had on these coarse clothes of mine, not much the worse for wear,
But then they knew I wasn't one they called a millionaire;
So they led the old man to a seat away back by the door;
'Twas bookless and uncushioned—a "reserved seat" for the poor.

Pretty soon in came a stranger with gold ring and clothing fine;
They led him to a cushioned seat far in advance of mine.
I thought that wasn't exactly right to seat him up so near
When he was young, and I was old, and very hard to hear.

But, then, there's no accountin' for what some people do;
The finest clothing nowadays oft gets the finest pew.
But when we reach the blessed home, all
undefiled by sin,
We'll see wealth beggin' at the gate
while poverty goes in.

I couldn't hear the sermon, I sat so far away,
So, through the hours of service, I could only "watch and pray;"
Then the doin's of the Christians sitting near me round about—
Pray that God would make them pure within as they were pure without.

While I sat there, lookin' all around upon the rich and great,
I kept thinkin' of the rich man and the beggar at his gate;
How, by all but dogs forsaken, the poor
beggar's form grew cold,
And the angels bore his spirit to the mansions built of gold:

How, at last the rich man perished, and his spirit took its flight
From the purple and fine linen to the home of endless night;
There he learned, as he stood gazin' at the beggar in the sky,
"It isn't all of life to live; nor all of death to die."

I doubt not there were wealthy sires in that religious fold
Who went up from their dwellin's like the Pharisee of old;
Then returned home from their worship,
with a head uplifted high,
To spurn the hungry from their door with naught to satisfy.

Out! out with such professions; they are doin' more to-day
To stop the weary sinner from the Gospel's shinin' way
Than all the books of infidels, than all that has been tried
Since Christ was born at Bethlehem—since Christ was crucified.

How simple are the works of God, and yet how very grand!
The shells in ocean caverns, the flowers
on the land,
He gilds the clouds of evenin' with the gold right from his throne,
Not for the rich man only—not for the poor alone.

Then why should man look down on man
because of lack of gold?
Why seat him in the poorest pew because his clothes are old?
A heart with noble motives—a heart that God has blest—
May be beatin' heaven's music neath that faded coat and vest.

I'm old—I may be childish—but I love simplicity;
I love to see it shinin' in a Christian piety.
Jesus told us in his sermons in Judea's mountain's wild,
He that wants to go to heaven must be like a little child.
Our heads are growin' gray, dear wife;
our hearts are beatin' slow;
In a little while the Master will call for us to go.
When we reach the pearly gateways, and look in with joyful eyes,
We'll see no stylish worship in the temple of the skies.—Sunday Republic.

A Lesson for Young Men.

The second trial of Edward S. Stokes for the murder of the notorious Jas. Fisk, was concluded by the verdict of "Guilty of murder in the first degree," on Saturday last. On Monday, just one year to-day after the murder, the sentence was given, fixing the execution for February 28th, and the prisoner was placed in the "murderer's cell."

Stoke's career is a fearful lesson for young men who have entered upon a "fast life." He was the son of a retired cloth-merchant, and was the eldest of a family of two daughters and three sons. The family lived in opulence, and their culture was of the best; in a worldly view it was endowed with all that seemed necessary to ensure happiness. Young Stokes recieved a university education and at about 17 entered a house in New York; soon afterward he engaged in business for himself, but failed, heavily involving his father. He then embarked in an oil refinery at Hunter's Point, and thus became associated with Jim Fisk, whose influence in the Erie Railroad, the great thoroughfare to the oil regions, made the business highly profitable. Stokes' receipts at one time amounted to $1,000 per week.

In 1864 he married the daughter of a prominent furniture dealer in New York, a gentleman of immense wealth. The next scene in the drama introduces the harlot Mansfield. On account of his relations with her, Stokes' wife, in 1871, went to Europe with her only child, and a quarrel with Fisk also followed which was not settled until the tragedy in the Grand Central Hotel last winter.

The elder Stokes, after thirty years of luxurious retirement is now bankrupt and houseless, the second son died two months ago of grief and shame at the family reverses, the youngest still clings to his culprit brother; one of the daughters died two months after marriage, the other was discarded by her husband for her sympathy with her brother.

For the COMPANION.

Family Love.

I have ever admired the true and trusting love that is always blooming forth in a family. The father, the mother, the brother, the sister, they love each other so fervently, that they are not only ever willing to trust each other with the utmost confidence, their greatest secrets, but they are ever ready to forgive a tresspass, and to smooth, as much as possible, the faults of each other, and overlook all misdoings; and if some occurence would cause one to think hard of another, it naturally would soon all be made right, and their love toward each other would only be increased. All the little ups and downs in a family only bind their affections together more firmly; and every little jangle seems only to occur in order that they more fully appreciate each other's love.

The love that exists in a family does not, at mature years, when all have left the parental shelter, and are far separated from each other, grow weak and become old. It is true, each may have his own care, but that does not, and can not, quench this ardent love and affection. It is too strong to be even shattered. We are closely linked together, even, if we dwell far from each other. This love is everlasting, it cannot be severed. Even death cannot sever it. When one of the family is called from time to eternity, the rest do not cease to love that departed one. Years and years afterward, the memories of that form cluster around our hearts, and we cannot refrain from speaking of some of the most pleasing transactions of that loved being while travelling here with us.

What is it that causes those memories to cluster arouud us? and what is it that prompts us always to speak of the good acts of the departed? It is love, unselfish love.

Nineteen years ago to-day my oldest brother was laid in the cold grave; and many severe afflictions, as well as many sad trials, surrounded and overshadowed the family time after time; but notwithstanding all our troubles, not one of us has forgotten to love and cherish fond memories of that departed brother. We think and talk of him yet; we dream of him yet; and it seems we almost care for him yet. We can see the loved form today as plainly as we did nineteen years ago. We love him with the rest of us.

It is different outside of the family. We may have dear friends, that we esteem as very true, yet we cannot love them so trustingly, from the fact that we are not of the same parents. So it is in the church, too. We are compared to a family, and it is a good comparison. We are very trusting and loving, and invite all to come, too, so that we be of the same Parent, and, consequently, feel a oneness.

Brethren and sisters, let us be in strong union, and work together, always loving each other. May we all meet in happiness, is the wish of your unworthy sister.

The Gospel.

Go ye therefore and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost: teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you; and, lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world. Amen. Matthew 28: 19, 20.

The herald of the cross, should pour from his heart, richly filled with the treasures of experimental religion, the soul saving truths of the Gospel. The ministers of the Gospel of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, should possess all the perfections of graces—faith, that works by love and purifies the heart; hope, the anchor of the soul, sure and steadfast; love, that burns with an even, intense flame, consuming all that opposeth or exalteth itself against the knowledge of God; zeal, ardent and uncompromising, bringing body and soul to the altar. When they possess these requirments, they will say, in the language of Paul, "I am willing to become all things to all men, that I may save some."

The doctrine of Christ is, a free salvation; so that, whenever the minister meets his congregation, be there many or few, he feels no hesitancy in offering salvation to every soul present; and accordingly he tells them, that "Jesus Christ by the grace of God, tasted death for every man."

Secondly, a present salvation; which is salvation by a living faith as the condition of our justification before God.

Thirdly, the doctrine of holiness, as the Christian's highest privilege and most indispensible duty. St. Paul terms it "the mark for the prize of our high calling of God in Christ Jesus."

The doctrine of our blessed Lord and Savior, Jesus Christ has been long and well tried. It has stood the fiery ordeal of many centuries, and come forth as gold tried in the furnace of earth, purified seven times.

Ministers should never lose sight of the spirit and practice of gospel holiness, in all its hights and depths, as the leading and essential qualification for the Christian ministry. The herald of the cross may speak with the tongue of angelic elegance; but if he lacks love, the constraining principle, (2 Cor. 5: 14,) he will be only "as sounding brass or as a tinkling cymbal." St. Paul saith, "The love of Christ constraineth us." Constraining love only can carry fire to the frozen heart, and make the terrified sinner cry, "What must I do to be saved?" When one of those master-spirits, from the sacred desk draws the gospel bow at a venture, his arm is nerved with an almighty energy, the arrows of the Almighty will be sharp and powerful in the heart of the King's enemies.

Ministers of the Gospel should be men of one book, carefully studying the Bible—men, mighty in prayer, going from their knees into the pulpit, and there, with enlarged hearts, losing all sight of self, preach as dying men to dying men. Holiness should be in every composition, and make a part of every sermon. Blessed is the minister that shall be found so doing. Though his preaching abilities may be small and lightly esteemed by a misjudging world, yet, clad in the gospel panoply complete, having on the armour of righteousness, he will turn many to righteousness and shine as the stars forever.

Ministers should not only teach the church publicly, but from house to house, visiting their families, and encouraging and praying with them; by which means they will be strengthened, and made to walk in the fear of God and in the comforts of the Holy Ghost. By this means they will be instruments in strengthening the weak, binding up that which was broken, and bringing back that which was driven away. The Holy Ghost hath made the ministers the overseers, to feed the church of Christ, which he has purchased with his own blood. As the dew upon Mount Hermon, and as the dew that descended upon the mountains of Zion, so may the Lord command his blessing upon his people—Life Everlasting.

Why Is It?

Yes, why are the Brethren of Northern Ind. so indifferent on the subject of education? Why do they do so little to nourish and advance an Institution, that they have founded and call their own? Why do they not redeem their pledge to the citizens of Bourbon, to make Salem College a first class Institution of learning?

Dear brethren, the above are questions that are put to us almost every day; and they are certainly of sufficient moment to receive an answer. We have always let the applicant down as easily as possible when such interrogations were made; hoping that the day was not far distant when the founders of Salem College would, by a united and determined effort, remove all cause for such perplexing questions; but our hopes, so far, have been in vain. We have waited long for a hopeful move, and are waiting still. The wise man tells us, that it is better not to vow at all, than to vow and not pay; and if his language is true, it is surely better for us not to make promises, and especially to the world, than to promise and then stand aloof from the fulfilment of the same. He that putteth his hand to the plow, and then looketh back need not expect to reap a very rich reward. Such a course of procedure by the church or any portion of it, will never raise the standard of education, much less, that of Christianity, among them. How can the Brethren exert a salutary influence in the world, while they, from neglect, or any other cause, fail to meet their agreements with the world, without giving satisfactory reasons for the same?

We have frequently heard it said by individuals deeply interested in the success of Salem College, that they requested it should be given into the Brethren's hands, knowing that they had the means to carry it on successfully, and believing whatever they agreed to do, would be done; but as so little has been done, they have almost, if not quite, lost their confidence in them as a people of unwavering veracity.

Brethren, this is certainly an unpleasant state of affairs, to say the least, and the longer it continues, the more dangerous it appears. We feel it our duty to speak freely and plainly, and doing so, we hope that no offense will be given to any one. It is surely high time that we come to a proper understanding on this important subject, and it can only be done by talking plainly. To hide vice and boast of virtue, is far from true wisdom.

Some may say that they were not counseled in reference to the founding of Salem College, and hence are not responsible for errors that may have been committed. No doubt this is true; but there are those who did acquiesce in the move and promised to give the Institution a hearty support; but if founding an Institution, and then leaving it to live, or drag out a miserable existence by its own strength, is supporting it, we must confess ignorance of the English language.

Whatever is worth doing at all, is worth doing well. Now, if the Brethren of Northern Ind. have discovered that their move was a wrong one, and that a College is a source from which no good can emanate, let them frankly acknowledge it, stop the further progress of the Institution, and fairly adjust the claims of injured parties. But if the need of advanced education is still felt among them, let them rally at once, and make Salem College worthy of their patronage. Life is full of errors, and none dare claim perfection. They twine themselves among our action, as the vine twineth among the branches of the oak, hiding the finer specimens of nature. Many mistakes may have been committed in attempting to advance the cause of education, but their record is with the unredeemable past. The present only is ours, so let us awake to effort; moving in one united column against ignorance, the common enemy of virtue and happiness. Where ignorance reigns supreme, vice and degradation are found in close proximity.

As I have other things of which I wish to speak in this communication, I shall leave the discussion of the necessity of advanced education among the Brethren for those of more experience.

Admitting its necessity, then the great problem for us to solve at the present is, can Salem College be made what the Brethren agreed it should be? and if so, how is it to be done? To the first question, we reply, emphatically, yes; and shall make a few suggestions as to the manner of doing it.

We do not pretend to teach in this matter, farther than our acquaintance with the workings of the College has taught us. It is presumed that no other Institution of learning in America, started under greater difficulties, or ever contended against so much opposition as Salem College; yet she survives, and, we trust, she may for many years to come. The present term has been successful so far; but unless the Institution be furnished with the modern facilities for teaching, and a proper influence be brought to bear in favor of it, no one need expect it to compete with others in number and advancement. But more to the point.

1. If there is any difficulty in the church arising from her connection with the the College, let it be settled as soon as possible. If there is none, so much the better; but we fear some things would not bear a very close inspection.

2. All claims held against the College should be speedily adjusted; then it will be in a fair way to prosper. It will inspire its friends at home with new zeal and courage, and improve her character abroad.

Next, it should have a good financial basis, to avoid embarrassment in the future: and it can easily be given, if the Brethren of Ind. will only unite and take the proper step. Say, an endowment fund of fifty thousand dollars is needed; and that, we think, would be sufficient, until a new building is needed. Now if each church in the entire District be called together and have the matter fairly represented to its members, we believe the amount will be raised. Let a sufficient number of competent brethren be authorized by the Trustees to visit every member in the District, and receive what money he may be willing to give, or take his note drawing six per cent int. to be paid semi-annually. This would place cash enough in the hands of the Trustees to erect a suitable boarding-house; and furnish the College with at least the basis of a library, and good apparatuses for illustrating the more difficult branches of Science.

How many brethren are there in Ind. that could not, by a little self-denial, pay three or six dollars interest annually? There are hundreds who could pay the interest on five hundred, or even one thousand dollars, and still live in luxury. We really think it a shame that the Brethren should ask the world, or those at a distance, to give them aid, until they first make a good beginning themselves. It is not only unnecessary, but useless, because those nearest are expected, and justly, too, to lead the van. The churches in Bourbon Township are the ones to move first, and if they will only do it, we will warrant plenty of followers. Many make good soldiers that are unqualified for leaders. We have frequently heard it said by members in poor circumstances, that, if the Brethren would take hold of it in earnest, they would give their notes for from one to three hundred dollars, and pay the interest semiannually, rather than have the cause of education retrograde in their midst.

Now, if the matter is so easily accomplished, it is certainly unwise to let golden opportunities pass by unimproved.

The Brethren of other states, as well as those of Ind., need education; and they will either come to our aid or establish schools of their own, which would be better.

After the above steps are taken, there are many other things needed to carry on the work successfully. The only thing that will secure a liberal patronage from the church, is, to have exemplary members for teachers and officers. It may be difficult at present to get those who are both morally and intellectually qualified; but that trouble will disappear, as soon as all things are in proper order. The surroundings of the students, while at school, should be such that pure christianity can find its way to the heart. Then, and only then, can we hope [illegible] the fulfilment of the great and noble end of education. If regular preaching and Sabbath-school be connected with the College, and the seeds of plainness and humility be sown broadcast among the students, how can it fail to bear golden fruit in after life? There need be no fear that the institution will not be patronized when it is once set in order; for there are hundreds, both in and out of the church, that long to attend a school, where humility, instead of pride, is the ruling element. Letters of inquiry about the school are being received from nearly all the states; and many writers express a desire to connect themselves with it provided it reports favorably; which it will soon do, if all will put their shoulders to the wheel. None need expect to establish a good school without meeting and overcoming opposition. A kite will raise against the wind, but not with it, then let us not waver, but nobly dare to do the right, and success will crown us in the end.

Following Afar off.

The above declaration of the inspired penman, was written, no doubt, for our instruction; and our design in the present article will be to draw a lesson from the same. It was a time of great trial to the Apostle; although he had confided in his own strength to such an extent as to say to his Lord and Master, "Although all shall be offended, yet will not I." But being informed that, even in that night he should not only be offended, but should deny his Lord, "he spake the more vehemently, if I should die with thee, I will deny thee in nowise." But, alas! the hour of trial soon came. The Master is taken; and although an effort is made to prevent, it receives His rebuke; for the scriptures must be fulfilled. They now "all forsook him and fled." But Peter gathers up courage and "follows him afar off."

From the above brief sketch, we may draw a lesson of the weakness of the flesh. The spirit truly, may frequently be willing but the flesh is weak. But when we look around us upon the Christian professing world, we cannot help but conclude that too many are following Christ afar off.—Talk to them of the humiliating doctrine of Christ, of baptism, of feet-washing, of self-denial, of non-conformity to the world, non-resistance and numerous other items that we might mention, and they will tell us, "It is not necessary to be so particular in these things." Is this, we ask, not following "afar off?" At least it does not manifest to us the Spirit of Christ; and it is declared in Holy writ, "If any man have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his."

But, Christian brother and sister, we desire to bring our remarks a little nearer home; for it is to us we are writing. Is there not danger that we, too, may fall in line, and be found too far from Christ, who is the bright pattern of the Christian life?" While all seems to move on smoothly, and there is perhaps no wave on the calm sea of life, and, more especially, while we are surrounded by Christian influences on every side, then it may be easy for us to move on in our sphere; but when, as in the case of Peter, the hour of trial comes, when "persecutions arise because of the word," there is danger of falling back and following only "afar off."

Let us, then, not trust in the weak arm of flesh, nor in our own strength, but let our trust be in God; yea, let us draw nigh unto him, and he will draw nigh unto us. In these days of almost universal apostasy, or departure from the simplicity of the gospel of Christ, it is highly necessary that the little flock stand firmly on the rock Christ Jesus—that they keep near his bleeding side: for he is their only refuge. This we may do by taking unto us the whole armor of God. And should we, (as many of us no doubt will,) taking a retrospective view of the past, find that we have followed too far off, or in other words, that we have lived beneath our glorious privileges, as the followers of the meek and lowly Lamb of God, oh! let us endeavor to redouble our diligence before our God. Although a look of reproof from the Savior (his word) may cause the penitential tear to flow, let us "draw nigh unto him with full assurance of Faith," endeavoring, in the future, to live nearer and still nearer to Christ— to become more and more assimilated unto his divine nature; so shall we be more like him, our influence for good become more extensive, and, finally, blessed thought! we "shall see him as he is." Yea, "our vile bodies shall be fashioned like unto his glorified body."

And you, friendly alien, who may chance to read these lines, you, who are yet living so far from Christ, be persuaded also to draw nigh. Oh! why will you live from him, while his mercies are extended to you, since he shed his precious blood for you, and offers now to make or bring you nigh through the efficacy of the same, on the easy and equitable terms of his everlasting gospel?

Although the Scriptures are now translated into many of the original languages upon the face of the globe, as well as, some of the dialects, yet much more might be done if a proper course were pursued, and the church, in her united efforts, with her means and talents, would concentrate her power more fully upon this noble work. I would just state here, the number of languages in the world is at the present estimated at about three thousand, of which eighty are claimed by philologists to be original. Through the influxion of foreign immigration, nearly one-half of these are spoken upon the American Continent. It is almost a matter of surprise to think that nearly fifteen hundred nationalities, with their idiomatic peculiarities of language, are now represented in this New World, and yet but three hundred and eighty years have elapsed since the first white man set foot upon American soil.

While much has been done by pious and learned men towards translating the Scriptures into other tongues, much is still left undone. But from the number of versions we have, even at present, in the different languages, and the faithful distribution of the same, in all probability more than one half of the children of men might read the Scriptures in their own language. From present accounts not less than two hundred translations have been made into direct and different languages, including most of the original. However much, then, as has been accomplished in translating the Scriptures into a foreign tongues, no living language is so prolific in pure visions of the Bible as the English. The English language in its rapid dissemination will, at no distant day, be destined to outstrip all other languages. It is already spoken in every quarter of the globe; and at the present day, most of the ablest and best writers produce their rich productions in this tongue. Hence the numerous English versions of the Scriptures, that have made their appearance in this language.

Notwithstanding the many excellent English versions that have been submitted to the crucible of public opinion, none seems to be so universally accepted as King James' Translation. This one seems to give general satisfaction, and is the only one destined to stand the test of time, as a text book in Christendom.

If I mistake not, this is the third translation, proper, of the Scriptures into English: first, Wicklieffe's, in 1290; second, Tyndale's, in 1526; and third, King James', in 1611.

Although this translation is always called King James', it is in nowise the King's, but the work of forty seven men appointed by his Majesty expressly for this great and important work—men, who were well versed in biblical literature, and conversant with oriental languages. The work was prosecuted for a number of years, according to certain restrictions laid down by the King himself. Undoubtedly, a more detailed account of the history of this translation, would prove very interesting to the reader in general; but we have so little upon record, that I forbear to enlarge here upon this part of my subject.

The number of English versions made since King James' I have not been able to exactly ascertain; but they are quite numerous. Among others recently brought before the people, that by the "American Bible Union" deserves our more particular notice. I trust, however, that most of the readers of the COMPANION have had the pleasure of examining this "Revised Translation of the New Testament," as it has been extensively circulated throughout our fraternity, as well as other churches. It has been the special aim of the society, through the members of its commmittee, to give a correct rendering of the sacred text, in language that comes within the comprehension of all. Quite a number of words have been introduced into this version that are not found in King James'. For the satisfaction of those that have not read this translation of the Scriptures, I will give a short list of words used by the revisers: Darnel, beach, forfeit, underworld, light-stand, specter, platter; praetorium, vat, exactor, denery, &c., &c. But since this translation does not meet the favored dogmas of the so-called Christian world, however superior it may be over former translations, it is not likely, on account of its faithful rendering of the original text, that it will be received and adopted as the standard text book in the future, by all the liberal Protestent churches.

The question arises in the minds of many, "When and by whom were the original inspired writings of the Scriptures compiled?" Eclesiastical writers pretend to know more or less about these things; but we believe it is more or less shrouded in the mystery of the past. The eclesiastical writers of the Scriptures, were the apostles themselves, and certain disciples of the apostles, together with Moses, the prophets &c. Holy men of old spake as the Spirit gave them utterance, and when they wrote under the same influence; likewise were the apostles moved to write histories of the transactions of Christ and the apostles, although the canonical writings of the apostles were scattered in so many books, in gospels, and epistles. From the very fact that they were inspired in their very nature, undobtedly, these books were read in the primitive Churches and jealonsiy preserved and cared for by the primitive christians, so that they became not commingled with other uninspired writings of the same nature. God had his hand in thes things, and at an early age in the Christian church, caused these inspired books to be collected unto one volume, called the Bible.

What Shall We Do?

"What shall we do sweet friends,
In the year that is to come?"

A short time ago the New Year—the young year,—with high hopes and happy resolves, was ushered in. A new life was opened to each mortal; and a new lease of life was granted each one as he stepped over the threshold. But pause a moment; what does my text say? or, rather, what meaneth the question asked of each immortal soul? Something to do is the burden of that query; and something must be done, or the record will close a blank, or be filled with deeds which should make their perpetrators blush with shame.

Do you ever think, at the beginning of the year, what your work shall be during that time, beside the sordid "what you shall eat, and what you shall drink," or whether your influence will tip the balance in favor of weal or woe? I know we all live, from day to day, as though there were no end of life, no final reckoning, no Judgment. "Eat drink and be merry" seems to be the order of the day; and even a hand writing on the wall would scarcely restrain the mad impetuosity of the present day. No law of God or man seems to be regarded, but their "own sweet will" is the law of self-government, or, perhaps, no government at all would be the proper term. Each is a law unto himself; but the mind untaught is an unsafe guide when the immortal soul is at stake.

There is a great work for one and all, if you will put your hand to the plow and press forward in the field of usefulness and duty. I need not point out to you what and where that work is; for it lies all around you, if you will but use your natural organs in the search. Perhaps in your own heart and life there are little sins and prejudices that hinder your growth in grace and your nearness to your Savior. May be some little root of bitterness has sprung up and choked the sweet flowers of grace. Whatever or wherever it may be, you will find it, if you really desire to work in the vineyard, and not be an idler in God's heritage. Be sure and do your duty now, else the time may come when you will repent in sackcloth and ashes, the unkind word or deed, that saddened the life of some one who is now beyond your love and hate alike. The things you most desired then are now only dust and ashes in your grasp. That which you would have compassed the earth to obtain, now lies a worthless prize at your feet, scorned and disdained because of the pain and regret it brought to another life. How deeply regret crimes, but, alas! oftimes to late! The arrow is sped and cannot be recalled; the word is spoken and its work for good or ill is done forever. The record is closed, the year with all its joy and sorrow, its hope and fear, its loving care and lavish tenderness, broken resolves, its deeds undone, its heart pain and yearning, has gone to the eternal past. Learn then the lesson of the hour, "Let the dead past bury its dead;" but from the grave go thou forth, stronger, wiser, better, more able to endure whatever falls to thy lot, and with more sympathy for who, like you, may be plunged in depths of woe and care from which they stretch beseeching hands for help. Let the inborn principle of right lead you to do your whole duty. The strong hold of Satan must be attacked and the enemy vanquished.

Oh! sweet friends, there never was a time that required so much self-forgetfulness, so much battling for the Lord. It is sublime to live and move and have a being, and work for Jesus. Do you realize what it is and must be? Life is sweet at all times, but doubly so, with the thought of living and working for that higher life; that rouses every latent energy, thrills the soul with that expansive power akin to heaven.

The name of the good we might do is Legion. We can keep our tongues from speaking guile, and our hearts from impure and evil thoughts, our hands can soothe the aching brow and fashion many a garment for the needy; our feet can walk no more in ways of sin and folly, but they can be beautiful on the mountains with glad tidings of peace; our eyes can turn aside from beholding iniquity, and our minds be made pure from unholy imaginings. No longer shall the less bow to the greater, but the great law of our being fulfilled, the peace that passes all understanding shall be ours, and our way upward and onward will be but a grand triumphal march, whose end is "beyond the river," where the light from the celestial City beams with a soft radiance, beyond anything our hearts have conceived. The rejoicing of the liberated spirit will fruition "over there."

Hope.

"Be ready always to give an answer to every man that asketh you, a reason of the hope that is in you, with meekness and fear." 1 Peter 3 : 15.

The exercise of hope is common to man. It is well understood to be made up of desire and expectation. Neither of these alone constitutes hope. The first without the last would be despair; and the last without the first would be aversion. The two must be combined to form hope. The principle is well defined in the minds of men in relation to ordinary affairs of life. If a man should tell us he hoped to possess ten thousand dollars on the morrow, we would conclude that he had, not only a desire for that sum, but a reason for his expectation; and if he had none, or no good reason for it, we should not hesitate to say he is a fanatic or a fool. Why should we expect less in matters of religion? men say they hope to be saved, they hope to go to Heaven when they die; that is, they desire and expect to go to Heaven when they die. Now, we ask such a reason of the hope that is in them.

A good reason must be based, first, on a promise of God. If there is no promise of such a remove at death, then the expectation of it is without foundation, and the exercise of mind is presumption, and not the gospel hope. The promise of such a remove at death must not be a matter of mere inference or conjecture; it must have a "thus saith the Lord." God does not leave his creatures to mere conjecture, or the traditions of men; in matters which relate to blessings he designs for them, he gives the most plain and positive assurances and promises. Thus the apostle speaks, Heb. 6 : 17. "Wherein God, willing more abundantly to show unto the heirs of promise the immutability of his counsel, confirmed it by an oath; that by two immutable things, in which it was impossible for God to lie, we might have a strong consolation, who have fled for refuge to lay hold upon the hope set before us." Here we see, for the existence and stability of hope, God does not leave us without a certain and definite promise. Hence if we have a hope of entering Heaven at death, we shall be able to fix on a clear promise of God to that effect; else we have no well-grounded expectation of such an event, our hope is baseless.

Where is such a promise? The notion stands in the wisdom and traditions of men, not in the truth and power of God. If we are correct, then the hope of going to Heaven at death is not a "good hope;" there is no gospel reason for it: it is a fancy, yea, it is presumption.

The gospel hope, then, is quite another matter from the hope of a large part of the professedly Christian church. The gospel hope is that of eternal life through and by a resurrection from the dead, and not of an entrance into heaven when we die. For this hope we have clear promises in the Bible.

What are the promises? We will give you a few examples. Luke 14: 14; The Savior had commanded concerning feasts not to call the rich, "lest a recompense be made thee;" but call the poor, and "thou shalt be blessed, for they cannot recompense thee; for thou shalt be recompensed at the resurrection of the just." Here is a clear promise of the time when the reward of well doing is to be bestowed and it is as wide of the common notion as the resurrection day differs from the day of death. That we do not mistake in this matter, we turn to John 6th, in this chapter, four times our Lord states the time when, and the means by which, his followers are to receive their reward; and we ask, if it looks like a promise of going to heaven at death? See verses 39, 40, 44, and 54: "This is the Father's will, which hath sent me, that, that of all which he hath given me I should lose nothing, but should raise it up at the last day." Here is no intimation of going to heaven at death; but there is a clear intimation that without a resurrection from the dead, Christ's followers would be lost. Yet, as it is the Father's will that they shall not be lost, he has given to his Son power and authority to raise them from the dead at a stated period of time, viz., "At the last day." In the next verse he is still more definite as to what he raises them up for: "This is the will of him that sent me, that every one which seeth the Son, and believeth on him, may have everlasting life: and I will raise him up at the last day." Does Jesus say, "I will reunite his soul and body again in in the last day?" No, "I will raise him up." What does him signify: Is it his body? Him is that man, not that man's body merely. He is raised up, and that is at the last day, and for the purpose of giving him that which the Father hath willed, viz., everlasting life. That our Lord's followers thus understood the matter is evident in the discourse of Martha with him, John 11th; "Lord if thou hadst been here, my brother had not died, said Martha, verse 21st. Jesus said unto her, "Thy brother has gone to heaven? No. Thy brother shall rise again."

Riches.

Riches is a very simple word; yet it embraces a vast amount. In other words, in wealth lie hidden many mysterious things. The rich may live in great splendor and pomp, and carry, as it were, the world with them; yet "a man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth." Our happiness and comforts do not depend on our having a great deal of wealth. The life of the soul, undoubtedly, does not depend on it; for the things of the world will not satisfy the soul, its needs or desires, nor last so long as the soul will exist. No, even the life and happiness of the body do not depend on having a vast amount of these things; for many live and get through this world comfortably, and have but very little of its wealth. On the other hand, many who are blest with wealth live miserably. They have no peace day nor night, and bereave their souls of good—the good which God so dearly bought on Calvary's rugged brow.

Now look back nearly nineteen centuries ago, and see Jesus, the Son of God and Savior of mankind, lying in a manger. Poorer, man never was. He was laid in a manger with swadling clothes around him. It was an instance of humiliation of our Lord Jesus. You will find recorded in John 13th an act of humble condescension, and one that we are strictly commanded to observe. It was an act of humiliation. Now if we want to inherit eternal life, we must be humble; we must deny ourselves of a great many pleasures that wealth might afford. Christ says, "Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me; for I am meek and lowly in heart, and ye shall find rest unto your souls; for my yoke is easy and my burden light." These are the words of him of whom our Father in Heaven said, 'This is my beloved Son, hear ye him:"

"Riches and honor was not the great gain,
For which our dear Savior on Calv'ry was slain.
Nor did it bereave him of his glory on high,
When Jesus on Calv'ry for sinners did die."

Are we Justified by Faith Only?

"That we are justified by faith only, is a most wholesome doctrine, and very full of comfort." So says the discipline of the M. E. Church, Cincinnati Edition, 1864, Art. 9.

"Ye see then how that by works a man is justified, and not by faith only." So says James, chap. 2, verse 24—Divine Discipline, or Book of God, called the Bible.

Reader, look at the above, and see whether some one has not told an untruth. Dare any one say the first is true, and the other is taken from an "epistle of Straw?" I say, with Paul, "Let God be true, but every man a liar."

The doctrine that we are saved by faith alone, taked in an unqualified sense, is preached so often, that hundreds really believe the doctrine true, and of divine appointment; and it is to be feared that thousands and tens of thousands will be most wofully deceived thereby. To say we are saved by faith alone, is mockery in the sight of God. Taking isolated passages of scripture, disconnected with other essential principles of the gospel, and the faith alone doctrine seems all-sufficient in the eyes of many; especially, if so brought up. In like manner we might take certain passages of scripture and get up a "wholesome doctrine," to all appearances, that we are saved by baptism alone. As an instance, Peter says, in speaking of Noah and the ark: "The like figure whereunto even baptism doth also now save us (not the putting away of the filth of the flesh, but the answer of a good conscience toward God.)" 1 Pet. 3: 21. Here we have it: we are saved by baptism, and get thereby an answer of a good conscience toward God. Yet in the face of this it would be absolutely absurd to say, "That we are justified by baptism only, is a most wholesome doctrine' and very full of comfort."

In like manner we might get up a doctrine, "very full of comfort" to many, provided they believed it, that we are saved by grace alone, so that man needs to do nothing at all; or we are saved simply by calling upon the "name of the Lord Jesus Christ; or we are justified by his blood only, or justified by knowledge, or justified by works only. Taking any one of these means alone as a doctrine of salvation or justification, and what kind of a doctrine would it be? It would be dead, lifeless, and as impure as the waters of the Dead Sea. And just so with the doctrine, "Justified by faith only." A doctrine wholesome, and very full of comfort indeed, is this.—We are saved—justified—by all the gospel plan of salvation taken together as a complete whole: it being all the love of God, and power of God unto salvation to them that believe.

Grace is the moving cause; Jesus Christ, the efficient cause; His blood the procuring cause; Knowledge, the disposing cause; the name of the Lord, the immediate cause; faith, the formal cause; and works the concurring cause. All these causes together bring about a wonderful effect; nothing less than eternal life to sinners. They raise a ruined world from the verge of hell to the realms of heavenly glory. Because faith stands as the great master-wheel in the work of salvation, is no reason why it should be singled out as the only one thing needful. All the rest of the machinery would be of no consequence without faith; and faith, disconnected from all other parts of the machinery, would be alone and could accomplish nothing.

Faith only is, like the body without the spirit, dead. But saving faith, that which worketh by love, hath a spirit—the spirit of love and obedience; consequently there is life and activity; and being created anew in Christ Jesus, by the grace of God—being his workmanship, we are "created unto good works."

Viewing faith, then, as the master-wheel, joined in with all the means or principles of salvation, and not being dead, but active, the whole machinery must move, by God's propelling power, so that there is a "running" "well pleasing in the sight of God."

In a complicated piece of machinery, the main wheel, when started, sets all the rest to running, provided all are in their place; but let one be taken out, though it be but a small pinion, a part of the machinery is at a stand-still, and the design of the machine is defeated. So, when saving faith prompts on to action: it being of a living principle, all the characteristics of the divine system of religion are brought into running order; so much so, that Christians run with patience and delight the race that is set before them. But trample under foot one of the least of the commandments, or means of salvation, and we make void the promises of God; and the glorious design of working out our salvation is frustrated. In the great building, or house of faith, the God-appointed accompanyments must be in their place; else, like the ring-port in a building, it must fall if its supports are lacking.

Faith only will be about as effective in taking a person to heaven, as water only will take a man from New York to Liverpool. Let a man try water only and plunge into the bay, and he will not hold out many minutes, but go to the bottom dead. But if he accepts of the means provided, and enters the ship, he may, through the instrumentality of the vessel and power employed, arrive safely at Liverpool, by water; but not by water only. So it is in the voyage from time to eternity; we may go to heaven by or through faith, but not by faith only; because God has provided through his Son an ark, and we are invited to enter in and lay hold of the means; then, through the grace of God—divine power we may reach the harbor of safety.

It is a "most wholesome doctrine and very full of comfort" to know we are justified through the merits of Christ, made available through a living faith, genuine repentance, and strict obedience to the will of God, as expressed in the gospel. To the query, then, "Are we justified by faith only?" we answer, No; the Bible answers, No, and God in eternity, in thunder tones will answer, NO!!!

The Sabbath.

Fresh glides the brook and blows the gale,
Yet yonder halts the quiet mill;
The whirling wheel, the rushing sale,
How motionless and still!

Six days of toil, poor child of Cain,
Thy strength the slave of want may be;
The seventh thy limbs escape the chain
A God hath made thee free!

Ah, tender was the law that gave,
This holy respite to the beast
To breathe the gale, to watch the wind,
And know the wheel may rest!

But there the waves the gentlest glide,
What image charms to light thine eyes?
The spire reflected on the tide
Invites thee to the skies.

To teach the soul its noblest worth
The rest from mortal toil is given;
Go snatch the brief reprieve from earth,
And pass—a guest to Heaven.

They tell thee, in their dreaming school
Of power from old dominion hurled,
When rich and poor with juster rule,
Shall share the altered world.

Alas! since time itself began,
That fable hath but fooled the hour;
Each age that ripens power in man
But subjects man to power.

Yet every day in seven, at least,
One bright republic shall be known;
Men's worldwhile hath surely ceased,
When God proclaim His own!

Six days may rank divide the poor,
O Dives, from Thy banquet hall;
The seventh the Father opens His door,
And holds His feast for all!

Hospitality.

We find this word four times in sacred writ, in a connection that proves it is an important element in the Christian character. Twice is the expression used, "given to hospitality;" again it is recorded, "a lover of hospitality;" and once more is the direct injunction enforced, "Use hospitality one to another without grudging."

If in the time of Titus and Timothy this trait was considered so essential that it was a requisite qualification in a candidate for bishop's honors, it surely cannot have lost its importance in our own day and generation.

But do we rightly comprehend the meaning of the term?

Many persons seem to imagine that to be hospitable has sole reference to the last two syllables of the word; and that to entertain our friends we must needs set before them a repast which would tempt an epicure.

This is a time-honored fallacy, and our grandmothers were firm adherents to this creed. The all-important consideration in inviting guests was, what shall we give them to eat? And the long tables groaned under an array of viands, whose richness and variety excelled the achievements of our modern skill.

Therefore it was no little task to prepare for the large gatherings so much in vogue in the olden times; and when the chance visitor came in, unless the larder was abundantly provided with the delicacies deemed essential, bustle and confusion were unavoidable until the deficiency was supplied.

But it seems as if, in this progressive age, when mind has won so many victories over matter, that we might let this custom of our ancestors rest with their spinning-wheels and their looms, and strive to inaugurate a new order of things which shall prove allied, not to the sensual, but to the divine.

Of course, this does not refer to the literary soirees which only claim to offer "a feast of reason and a flow of soul," but to the ordinary tea-drinkings which promote and sustain the spirit of sociability and good-will in a neighborhood or a town. Cannot these little gatherings, whether invited or unexpected, be more a means of true Christian culture and kindly courtesy, and less an arena for the display of culinary exploits?

Instead of the whole conversation being engrossed with encomiums on the hostess' marvelous biscuit, and preserves, and cake, &c., &c., with recipes for the same, and perchance a disparaging comment upon the less skillful housewifery of some absent friend, how much better it would be to speak words of comfort and of cheer, which should aid our sisters in their various toils and cares.

A little friendly counsel, some experiment or experience of our own, some hint as to the management of the household, or the discipline of the children, some labor-saving invention, or the contents of a new and interesting book, any or all of these themes would furnish the text for pleasant discourse; and those that took part there, would feel strengthened and encouraged by such intercourse.

What should we think of two travelers, meeting on a long and perilous journey, and knowing that an hour hence they must go on in their seperate course to meet no more, if they spent that little hour in discussing the merits of the provisions contained in their pilgrim-scrips, with no word concerning the dangers of the way, or the joys of the homes to which by devious routes they were hastening?

What would be the impression left on either mind by the interview? and would the pathway seem smoother, or the far-off goal any nearer and more to be desired?

And would such intercourse be without a parallel in our own history?

Surely there is something wrong in our social system. "The life is more than meat, and the body than raiment."

This fact remains true, however, we may ignore it; and sooner or later this principle must assert its supremacy.

Alas for us, if we never recognize this necessity of our nature until we behold it in the light of eternity! How dwarfed and undeveloped will our own lives then appear, if our only questions here have been. "What shall we eat, and what shall we drink, and wherewithal shall we be clothed?"

Of course we acknowledge the reasonable claims of appetite; we would have food abundant, wholesome, nutritious, but as much so for the home circle as for the stranger within our gates.

What guest ought to be more highly honored than the silver-haired grandsire, or that household treasure, a genuine grandmother, who sits daily at our board? And should not hospitality, as well as charity "begin at home?"

How many thrifty housewives scrimp and stint their every-day meals; denying themselves and families the luxuries they crave, in order that they may now and then make a great display, and set before "company" the sumptuous repast that they never spread for their own entertainment!

Is this just or wise?

Oh! for the day to come, in which all our houses shall be provided with sunshine and comfort, brightened with pictures, gladdened with flowers, blessed with books, and above all, full of that sympathy and love which should unite the family, and render every home a type of Heaven. Happy the guest who is received at such a fireside, and made to feel that he is not an intruder there, but is permitted to enter into the real life of those who so generously open their doors and their hearts to him!

When that "coming Man" appears among us and enjoys such a welcome, both hearty and heart-felt, he will be able to tell the true meaning of the word Hospitality.—Advocate and Guardian

A Sensible Girl. Example is better than precept, always. A young lady of Kansas, tired of meeting the excuse when urging her poor neighbors to attend church, "Oh! the people dress so much; I can't afford to go in that style," has determined to dress as plainly as the poorest of them need to. Accordingly, she has for the last six months worn to church the same calico dress, costing ninety cents, and a hat that cost her eighty cents, discarding gloves. Thus attired, she has played the organ, and felt "quite comfortable," as she certifies.

No License.

Our readers have already been told that the Legislature of Pennsylvania, at its last session, passed a law, granting to the people of the several counties of the Commonwealth, the privilege of voting upon the question of License, or No License? once every five years. If the people of a county by a majority of votes shall say No License, then there shall be no licenses granted within said county for the sale of spiritous or malt liquors, for other than for medical and mechanical purposes, for the succeeding five years, when the question will again be submitted to the people.

This great question will be voted upon for the first time, at the approaching spring elections, and it is now becoming a question what position those of our brethren should occupy who have been denominated as the non-voting class. With the rest there is no question about the matter. Every brother who is a Christian at heart, and has no scruples against using the right of suffrage, will of course vote upon this subject, and when he does so, will say No License. He could not vote otherwise.

Now we wish to say to our brethren who have been in the habit of not voting, for once lay by all prejudices, and look fairly and candidly at the matter. Let us not call it voting; let us call it holding a council meeting. We have an important question to decide; highly important to every man, woman, and child in the community. We will come together, and each one give his voice as he thinks will be best for the community, and most to the honor of God. And that there may be no reflections, each one will write his sentiment upon a slip of paper, and hand it to a person selected for the purpose, and then return quietly to his home. This, brethren, is what is asked of you in this matter. Do you think there can be any harm in it? We verily can not believe their is. It is no political matter, at least no political party question. A year ago we feared it would be, but we now rejoice that the Lord has prevented it, and given it into the hands of the people, to be decided in this quiet and peaceable manner. And we hope the people will act upon it in such an emphatic manner as to show that they appreciate the opportunity.

We presume it need not be argued in these columns that the liquor traffic is a great evil in the land, and that license is the legalizing and protection of that evil. These things are all very well known to all intelligent readers, too well to require arguments from us. Our readers have been eye witnesses to the sufferings caused by drunkenness. And drunkenness is begotten by the opportunities for drinking. If drunkenness is a crime, making drunkards is a crime. Now think of legalizing, protecting, chartering a manufactory of drunkards, by which its proprietors are emboldened to hold out their inducements to our sons, and our neighbors' sons, to patronize their institutions! This we have been doing by our system of licenses. We are now asked whether we will continue to do it, or whether such institutions shall not at least be discountenanced by law. Brethren, what would you say of licensing bawdy houses all over our country, where your daughters would be exposed to the temptations of profligates, and allured to vices of the blackest hue? Do you shudder at the thought? is it too horrid for you to contemplate? We verily believe it would be a lesser evil than the licensing of rum shops. Our daughters would have more protection against such places, than our sons have against the doggeries.

In view, therefore, of these things, will you not use this opportunity of at least taking away your sanction of this stupendous evil? Then you can say, before God, "I did what I could." Even now plots are being laid by which you may yet be robbed of this privilege. Hundreds of thousands of dollars are being contributed by the whiskey ring, to bestow upon the present Legislature, to induce them to repeal the act before the election. They are desperate, because their pernicious craft is at stake.

And now with these remarks we commit the matter to your judgment. Think of the subject prayerfully, think of it often; and act in such a way that God and your conscience may approve of your course, and by which humanity may be protected from one of the enemies' most successful devices.

We call attention to the following correspondence, from brother Yoder:

EDITORS OF C. F. C. Dear brethren: In response to your suggestion that the brethren of the south eastern (north eastern) Ohio District, tell you how they managed to raise the funds to defray the expenses of last A. M., I take the liberty to tell you what I know about it. We supposed that we had about 3000 members in the two Districts that were to hold the A. M., and we estimated that we needed about that many dollars, so we notified the housekeeper of the several congregations to send us as many dollars as they had members, and the report will show the result. Each congregation of course devised its own plan for raising its quota.

Much diversity of opinion prevails among brethren, as to the best plan of raising funds to defray the necessary expenses of the church. In this congregation the brethren tried the old plan of raising money by voluntary subscription until they became tired of it, from the fact that some who were abundantly able would never volunteer, and consequently the burden did not bear equality on all, in proportion as the Lord had prospered them. We have now adopted the treasury system, as we call it. Each member is required to hand in his tax receipt to the proper officers, and from this date a tax is levied on the same principle as county and state tax is levied. We have found this a great improvement on the old plan, but do not claim that it is perfect, and are willing to exchange it for a better plan if one can be suggested. We should like to hear from others, and as the question is now opened according to the proposed order, we expect to see it continued.

E. L. YODER.

Madisonburg, O.

In connection with this subject we would state, That the Committee of General Arrangements, appointed by the Elk Lick congregation, for holding the next Annual Meeting, held a meeting on last Tuesday afternoon. It was estimated that there are two thousand members in the District, and the committee thought it advisable to lay up three thousand dollars toward the expense of the meeting, and so have instructed their Finance Committee to request the congregations of the Western District of Pennsylvania to contribute to the Annual Meeting Fund of 1873, in amounts equal to one dollar and fifty cents for each member, with the understanding that the surplus, if any, is to be cast into the treasury of the Home Mission, of the District. Therefore the brethren and sisters may cast in freely, as their offerings will be devoted to a noble purpose.

BROTHER HOLSINGER: You will perceive from the above caption, that I am sojourning in a different section of this county. I am engaged in the capacity of a public school-teacher, which I consider quite a responsible position. This place is twenty miles from Liberty, in a neighborhood where the Brethren, so far, have not expounded the word of God. I have been requested to ask some of the ministering brethren to visit this place, for the purpose of preaching the gospel of Christ. From my own observation, there is ample room for an entire conversion or reformation of this people. I am but a feeble and unworthy servant of the Lord; yet I am astonished to find scarcely a sign of genuine morals here, much less a resemblance of Christian virtues. Whenever I have an opportunity, I wish to write to you, in my imperfect and disconnected way in regard to the doctrine I have heard in this section. I am certain the Lord never taught any such a partial and inconsistent doctrine. Being so isolated, I ask and beseech the brethren to remember me at a throne of grace, that I may surmount all my innumerable temptations and hard trials, and come through the fire unharmed and untarnished, well pleasing to the Lord.

In conclusion, my mind leads me in thought to God who gave it and that blesseth us all; invoking Him to have mercy upon us all. Yours in love.

B. S. WHITTEN.

Individual Responsibility.

Many professors of religion fail to appreciate the fact that we are individually responsible for our conduct, not only to the brethren, but to God, the great Head of the Church. Many seem to act as though they expected to be carried along the way to heaven by virtue of a connection with the church, as people are conveyed to their place of destination after entering a rail-road car.

In army life every man is expected to do his duty. So thorough is the system, that no one can escape his turn in the several details. Physical disability is the only excuse for absence from a soldier's place in the daily drill, in the various rounds of guard duty, and "going on picket:" all are statedly called upon. By reason of this strictness, the army is rendered effective. Is it so in our churches, in sustaining the weekly prayer-meeting and Sabbath-school, in active personal labor? One, perhaps, is timid; another is fearful that what he should say would fail to edify; while others think the ministers or officers of the church can occupy the time; and others are faultfinders; they cannot pray, and do not approve of praying in a public congregation. Singing they never learned, and, therefore, justify themselves by staying at home. Sunday-schools they do not approve of, for several reasons: they are not conducted to suit them; the superintendent is unqualified for the task; the officers and teachers they do not like; they are not all members of our church, and should not be allowed any freedom or privilege to take part in holding the school. Thus they go on from year to year, looking to see the mote in some brother or sister's eye; but cannot, or do not, behold the beam in their own eye. They stand in the way of sinners. The example they show leads many away from the path of virtue to lose their immortal souls.

Numbers thus float along and lead an aimless and useless life in the church. Would that all might feel that religion is a personal matter; that each one must be individually renewed in heart; must by himself act in his relations to the Savior and the church; must alone traverse the dark valley of the shadow of death; and alone stand at the judgment. "Repent for the kingdom of heaven is at hand." Matthew 4: 17. "Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father wich is in heaven." Matthew 5: 16. As one of old, "Praise God with a loud voice." Luke 17: 15. The influence of Christianity in the world is materially impaired, and the time when all shall know the Lord greatly delayed, by a failure to appreciate, as professing Christians, our personal responsibility.

The Five Peaches.

A countryman, one day, returning from the city, took home with him five of the finest peaches one could possibly desire to see; and as his children had never beheld the fruit before, they rejoiced over them exceedingly, calling them the finest apples. with their rosy cheeks, and soft plum-like skins. The father divided them among his four children, and retained one for their mother. In the evening ere the children retired to their chamber, the father questioned them by asking:

"How did you like the soft, rosy apples?"

"Very much, indeed dear father," said the eldest boy; "it is indeed a beautiful fruit—so acid, and yet so soft and nice to taste. I have carefully kept the stone, that I may grow a tree."

"Right and bravely done, said the father;" "that speaks well for regarding the future with care, and is becoming in a young husbandman."

"I have eaten mine, and thrown the stone away," said the youngest; "besides which, mother gave me half of hers. Oh, it tasted so sweet, and so melting in my mouth!"

"Indeed," answered the father; "thou hast not been so prudent. However, it is very natural and child-like, and displays wisdom enough for thy years."

"I have picked up the stone," said the second son, "which my little brother threw away, cracked it, and eaten the kernel—it was as sweet as a nut to my taste, but my peach I have sold for so much money, that when I go to the city I can buy twelve of them."

The parent shook his head reprovingly saying, "Beware, my boy, of avarice."

"And you, Edmund?" asked the father, turning to his third son, who frankly replied:

"I have given my peach to the son of our neighbor—the sick George who has had the fever. He would not take it, so I left it on his bed, and I have just come away."

"Now," said the father, "who has done the best with his peach?"

"Brother Edmund!" the three exclaimed aloud; "Brother Edmund!" Edmund was still and silent, and the mother kissed him with joy.—Selected.

Power of Comprehension.

It was said of Thoreau we believe, that he could take up any given number of lead pencils without counting. A celebrated trapper once assured us that he could tell how many balls he had in his bullet-pouch by placing his hand on it, and without stopping to count them, and added: "I can tell the number of bullets instantly without counting, as you pronounce a word without spelling it." Southey was accustomed to take in the substance of a book in turning the leaves over so continuously, glancing down the pages. Houdan, the magician, trained himself to quickness of perception when a boy by running past a show-window at full speed, and then trying to tell what was in it. We once met a man on a canal-boat who was amusing himself by going from passenger to passenger, and telling almost every one where he had seen him before, on such a train, in such a hotel, in such a street, giving date and place to people with whom he had never exchanged a word. This training of the faculties in particular directions is carried to a marvelous extreme by woodsmen, trappers, and men who guess the weight of animals. Perhaps the most remarkable instances are the markers who leap from log to log at the mouth of a boom, standing on the floating log and translating instantly an old mark into a new one, remembering what equivalent to give for each of a hundred marks, and chopping it upon the log in the time that it floats its length. It is said that Thoreau knew the relative order of the flowering order of all the plants in the Concord woods, and knew the note of every bird, and a thousand out-of-the way things besides.—Hearth and Home.

Boyhood Memories.

BY F. M. SNYDER.

Without memory there can be no reflection. And who, save the thoughtless alone, don't love to recall the fond recollections of their youth? When wholly given to meloncholy, there is no better way of getting rid of those unpleasant feelings, that too frequently are the result of lingering disease, than by calling up fond recollections of the past. Nearly twenty years have elapsed since, to my recollection, I first saw a school-house. It was quite a work of genius, so to speak. The logs were nicely hewn; and those who like moss finish would have admired its roof very much. That day, I recollect very well, and hope I always shall, as there are only a few notable days that I have any recollections of, previous to the time on which I entered school. How I wish that I, then, could have taken a memoraudum of it. It seems to me I must guess the precise day. I know it was mid-winter. I was enjoying a pleasant ride on a load of flax straw that father was hauling home from a neighboring farm. I don't recollect now what kind of clothing I wore. I don't believe they were anything extra. I believe, though, that they were good and warm; because I could look on the snow-covered hills, and the icy boughs of those old oaks that stood near by, without entertaining any unpleasant feelings. If they were none the better for wear, there was quite a consolation in that, I was riding on that kind of material from which much of my clothing was then made. I recollect, while passing the schoolhouse, of seeing a little white-headed boy, some older than myself, stand near the door. I took a liking to him at first sight; and as I thought of him frequently since, I wish that I might have had an introduction to him. It would do me good to know of him now; for I have thought more about him than any other boy that I had seen only once. It must have been his very white-head that first drew my attention. But it seems a little strange that he is so often foremost in my mind. I cannot account for it, unless it is because I am so interested in boys. I like to hear of them becoming useful. I care nothing for the history of bad boys, unless it would be to warn you of their shame. I can never call to memory the days of my childhood, without catching a glimpse of the ruins of some unhappy wretch who was once happy in innocence. Unlucky for them, indeed. What a failure! I tremble to think of them. They would shudder to give you a sketch of the life of their youth, but as I have many things to write relative to recollections of the past I will close by making a beginning, for this time, until I again find time to say something about "boyhood memories."

"Do I Look as if I Had?"—John Angell James went into a mission-school one day; and seeing a boy whose keen eye denoted strength of character, he said to him—

"My boy, have you got a mother?"

The boy stood erect, and glancing first at the speaker, and then at his rags, replied.

"Do I look as if I had?"

The tone and manner of the boy indicated pertness; but the poor boy felt, what you all know, that a mother's loving care is needful to the comfort of a child.—Well-Spring.

One in Christ.—The Rev. Dr. Prime, writing from India, closes one of his letters to the New York Observer, in these words: As I look back upon my own beloved land from these ends of the earth, and from the midst of heathenism of this and other lands which I have been visiting, the points of difference between many of the people of God seem very small, and the points on which all agree, who are one in Christ, appear so much more important that I only wonder that the process of union is not going on more rapidly. May God hasten it, in his grace, for the sake of our perishing world!

CORRESPONDENCE.

Correspondence of church news solicited from all parts of the Brotherhood. Writer's name and address required on every communication as guarantee of good faith. Rejected communications or manuscript used, not returned. All communications for publication should be written upon one side of the sheet only.

Brother Henry: enclosed find 25 cents. Send the C. F. C. to sister Mary Strader, Raleigh, W. Va. 25 cents was all the money she had, but said she would work hard for the balance before the 25th of December, 1873.

Who will do more than sister S. she sends all she had and promised to work for more. The Companion is a welcome visitor to her. There are brethren who could send twenty-five dollars to the editor of the C. F. C., and authorize him to send the paper to such poor sisters, and still have a thousand times as much left as sister Mary had to send. She sends, as a guarantee of good faith, twenty-five cents, all that she had. Four years ago she had her house and all that she had burned.

While writing the above, my attention was called to those red lights in the north, which flash up, for a moment, and then all looks pale. Like a hearty youth, when the messenger of death comes for him, when the read color leaves the face, we think he will soon be gone; so, to-night, while I was looking on the scenery in the north, I thought, "Brethren, our work will soon all be done, and the time for helping the poor to the Companion will soon be past. The time for writing to help brother Henry fill up its columns will soon be over, and then all will be gone. So I thought I would write an article on the Temptations of Christ. If brother Henry will print it, it is all I will charge him.

W. H. Bailey.

Raleigh, W. Va.

Fillmore County, Nebraska, January 13th, 1873.

Dear brethren and Sisters, I will address a few lines to you, through the columns of the C. F. C. We are now living in the West. We have resided in the state of Nebraska about four months; having emigrated from Carroll county, Ills., in August, last. We like the country very much, and also the climate, which is very mild and healthy. We have taken a homestead of beautiful, level, prairie land. People can open farms here without much expense, not having to fence their land. If there are any brethren who desire to get good homes in a beautiful, healthy country, we would like very much to have them come here. There are yet a few homesteads about eight miles west of us; and there is a great amount of rail-road land here, which can be purchased at very low rates, which is splendid land, too.

I presume there are many brethren and sisters who know nothing of the hardships and trials of living in a new country. We have experienced some of them since we came West; and we have also been called to pass through a much sadder, and more sorrowful trial than any of those of every day life, which we so often endure. Yes, dear brethren and sisters, we had hardly been here a month when we had to bury a very dear and winsome little babe beneath the sod of this strange land, and there were no brethren near to comfort us in our affliction, or attend to the funeral rites, which made us feel more lonely yet. We buried two dear little girls in Ills. Oh! pray for us, that we may be resigned to the will of God.

For the Companion.

Moulton, Iowa, Dec. 6th, 1872.

A Letter to "The Evangelist," Published at Oskaloosa, Iowa.

Editors Evangelist: Having read your paper for two years, I think I am entitled to a hearing. Being one of those who deplore the schisms among the professors of Christianity, I have read your replies to "A Truth Seeker" with more than ordinary interest. But I am surprised that you seem to mistake the effect for the cause. It must be admitted, by all honest and intelligent persons, that divisions in Christendom originate not in names, but in differences of opinion on the fundamental principle and ordinances of the gospel.

Among the first and most important of these, after the Reformation, was, the means of pardon. While one advocated justification by faith only, another advocated that it was by election, or more properly predestination; still another, by repentance, faith and baptism. Each of those distinctive theories had its champion advocate; hence such names as "Lutherans," "Calvinists," &c. In each of those distinctive divisions there arose differences of opinion concerning the administration of the ordinances; and, consequently, the old play of names was repeated. Thus we might run down to quite modern dates, and trace each distinct organization to some peculiar form of doctrine and practice; each having acquired a name to designate it from the others. Among some of those different names we find some whose doctrines and practices one so near akin that it is difficult to distinguish their separating peculiarities; yet neither seems willing to yield its pet theory for the mere sake of union with its next kin. Few care for the name; all, or nearly so, have a higher object in view, except, perhaps, your own people; and I honestly believe the name is the smaller part of the great question of union. There is no record to show that Jesus ever called his disciples Christians, while there is every reason to believe that the name Christian was given to the followers of Christ, for the same reason that the followers of Luther were called "Lutherans."

It also seems plain that, that name originated, not in the church, but out of it. The disciples in those days were not so presumptious as to choose a name and quarrel with others if they did not apply it to them; yet it is evident that among themselves they knew each other mainly as "Brethren," the most endearing, simple, and appropriate name that the human tongue could utter; while from outsiders it was most appropriate for them to be called Christians.

When a people assume a high-sounding name, we seldom find them to be precisely what the name indicates; and allow me to say, (and I think you will agree to it,) there is no name so badly abused as the name "Christian" is by those who delight to be called by it. Hence when a people assume a name they should be careful to be precisely what that name indicates, (and in this you come short,) otherwise it is a misnomer. Jesus called his "Disciples," "Brethren," and "Friends." Since there is no proof or inference that Jesus had any preference for that particular title upon which you lay so much stress, why be so tenacious? You had a thousand times better devote your excellent talents, to finding the true doctrine of the cross, and then try and unite all professors of Christianity on that one sure foundation. But before you attempt the latter be certain that you do not discard any of the commands of the great Lawgiver. I think I am pretty well acquainted with the doctrine and practices that you advocate, and am well convinced that there is much room for reformation.

Your assumed name undoubtedly gives you the preference among the ignorant who are taught that it is an indication that you are the true church; and among designing characters, who wear it for deception only: it helps you to swell your members, but it does not by any means, make them "Christians" in the true sense of the term. I find none (no church) who fully comply with the requirements of the "gospel of the Son of God;" but I find those who come much nearer the mark than your people. You talk much about "sects," assuming that your people are not a sect. "Sect" means division; but you base your arguments on the hypothesis that it means heretic. "Heretics" means "those who err in religious doctrine."—Web.

You allow your members to swear, or take an oath; but the scripture saith, "Above all things, my brethren swear not." "Let your communications be yea, yea, nay, nay, for whatsoever is more than these cometh of evil."

You admit adulterers and adulteresses into your body, (see Matth. 5: 32, and 19: 9, Mark 10: 11, Luke 16: 18). But Paul says, "No adulterer shall inherit the kingdom of God."

You allow your members to use the carnal weapon in time of war and in self-defence; but it is written, "Do violence to no man:" "He that taketh the sword shall perish with the sword."

It is commanded, "Salute ye one another with a Holy Kiss"—"a kiss of Charity." This you neither teach nor practice.

"Is any sick among you, let him call for the elders of the church; and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord." This is a command you do not regard. Are you then not "Sectarian?" Are you not "Heretic?" "Are you not carnal?" Do you not "walk as men?" Is there not more partyism than piety in your plea?" and more hypocrisy than God-service in your practice? Do not think me too severe; all errors deserve the scathing rebuke of the Spirit. I would to God that all professors of religion could agree on "the faith once delivered to the saints." There would then be no difficulty about a name. But so long as we cannot agree on that faith, a common name would be mere mockery, a deception of the deepest dye.

Yours for the truth,
G. B. REPLOGLE.

BROTHER HENRY: I can do without the COMPANION no longer. It is a great comfort to me to hear from the brethren. Brother Forney was with us last fall and preached three sermons here, the first of this doctrine ever preached here, and the people were very much pleased. I do wish some good preacher would move out here and settle with us. I do not think it would be long till we would have quite a church here.

Yours truly,
MARY A. KEEFER.

To Noah Longanecker.

Dear Cousin Noah: I noticed in COMPANION No 2, page 22, an article concerning the covering, which you seem to think was a sign of the woman's subjection to her husband. Now the question naturally comes in, why should the woman have the sign that has no husband? Again, you seem not to know what the covering was. If we look back into the Bible, we can plainly see that the covering was a veil; Genesis 24: 65; also, 38: 14. The covering that we now have we substituted; but I think we had better come back to the old order as fast as we can. Of course we must put up with the present order till we can consistantly make a change for the better. Our love and best wishes to you and yours.

JOSEPH OGG.

At his residence in Jefferson Tp., Richland Co., Ohio Jan. 16, 1873, MR. DANIEL LEEDY aged 78 years, 4 months and 28 days.

Daniel was the youngest of five brothers and four sisters who commenced the settlement in Jefferson Township which now bears their name in 1811, John coming in first and Daniel last. They were all industrious and practical farmers, and rendered great assistance to others settling around them in the wilderness. They all belonged to the Brethren Church, and formed the nucleous of that large and flourishing Society surrounding the "Leedy Settlement." Samuel Leedy is the only one now living of the nine. He is over 80 years of age and in feeble health. E.

At her residence, near Somerset, Pa., in the Middlecreek Branch, on the 19th day of October, 1872, sister SUSAN MYERS, wife of brother Joseph Myers, aged 64 years 5 months and 27 days. She was an exemplary member of the church upwards of forty years. She was a strict observer of all the commandments of the Lord Jesus Christ.—A few days before her death, at her request, she was anointed with oil according to the

In the Union City Congregation, Dec. 14, 1872, MARY GEIL, a sister of the River Brethren, aged 69 years 11 months and 3 days. She was the mother of 13 children, 4 dead; grand mother of 54 children, and great-graudmother of 3 children. Funeral service by the writer from 1st Thess. 4th chapter.

She was the mother of 14 children, 6 living and 8 dead; Grandmother of 68 children, and great-grandmother of 27 children. Sister Teeter was blind for the last 4 years, and suffered extremely at times; but she bore her affliction patiently and with christian fortitude. Funeral service by the writer, from Rev. 14: 13.

THOMAS B. WENNICH.

Near Elderigeville, Ford Co., Ill., Dec. 28th brother DANIEL INHOFF, aged 76 years 9 months and 11 days. Disease, cancer internally. He was formally a resident of Pennsylvania, and was for a number of years a member of the German Reformed Church; but last winter during a series of meetings held by the Brethren, he got interested in the Brethren's doctrine and soon after was received into the church by baptism, and spent the remainder of his time zealously in the Christian cause. He was confined to his bed pretty much all the time for 4 or 5 weeks before his disease; during which time he lamented but little, except to see the brethren, refusing meanwhile to take medicine, as he wished to die, and be free from this troublesome world. Funeral occasion improved by brother Jonathan Swihart, from John 11: 25, 26.

K. HECKMAN.

At Shirleysburg, Huntingdon county, Pa., on the morning of the 15th of December, while brother JOHN LUTZ was getting his horse and buggy ready to take his family to Germany, to meeting, he became very unwell, and could not go. He soon became prostrated and gave up hopes of recovery. He was desirous to use all the means of grace afforded; sent for the Elders of the church, and on the 22nd received the anointing of oil in the name of the Lord. On the 30th the spirit fled to the land of silence.

On Saturday, 28th, of Dec., sister MARY LUTZ, wife of brother John, took suddenly ill, and continued so until Sunday, January 5th, 1873, when she gently and quietly followed her husband over to the other side. We hope they have met to part no more. Brother and sister Lutz were the parents of 9 children of whom only 2 are living; one died when small the others arrived at maturity. Owing to one of the children brother Isaac Lutz, living in Ill. the funeral of sister Mary did not take place until Sunday the 12th. Both funerals were attended by a large number of friends and sympathizing citizens. How important that we be always ready.

A. L. FUNCK.

In the Yellow Creek Congregation, Bedford Co., Pa., January 10th, 1873, HANNAH A. FURRY, daughter of Elder John B. Furry who died about 9 years ago, and granddaughter of Elder Leonard Furry, and Daniel Snowberger, aged 16 years and 10 months — After the death of her father, she was taken to her grand parents, Elder Leonard Furry's where she lived and died. She was ever provided for in that manner which makes home pleasant and children and parents happy.— They devoted good care to her home training, and made every provision for a good common school education. In school she stood first in her class. She had marked abilities about her, in every sense of the word. But, like many, she forgot the one thing needful, (was not in the church). Her disease was complicated. No pains were spared on the part of the family physician, to arrest the disease and restore her again. The same may well be said of the family, neighbors and friends. She suffered for nearly six weeks; during which time she was almost continuously in a delirious state. She bore her affliction patiently and with christian fortitude. Funeral service by the writer, from Rev. 14: 13.

commandment. She died as she had lived in hopes of a blessed resurrection and a glorious immortality. She leaves a sorrowful husband and eleven children to mourn her loss; however, they do not sorrow without hope. Her children nearly all are members of the church. She was the mother of 13 children, 53 grandchildren and eight great-grandchildren. She had a love to God and all his laws, and a courage to maintain his cause.

Funeral occasion improved from 2 Cor. 5: 19, by Elder Tobias Blough and Jacob D. Miller.

The Christian Family Companion. Is published every Tuesday, at $1.50 a year, by Henry R. Holsinger, who is a member of the Church of the Brethren, sometimes known by the name of "German Baptists," and vulgarly or maliciously called "Dunkards."

The design of the work is to advocate truth, expose error, and encourage the true Christian on his way to Zion.

It assumes that the New Testament is the Will of God, and that no one can have the promise of salvation without observing all its requirements, that among these are Faith, Repentance, Prayer, Baptism by trine immersion, Feet Washing, the Lord's Supper, the Holy Communion, Charity, Nonconformity to the world, and a full resignation to the whole will of God, as he has revealed it through his Son Jesus Christ.

So much of the affairs of this world as may be thought necessary to the proper observance of the signs of the times, or such as may tend to the moral, mental, or physical benefit of the Christian will be published, thus removing all occasion for coming into contact with the so-called Literary or Political journals.

The Human Beard.

The beard on the face of man, no reasonable person can doubt, was designed to serve important ends in his animal economy. A moment's attention to its structure, and most obvious uses will make this plain. The beard, like the hair of the head, is hollow, and the bulbous root of every hair of the beard is joined to a nerve of the face; into the orifice of each hair constituting the beard, the connected nerve discharges a portion of its own vital fluid which retains its fluid state fully to the surface of the skin. Hence, when the face is closely shaven, thousands of openings are made, through which flow out as many streams of nervous fluid.—Without being able to ascertain the amount of vitality thus wasted, I receive as true an estimate made by another, "that the man who shaves three times a week, wasted thirty times the amount of vital fluid required to sustain an unshaven beard." This outflow continues after each process of shaving, till the fluid spreading, forms a coating which causes the flow to cease. The waste thus made is a draft upon the entire nervous system. Not only are they fountains of life thus invaded by the razor, but also the natural covering of the face is removed, subjecting the delicate termini of the facish nerves, exposed to sudden transitions of temperature, often much to the detriment of health. Let a person thus shaven go out on a cold day, he experiences a painful sensitiveness to the cold, of the part so uncovered, while myriads of doors are open inviting disease to enter, and the nerves are so many telegraph wires to bear the tidings through every part of the animal frame. Is it then marvelous that men living as most do, daily, tri-weekly renewing the barbarous practice of scraping the face with a blade of sharpened steel, even though there were no other injurious expenditures of vital force, often find the stream of life running nearly or quite to exhaustion? That the beard on the upper lip is of great service to the eyes and lungs, I have most conclusive proof.—Whoever has put a dull razor to the beard on that part of the face, starts tears from the eyes. thus demonstrating the immediate nervous connection between that part of the beard and the eyes. Moreover, the beard of the upper lip stands sentinel at the chief gateway to the lungs, to arrest dust and other injurious intruders from entering this sacred temple of life." If, to the disuse of the razor, we add strictly hygienic living. I have no doubt, our lives might be greatly prolonged, even to a good old age, and our sphere of usefulness greatly enlarged.

One Cause of Ministers Breaking Down.

A writer in the Interior among other causes for the breaking down of ministers enumerates tobacco. He says: "The use of this poisonous drug, even in that most disgusting and destructive of all forms, chewing is widely prevalent among ministers. Many, if not most of them, acquire the fearful habit when in college, where it is now almost universal; and they have never had the needed sense, conscience, courage, or economy (which is it?) to bring it to a sudden termination. Some event of our stoutest temperance writers and lecturers dishonor themselves by the same laxness of principal, in respect to tobacco for themselves, that they largely charge against others in respect to wine. Tobacco is one of the greatest enemies of the hour to the physical, mental, and moral health of our nation, and so to the highest progress of Christ's church among us. Terrible as is the loss of money, hundreds of millions each year, spent upon this sensual indulgence, its worst effects are felt in its fatal impairment of the national vitality, and especially among our educated men. The stomach, lungs, liver, brain, and nervous system all succumb to the death-dealing influence of nicotine at last, and in many cases quite early.—It is customary to say of ministers who fail in health in their early youth, or middle life, that they have overworked, and it is quite easy for them to accept so flattering an account of their labors. The writer has known several such in the foremost pulpits and positions of the land and in a large majority of cases they have been in the habit of using tobacco. Here, he feels sure, lies the deadly secret of their downfall, although unrecognized even by themselves."

Thy Kingdom Come.

Thy kingdom come.
I heard a seer cry: "The wilderness,
The solitary place,
Shall yet be glad for him, and he shall bless
(Thy kingdom come) with his revealed face
The forests; they shall drop their precious gum,
And shed for him their balm; and he shall yield
The grandeur of his speech to charm the field.

Then all the soothed winds shall drop to listen
(Thy kingdom come).
Comforted waters waxen calm shall listen
With bashful tremblement beneath his smile;
And echo ever the while
Shall take, and in her awful joy repeat,
The laughter of his lips—(Thy Kingdom come);
And hills that set apart shall be no longer dumb;
No, they shall shout and shout,
Raining their lovely loyalty along their dewy plain,
And valleys round about.

And all the well-contented land, made sweet
With flowers she opened at his feet,
Shall answer; shout and make the welkin ring,
And tell it to the stars; shout, shout, and sing;
Her cup being full to the brim,
Her poverty made rich with him.

Her yearning satisfied to the utmost sum—
Lift up thy voice, O earth, prepare thy songs,
It shall not yet be long;
Lift up, O earth, for he shall come again,
Thy Lord, and he shall reign, and he SHALL REIGN.
Thy kingdom come.

For the COMPANION.

Jesus Wept.

Let us cast our minds back nearly nineteen hundred years to the village of Bethany, the home of Lazarus, Mary, and Martha, and gather some fragments of history of days and years that are numbered with the past.

Bethany was one of our Saviors humble places of resort, because his friends Lazarus, Mary, and Martha dwelt there, and he loved them. Notice, the Lords delights in those that love and obey him. He has a special regard for his children. We may not see him with our natural eyes, but we can realize his presence in spirit; for he says, "My Spirit shall bear witness with your spirits"—"Lo I am with you always."

The Lord delights in his children; yet he will permit sore troubles trials and difficulties to befall them, in order that he may prove them, as he did with his servant Job, or Mary and Martha.

Jesus knew that his friend Lazarus was sick; for the sisters had sent him word saying, "Lord, behold, he whom thou lovest is sick." "He whom thou lovest." Notice, they do not plead the merits of their brother's affection to Christ, but the mercy and favor of Christ to him.

It was not necessary that they inform him of this case of sickness; for Jesus knew his first groan—was sensible of the first short breath he drew. Every sigh he gave was known to the Lord. Yet he lets his friend Lazarus sicken, languish, groan, suffer and die, in order that his mighty power might be manifested or made known in his raising Lazarus from the dead.

Jesus had taught the doctrine of the resurrection in word but, he shows them now an instance, of his power in raising his friend from the dead. When Jesus saw Mary and the Jews weeping, he also wept; and "groaning in himself cometh to the grave," and commands the stone to be taken away. Next he utters a prayer to his Father. This accomplished, "He cried with a loud voice, Lazarus, come forth!" And the lifeless body of his friend becomes animated, rises, and comes forth to the utter astonishment of the Jews, but to the joy of Mary and Martha.

Friendly reader, we are all destined to die, sooner or later. We know not by what means we may be taken away, whether by the slow means of wasting disease, or by accidental means. It matters not to us, if we are but prepared for that solemn change which is coming upon all the children of men, we shall rise in the resurrection of the just; for that same voice that raised Lazarus from the dead, will penetrate the portals of our graves, animate the sleeping dust, and we shall come forth to meet our risen Lord and dwell with him forevermore.

S. W. WILT.

Rural Village, Pa.

When the raggedest beggar that walks the street, with head uncovered and hair unkempt, lifts himself into the air, it is his air. And the sun is his. And the summer is his. The morning and the evening are for him. God makes the curtains around his bed; for he is God's child. He is not so rich in that which men call riches as that old curmudgeon and miser; but oh, how rich he is overhead!—Beecher.

To-day and To-morrow.

If fortune with a smiling face
Strew roses on our way,
When shall we stoop to pick them up?
To-day, my love, to-day.
But should she frown with face of care,
And talk of coming sorrow,
When shall we grieve, if grieve we must?
To-morrow, love, to-morrow.

If those who've wrong'd us own their faults,
And kindly pity pray,
When shall we listen and forgive?
To-day, my love, to-day.
But if stern Justice urge rebuke,
And warmth from memory borrow,
When shall we chide, if chide we dare?
To-morrow, love, to-morrow.

If those to whom we owe a debt
Are harmed unless we pay,
When shall we struggle to be just?
To-day, my love, to-day.
But if our debtor fail our hope,
And plead his ruin thorough,
When shall we weigh his breach of faith?
To-morrow, love, to-morrow.

If Love, estranged, should once again
Her gentle smile display,
When shall we kiss her proffered lips?
To-day, my love, to-day.
But if she would indulge regret,
Or dwell with by-gone sorrow,
When shall we weep, if weep we must?
To-morrow, love, to-morrow.

For virtuous acts and harmless joys
The minutes will not stay;
We've always time to welcome them
To-day, my love, to-day.
But care, resentment, angry words,
And unavailing sorrow,
Come far too soon if they appear
To-morrow, love, to morrow.

The Astronomy of Job.

Every one is familiar with the story of Gallileo. It is a dark scene in the page of history. We are not about to repeat the account. Our object is simply to bring out a new point in Biblical criticism which recalls Gallileo to mind. When the ecclesiastical tribunal, in 1633, condemned the Italian astronomer for maintaining propositions in regard to the revolution of the earth, "philosophically false, erroneous in faith, and expressly contrary to Holy Scripture," and triumphantly pointed to the command of Joshua, "Sun, stand thou still upon Gideon; and thou, moon, in the valley of Ajalon; and the sun stood still and the moon stayed," the churchman thought that the Ptolemaic system was as incontrovertible as the aristotelian philosophy, and that both were in entire accordance with Scripture. They had been, years before, amazed and enraged by the letter of Gallileo to the Abbe Castelli, written to prove that the Scriptures were not intended ro teach us science and philosophy, and that it was equally difficult to reconcile the Ptolemaic and Copernican system with expressions in the Bible. They little thought, however, that there was a passage in Scripture, written more than two hundred years before Joshua crossed the Jordan, in which the doctrine of the earth upon its axis, taught by Galileo, is fully affirmed. Yet such is the case; and, had their enemies been as good Hebraists as they were priests and inquisitors, they would have known that the Lord, when he answered Job out of the storm, had distinctly declared it, and would not have "darkened council by words without knowledge."

Perhaps some of our readers will be not less surprised than the cardinals themselves would have been, to find that the old patriarch had received a revelation on astronomy. They may say that the science of the heavens was born in the pure atmosphere of the Orient, where the moons of Jupiter can be seen without the aid of the glass of Fisole, and that it is not strange that the "greatest among the sons of the East" should be acquainted with the peculiar science of his native land; but they are not prepared to acknowledge that Job was in advance of Copernicus. He was so, however, as we propose to show to their satisfaction.

A few years since, the Rev. Carteret Priaulx Carey, Incumbent of St. John's Guernsey, published a "Translation of the Book of Job." It is in blank verse, amply illustrated by critical notes and a commentary. The work is but little known in this country, though it possesses great merit. We extract the following lines from the thirty-eight chapter. They begin with the twelfth verse—a well-known passage in the English Bible:

"Hast thou, since thy days commanded the morning,
And caused the day-spring to know his place—
To take hold of the wings of the earth,
That the wicked might be shaken out of it?
It turneth round like a seal of clay,
And things stand out as though in dress."

An examination of the original will satisfy any one moderately acquainted with Hebrew that Mr. Carey is correct. The words will not bear the rendering given them in the Anglican version. A verbal critique would be out of place here. The translation alludes to the turning round of the earth like a seal of clay. Both in Assoria and Egypt these clay seals are found. They are made in the form of a wheel, and have their designs wrought in relief upon the tire, and when used were rolled over the soft wax, or whatever was intended to take the impression. Thus the "objects," or designs, "stand out," and as the seal rolls round, the revolution of the earth is declared and illustrated, and one remarkable agreement between science and Sripture is established conclusively.

In Galileo's time, had not a knowledge of Hebrew been limited to a very few, and had not the ecclesiastics of that day, like too many of the clergy of our own time, contented themselves with such acquainance with Holy Writ as may be obtained from versions, there would not have been enacted that dark scene which affords, in the punishment and retraction of Galileo, so triumphant an exhibition of the wickedness and weakness of man. "Human nature," says Sir David Brewster, "is here drawn in its darkest coloring; in surveying the melancholy picture, it is difficult to decide whether religion or philosophy has been most degraded. While we hear the presumptuous priest pronouncing infallible decrees of his own erring judgment, we see the high-minded philosopher abjuring the eternal and immutable truths which he has himself the glory of establishing."

We will add, that they who make it a business to interpret Scripture should inform themselves in regard to the original languages in which Scripture was written, and should not be terrified at the development of modern scholarship.—Appleton's Journal.

"If a man is honest and truthful there is no neccessity for him to say much about it."

Fault-Finders.

BY REV. G. W. ANDERSON.

Some people can find enough to keep them busy. If we are looking for imperfection only, in our fellows, we will see nothing good in them. What we expect, we realize. An account is given of two men who passed with their families through a certain village, both from the same place, and, as it happened, going to the same place. The first, being asked, said he had to move because he had such bad neighbors. He was told he would find the same kind of neighbors where he was going. So he would, because he was looking for that kind. The second man had left, because he had to, and regretted it, because he had such good neighbors. He also was told that he would find such neighbors where he was going. So we always find what we look for most.

We are not speaking of sin, but about imperfections in men. As Wesley says, we can not use the phrase "sinless perfection," for those most fully saved, err in judgment and are open to criticism. A prominent minister said, not long since, that he could not speak five minutes without saying something that somebody could object to. He might fail to express himself very clearly, or the hearer be slow to understand.

How true this is! So of many actions; we may not know the motive back of them, and may, without just cause condemn the doer. It is safest not to judge one is wrong until we are forced to the sad conclusion. Charity believes good of a man until it can no longer believe; then it hopes, and when it cannot hope, it endures quietly, and patiently. Too many make us think of the fly. It will run all over a man to find some sore spot. It quickly leaves the well parts, but fastens on any diseased part. Alas! many have too much of the fly nature and habits. Their only food is the failures and imperfections of others. They take no account of men's good points. Give no credit for ever so much good if a little bad is to be found. They are so blinded by seeing one thing which they think to be wrong, that they can not see many things in the person that are right and commendable. Vultures snuff the air for the scent carrion. Good flesh is not sought by them. So many have their eyes and ears open only to see and hear evil. Now the vulture is an unclean bird, a type of uncleanliness in the Old Testament. People of such habits are unclean, however much religion they may profess. They who have most sin covered up in their hearts can see, or want to see sin everybody else.

Some there are who talk about eye-salve. They have plenty of it and only use it as a magnifying glass to see something wrong in somebody else. If these people will look at Rev. iii. 18, they will discover that the Laodiceans were counselled to get the eye-salve so as to see themselves and their true state. It was not offered as a medium of discovering the evil in others, but the evil in their own hearts. Do not forget this. No longer be as the man represented in ancient statuary, who had a sack hanging in front of him and another behind him; in the former of which he put the faults of others, so as to see them continually, and in the latter of which he put his own faults so as not to see them at all. Do not have eyes for others and none for yourself. Let alone the scarcely discernible mote in your brother's eye and get the big beam out of your own eye. Get and keep right, yourself, and you will not find so much time for inspecting and criticising others.

As fault-finders mete out to others, so it meted back to them, according to the statement of Jesus. No one has any respect for them; no one has any faith in them. How can they be thought well of themselves by men, when they are bound not to think well of others? Society gives us back in quality and quantity just what we give.

O, it is easy to find fault. A man of no genius or intelligence can do this, but it requires a man of wisdom and large experience to help get those right who may be evidently wrong.

People given to fault-finding are a most disagreeable class. They are certainly unhappy themselves, and they render all who are around them unhappy. They breathe a pestilential atmosphere, and are really disturbers of the peace. They are indeed pests, and among the characters that God hates, and all men scorn.

Some, who have read thus far, may apply what we have said to the wrong ones. We know that a class of men who deal faithfully with popular sins and errors, are denounced as croakers and fault-finders. They declare for the right and against the wrong. They dare to point sins out by their names and aim death blows at them. A grand, noble class of men, ranking with prophets, apostles, reformers and revivalists. They dare say with Nathan, "Thou art the man." With Peter they dare to charge falsehood and deception upon them who "keep back a part of the price." They are about the divinely commissioned work of reproving, and rebuking, and exhorting with all long-suffering," and not about the petty work of fault-finding. We acknowledge the danger of running into the latter, but God says, "Cry aloud, spare not, do not be silent or for fear of man shun to declare the whole counsel of God." Be sure to keep sweet in reproving. You can not be sour and show people they are wrong. True! you can not expect them to receive plain-dealing as well as flattery or condemnation, but love will make it more acceptable.

For the Companion.

Consistency.

Is it consistent for us brethren, who hold the non-resistant doctrine, to vote for no license? In No. 3, present volume, I notice an article headed "License or no License," written by elder Moses Miller. Brother Miller appears to have felt it his duty to stir up the pure minds of the brethren in the State of Pennsylvania, in reference to the approaching election on the third Friday of March, on which day the citizens of Pa. shall have the privilege of saying, by their vote, whether license shall be given or not, according to an act passed by our Legislature on the 27th day of March, 1872, and so every third year. Brother Miller thinks this is no political question; but a question to decide what is best for the human family, or our fellow-men. He asks the brethren in Pennsylvania to think seriously of the matter; and if our conclusion drawn from the Scriptures would be, that it is wrong to make drunkards, and as we are to use our influence for good, he asks whether we would not be doing good to go to the polls and cast our vote, no license. Brother Miller also related a number of circumstances, to show what the liberty of selling intoxicating drinks has brought about. I would ask every candid mind, who does not know the like things? Is it not lamentable, knowing all, from the least to the greatest, the many injuries arising from the selling of intoxicating drinks? Has it not pauperized many a man, and made him unfit to manage and unfit for society? Do we not all know of many husbands that get drunk and abuse their companions, the mothers of dear, innocent children, shamefully? Behold the little children, how they are looking on, scared half to death! Behold their broken hearts and the tears in their eyes, sore afraid that father might kill their dear mother! O brethren! can we shed tears also? Do we not often find families that are destitute of sufficient clothes, covering and bread? and oh! how many have no comfortable homes, on account of this great evil of selling intoxicating liquors! In my estimation this is one of the greatest evils in the wide world. Where should we end, if we should speak of all the evils and injuries, brought about through the selling of this destructive poison? how many it cripples and kills, God only knows; and oh, how pitiful! no promise for the drunkard to inherit eternal life! Now, my dear brethren throughout the State of Pennsylvania, I feel satisfied in my mind, that, if we all take brother Miller's advice, that is, to think seriously upon this matter, that we will feel to approach the polls on the third Friday of March, and give in our votes, no license. The only thing yet necessary, I think, is to answer the question, is it consistant for us brethren, who hold the non-resistant doctrine, to vote in this case? I take the position, and will try to prove, that voting, in such a case, doth not conflict with our non-resistant principle. Though space will not allow me to give as full satisfaction as I would like, yet I will try to prove my position in a brief manner.

The word "non-resistance," is derived from the words "Resist not," Matth. 5: 39, "Resist not evil." This cannot mean, that we should resist no kind of evil. It does not mean that we should not resist a maddog or a rattle-snake. No, nature itself teaches us that we should; and, truly, we are commanded to resist the devil, and by so doing, he will flee from us. I would venture to say that we should resist a drunken man, or any other man, or beast, if any of them would try to injure our persons or family. It would be our duty to prevent them of doing an injury, if possible, but not to such an extent as to do them an injury, except the ravenous beast, which we may kill.

Brethren, here is the secret. We brethren, or Christians, are to do no personal injury to any of our fellow creatures; so, if we closely examine into the meaning of the Savior's words, "Resist not evil," we cannot I think, reconcile it any other way than it means not to take revenge; because the words, "Resist not evil," stand in opposition to the words, "Eye for eye, tooth for a tooth." If a follower of Jesus would, by any of his fellow creatures, through the hardness of his heart, receive an injury, the Savior means to say, "That is enough, yea, too much, already. Why, then, do more injury in return?" This, I think, is the idea. As we are not to avenge ourselves, but to give place unto wrath, our part, brethren, is to do good, and not to do evil—to do no personal injury to any man.

Now the question will arise, if the brethren of Pennsylvania vote no license, are they doing an injury to their fellow-men? I will say, No, but they are doing many a one good. It will, in my estimation, be a preventive of many evils and injuries.

Yet, after all this reasoning, some brother will say, "This is not satisfactory to me yet." Why did you old brethren then still admonish us to stay away from the elections. Sure enough, you are right, brother, but I can easily reconcile this question. The old brethren have done so, and, I hope, will continue to do so, under the present state of things; because, if we cast our vote at general elections, we would vote for officers whose duty it would be, according to the laws of the land, at times, and in some cases, to do either personal or national injury, and this would not be consistant with the non-resistant doctrine. So we say, that we cannot consistantly vote a man into office and not stand under his arms after we have voted him into office; and, you know, brethren, that the non-resistant doctrine doth not allow us to fight, injure, and kill our fellowmen. So to vote a man into office, or, in other words, drive him with his cart into deep mud, and there let him stick, would be equally inconsistant. There is a wide difference between the purposes for which men vote. The voting under consideration is not to vote any man into office, but whether to give or not to give license. Now, brethren, I feel as if I had done my part, in connection with what brother Miller wrote, in regard of writing under the aforesaid circumstances.

Yours in the bonds of Christian love.

The Yoke of Jesus.

Happiness appears to be the aim and end desired in every act of life. From the cradle to the grave, man is ever seeking for happiness. The child at play, the scholar at his study, the professional man at his office, the farmer at his plow, are all seeking for that which they hope will give them happiness. So, too, the devotee of fashion, the gambler, the drunkard, hope their life of sin may lead to paths of happiness.

Seeking for happiness being so prominently developed in the character of man, it is no marvel that so few embrace a religion which they have been taught from childhood the young cannot endure. In times of yore the young were not expected to join the church. Little attention was paid to them. They might roam in the pleasures of the world, "sow their wild oats." But when they got a home and the responsibility of a family, it was expected they could endure the "yoke of Jesus."

The "yoke" was interpreted to mean a yoke of such ponderous weight that it could only be born by those who had no pleasure in things of earth.

When Jesus said "take my yoke upon you," did he mean that his followers should pass through the world like monks and nuns, and deny themselves of all the pleasures that God in his wisdom has created for man's enjoyment?

If the "yoke" of Jesus is so galling, why does he say it is easy? If his burden is so heavy, why does he say it is light? If going to Jesus means to be yoked from the pleasures and happiness we enjoy., why does he say "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest?"

To take the yoke of Jesus upon us, is, to accept his government—to follow him. There is not a law, precept, or an example in his life or teaching, that denies his followers any real pleasure; but many instances might be referred to of his care, not only for the comfort and happiness of his disciples, but for all with whom he met.

His first miracle was to turn water into wine. By this act, the Savior did a real favor to the host and added greatly to the joy and happiness of the guests.

The high, the low, the rich, the poor, the deaf and dumb, the blind and halt, all who came to him, received words of comfort and acts of mercy.

His care was not only for the few but the many also. When the multitude was hungry and faint, and there were only a few loaves and fishes, his creative power was put forth, and thousands were fed.

The "Yoke of Jesus" is not to yoke men from happiness but from sin. If the drunkard will accept the "yoke of Jesus," it will not only make a sober man of him, but a happy one too. If the devotees of fashion will take "the yoke" of the Savior upon them, it will lift their feet out of the mire in which the chains of fashion are sinking them to eternal woe, and place their feet on the rock of eternal deliverance.

We may freely eat the fruit of every tree in the garden that will give us joy, happiness, peace, and prepare our spirits for the higher joys of heaven; but of the tree whose fruit produces sorrow, misery, woe, and prepares our spirits for the society of the damned, God said, "Ye shall not eat."

Yes, the "yoke of Jesus" will redeem us from every sin, whether it is the fashion of the world or the superstition of the church, and enable us to walk by this glorious Gospel of liberty, in paths of happiness and peace, that lead to eternal bliss.

ROCK OF AGES.

"Rock of ages cleft for me,'"
Thoughtlessly the maiden sung,
Fell the words unconsciously
From her girlish, gleeful tongue;
Sang as little children sing;
Sang as sing the birds in June;
Fell the words like light leaves down
On the current of the tune—
"Rock of ages, cleft for me,
Let me hide myself in Thee."

"Let me hide myself in Thee,"
Felt her soul no need to hide,
Sweet the song as song could be,
And she had no thought beside;
All the words unheedingly
Fell from lips untouched by care,
Dreaming not that they might be
On some other lips a prayer.
"Rock of ages, cleft for me
Let me hide myself in Thee."

"Rock of ages, cleft for me,"
'Twas a woman sung them now,
Pleadingly and prayerfully;
Every word her heart did know.
Rose the song as storm-tossed bird
Beats with weary wing the air,
Every note with sorrow stirred,
Every syllable a prayer.
"Rock of ages, cleft for me,
Let me hide myself in Thee."

"Rock of ages cleft for me"—
Lips grown aged sung the hymn
Trustingly and tenderly,
Voice grown weak and eyes grown dim—
"Let me hide myself in Thee."
Trembling though the voice and low,
Rose the sweet strain peacefully
Like a river in its flow;
Sang as only they can sing
Who life's thorny path hath passed;
Sang as only they can sing
Who behold the promised rest—
"Rock of ages cleft for me,
Let me hide myself in Thee."

"Rock of ages cleft for me,"
Sung above a coffin lid;
Underneath all restfully,
All life's joys and sorrows hid.
Nevermore, O storm-tossed soul!
Nevermore from wind or tide,
Nevermore from billow's roll
Wilt thou need thyself to hide
Could the sightless sunken eyes,
Closed beneath the soft gray hair,
Could the mute and stiffened lips
Move again in pleading prayer,
Still, aye still, the words would be,—
"Let me hide myself in Thee.'

"BE COURTEOUS."

Every wise farmer knows that if his young cattle be roughly treated, they will generally behave roughly to one another. Even little calves, before their horns begin to sprout, will fight and push each other about if they are used to harsh treatment from the herd-boy. Moreover, it is a well known fact that the young creatures grow all the faster, and fatten all the better, when they are treated with kindness and gentleness.

Surely we may take a lesson from this, in the discharge of higher duties. Does not every wise mother know that, if the elder children are harshly treated, they will generally tyrannize over and ill-use the little ones? And, for the same reason, the little ones soon learn to bicker and quarrel with one another.

One great point in the comfort of every family, rich and poor, is a habit of civility and kindness among themselves. Never allow the bigger and the stronger to strike or oppress the smaller and the weaker; nor the weaker and the smaller to tease and vex one another. If the elder sister is rough to the baby, she is teaching that same baby a lesson of unkindness.

Never let the children contradict one another rudely; nor use unfeeling words; nor snatch away a favorite toy; little faults lead to great. The Bible precept, "Be courteous," includes all these things, and a great deal more. For true courtesy extends to the feelings of others, as well as to their outward welfare.

It is of great importance, in the decent training of all children, that order, neatness, and civility be kept up during meal-times. However frugal be the meal, however simple be the food, let each child be tidy and orderly while partaking of it. Let each little hand and face be well washed, and let the hair be nicely combed. If possible, let each child be provided with a separate plate and spoon; these may be got very cheap. Order and neatness at meals are really points of so much moment in the comfort of every family, rich and poor, that we may be forgiven if the advice here offered seem a little intrusive.

A little incident in my own early childhood is still fresh in my remembrance. I happened to be calling at a very poor man's cottage at dinner-time. The laborer had just come in from his hard work. Dinner was quite ready. A very coarse, but clean cloth covered the table. The children's faces and hands had just been washed; and a plate and a little heap of salt, were tidily laid out for each. The dinner was, indeed a simple one; it consisted only of potatoes; but thanks were as reverently given to the God of all goodness, as if it had been a feast. And the orderly manner in which the children ate their food might have been an example to the children of a household. No doubt the blessing of God did descend on that meal and on that family.

Where Does Education Commence?—Education does not commence with the alphabet. It begins with a mother's look, with a father's nod of approbation, or his sign of reproof; with a sister's gentle pressure of the hand, or a brother's noble act of forbearance; with a handful of flowers in green and daisy meadows; with a bird's-nest admired, but not touched; with pleasant walks in shady lanes; and, with thoughts directed, in sweet and kindly tones and words, to nature, to beauty, to acts of benevolence, to deeds of virtue, and to the source of all good, to God himself.

A Sermon Condensed.—"When my mother says 'no,' there is no 'yes' in it." Here is a sermon in a nutshell. Multitudes of parents say "No," but after a good deal of teasing and debate it finally becomes "Yes." Love and kindness are essential elements in the successful management of children; but firmness, decision, inflexibility and uniformity of treatment are no less important.

Everybody wants to be well off. The question is frequently asked, "How shall a poor young couple start aright, so as to rise to comfortable fortune?" The first point is for the poor young husband to make a confidant of the poor young wife. In that way he will secure her co-operation. Women are naturally economical, notwithstanding the general outcry about female extravagance. And when a woman's heart is full of wedded love, there is hardly any sacrifice which she will not gladly make for the sake of her husband, if he trusts her. The husband can best determine the way and point out the course to fortune; but the wife can best administer on the domestic estate in such manner as to make the most of the husband's earnings. Industry and sagacity on the part of the husband, combined with economy and prudence on the part of the wife, will slowly but surely lay the foundation of a prosperity which may be not only permanent but beneficent. The first step, however, is a copartnership of absolute trust and confidence between the husband and wife; and the husband must be the one to begin it. In this sense it is an eternal truth which the poet utters in the line:

"As the husband, so the wife is."

Above all mistakes is that of supposing that the better nature of a child is to be drawn out, and mised into the strength which we would desire to see in a man, by making him pass through a cold and cheerless youth. The very contrary is the case. A system of petty restraints and privations of severe looks and incessant chidings, only results in depraving the feelings of a young person. He is like a flower, which requires light and warmth, placed in a cold cellar, where it never can acquire its proportions, color or vigor. It is impossible that a child so treated can ever attain to the proper characteristics of a well constituted man or woman.

Do not apologize for your child's fault, in his presence, by saying that he learned it of somebody else; but rather teach him to avoid and despise all evil habits, while he must feel neither harsh nor vindictive toward the wrong-doer. And teach him also that any inner prompting to wrong, resisted and overcome, is the occasion of a greater victory than a temptation from without which is successfully withstood, and from such struggles and triumphs will be wrought out characters of dignity and strength, such as the nation needs.

The Shady Side of Life.—When a man on the shady side of middle life has the fortitude to look around him to note the number of his old and valued friends, he is shocked to find how meagre is the list. One after another has disappeared, from no other cause than that their physical powers, originally vigorous, had succumbed in the feverish, and we might also say, insane battle of life.

One of the greatest preservatives and strengtheners of bodily health in children, is active exercise in the open air. Hence we would always recommend that school-hours should be short; or, if long, that intervals of recreation should be allowed.

What to Take Home.—A loving heart and a pleasant countenance are commodities which a man should never fail to take home with him. They will best season his food and soften his pillow. It were a great thing for a man that his wife and children could truly say of him, "He never brought a frown or unhappiness across his threshold."

Rabbinical Explanation of "I Am That I Am."

To prevent a misconstruction into Polytheism of the various names of the Deity which occur in Holy Writ, the Midrash gives a beautiful explanation of the term "I am that I am," which it renders, "I am called according to what I am." Rabbi Abba, the son of Manta, says: "The Lord said to Moses, 'thou desirest to know my name; know that I am called according to my works; I am called Almighty God, the Lord of Hosts, Elohim and Jehovah. When I judge the creatures I am called Elohim; when I make war against the wicked I am called God of Hosts (Zebaoth); when I visit man for his sins I am called Almighty God; and when I take compassion upon the world I am called Jehovah, which signifies Mercy, as it is said the Lord Jehovah is a merciful and gracious God. This is the sense of 'I am that I am;' I am called according to my works.'" There is a very deep sense in this Rabbinical explanation. It says that God, being spiritual only and not corporeal, can be known only by the works through which we can see Him, and His name varies according to His works, as it is impossible for the human mind to comprehend God, and assign a name to Him, except by and according to the manifestation of His powers within ourselves.

"The wisdom that is from above" is "full of good fruits." The tree of life, seen by the seer of the Apocalypse, had not but one kind, but twelve kinds of fruit. Beware, therefore, how you permit yourself to think that doing one particular kind of good will answer and make amends for delinquencies in other respects. Make your hearts so full of goodness that it will overflow in many directions. Let them be full of good fruits, which prompt you to do good unto all men.

"The Son of Man," in His own words, "came not to be ministered unto, but to minister." The same must be said of a church. It exists not for its own sake. It is not its own end. Labor, money, zeal are ill expended in seeking to build up a church, if it be forgotten that the church itself is a means to an end. And that end is the elevation, purification, salvation, and truest happiness of all mankind.

For the COMPANION.

Make to Yourselves Friends.

"And he said also unto his disciples,there was a certain rich man, which had a steward ; and the same was accused unto him that he had wasted his goods. And he called him, and said unto him,How is it that I hear this of thee ? give an account of thy stewardship ; for thou mayest be no longer steward. Then the steward said within himself, what shall I do ? for my lord taketh away from me the stewardship : I cannot dig ; to beg I am ashamed. I am resolved what to do, that, when I am put out of the stewardship, they may receive me into their houses. So he called every one of his lord's debtors unto him, and said unto the first, How much owest thou unto my lord ? And he said, An hundred measures of oil. And he said unto him, Take thy bill, and sit down quickly : and write fifty. Then said he to another, And how much owest thou ? And he said unto him, Take thy bill, and sit down quickly : and write fifty. Then said he to another, And how much owest tho ? And he said, An hundred measures of wheat. And he said unto him, Take thy bill, and write fourscore. And the lord commended the unjust steward, because he had done wisely ; for the children of this world are in their generation wiser than the children of light. And I say unto you, Make to yourselves friends of the mammon of unrighteousness ; that, when ye fail, they may receive you into everlasting habitations. He that is faithful in that which is least is faithful also in much ; and he that is unjust in the least is unjust also in much. If therefore ye have not been faithful in the unrighteous mammon, who will commit to your trust the true riches ? And if ye have not been faithful in that which is another man's, who shall give you that which is your own ? Luke, 16 ; 1–12

It was predicted by the prophets, that the Savior would open his mouth in parables, and utter dark sayings of old; Ps. 78 : 2, According to Matt. 13 : 34,35, we learn that the above prophecy was fulfilled in its time. The subjcet of the unjust steward is one of the sayiags alluded to by the prophet. The "Rich man" represents our heavenly Father, the heavens and the earth belonging to him with the fullness thereof. Ps. 24 : 1, and the cattle upon a thousand hills Ps. 50 : 10, "The silver is mine, and the gold is mine." Hag. 2 : 8. And, I think we are safe in asserting that all the genuine "greenbacks" which are stored away by wealthy brethren are the Lord's. The "Steward" may represent every man who is in possession of a surplus of this world's goods. Luke 19: 13. The lord's "debtors" may represent the poor. Psa. 69: 33. James 2: 5. The lessening of the "bills" is accomplished when those who have the means alleviate the wants of the poor. 2 Cor. 8: 14, 9: 12, 13. The friends represented in the parable we will point out to the reader by and by. The "mammon of unrighteousness represents this world's goods. They are denominated thus by the Savior, no doubt, on account of the curse pronounced upon this earth in consequence of the transgression of Adam and Eve. That which is "least" signifies the same as the mammon of unrighteousness. "Much" and "true riches," comprehend that which pertaineth to our eternal felicity. We will transcribe the 12th verse of the parable at issue. "And if ye have not been faithful in that which is another man's who shall give you that which is your own ?" We infer from the above text, that the people are not in possession of that which is their own, and that what we do possess belongs to another man.

Speaking after the manner of men, the premises which we occupy are spoken of as being our own property, providing we have a good title from the government under whose protection we reside; but strictly and religiously speaking, they still belong to another man, although we have paid, according to this world, an equivalent, and have a good title,and the best right to them of any man on the earth. This may seem very strange to the readers ; however it is not unreasonable ; neither will it appear inconsistent when we call to mind certain important truths in this connection. Please turn to 1st Cor. 6 : 19, 20. The apostle teaches us here, that even the bodies which we call our own and so highly prize, are not our own, from the fact that man has sold himself, and even sold himself for naught ; and God has redeemed them has bought them with a price. Says Paul, "Know ye not that your body is the temple of the Holy Ghost, which is in you, which you have of God, and ye are not your own ?" "For ye are bought with a price ;" to wit., as the apostle Peter asserts, "With the precious blood of Christ as of a lamb without blemish and without spot." 1st Peter 1 : 19.

We infer from the above, that all we have and are is the Lord's and we the "people of his pasture." Ps. 95 : 7, and therefore have no right to do as we please with those earthly treasures which we are wont to call our own; unless we please to do as we are bidden by him to whom all things belong, not even with our own bodies, as we still term them. That man and that woman who are called a brother and a sister who take pleasure and indulge in decorating their bodies with "costly array," with jewelry and artificials, even make themselves unworthy participants of the Lord's table. They may claim that they pay their own money for those goods, &c., but we are authorized, by the word, to assert, that that money which we spend for superfluities belongs to the "rich man" in the parable; and all that we expend in that direction is wasting the Lord's goods. "And if ye have not been faithful," &c., "who shall give you that which is your own ?" What! is some person in possession of and holding at a distance, "that which is our own" (property)? We answer, yes. We are in this respect, as men running a race : the prize is in another man's possession, held secure at the end of the race. Therefore we are admonished to so run that we may obtain. (Cor. 9 : 28). "That which is your own," we understand, consists of that "substance" spoken of by the apostle Peter, 1 : 4, That inheritance comprehends very much. Among the most prominent items are a crown (2 Tim. 2 : 8, and a mansion (2 Cor. 5 : 1.) (John 14 : 2.) The knowledge of those things should buoy us up, although the extent of the felicity of that home is incomprehensible, (1st Cor. 2 : 9,) as a certain poet says,

"The joy of that place no tongue can tell,
For there is the palace of God !"
"A place which the Lord to me will give,
And there I shall sorrow no more."

In Eccl. 1: 11, we read: "Cast thy bread upon the waters: for thou shalt find it again after many days." In Matt. 6: 20, "Lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven." In Luke 16: 9, "Make to yourselves friends of the mammon of unrighteousness." The above texts are synonymous, and imply that we should distribute of our goods to the poor.

My design in penning this essay, is, to set forth our views of the manner of making to ourselves friends, and to encourage the reader to labor in that direction: knowing that the period is not distant when we all shall have need of a special friend—one that "sticketh closer than a brother." It is a common adage: "A friend in need is a friend indeed." When prosperity crown all our efforts, when we are surrounded with plenty, and success attends all our labors, we scarcely realize the importance of a friend, yet then is when many would be, and pretend to be our friends. But when misfortune is our unhappy lot, when adversity covers us as a dark cloud, then will it be made manifest who are true; then it is when we shall be able to realize the importance of a friend. Therefore the question may arise: "how may we secure to ourselves friends ?" We answer; it is essential that we "first seek the kingdom of heaven:" which consists in "Righteousness, Peace and Joy in the Holy Ghost." Next it is enjoined upon those who have the charge of a family to endeavor to provide a comfortable living for himself, and those who justly depend upon him for support. 1 Tim. 5: 8. After this has been accomplished it remains the duty of those who are able still to labor diligently, to be energetic, (Prov. 22: 29) that they may have something to give. Acts 20: 34, 35, Eph, 4: 28. Not slothful in business." Rom. 12: 11. Not wasting time in idleness, (Ez 16: 19) for the sluggard cannot be a true disciple of Christ. (Matth. 25: 26.) It is not required however, that any should labor to that extent, that they cannot enjoy sanctuary privileges, especially on the Lord's day. By no means should we "neglect the assembling of ourselves together," on account of having too much of the affairs of this world to attend to: lest the great day of the Lord overtake us unawares. (Luke 21: 34. Heb. 10: 25.) "It is more blessed to give than to receive. More blessed: from the fact, in giving of our goods to the poor we "cast our bread upon the waters:" the essence of which we shall obtain in heaven. "He that hath a bountiful eye shall be blessed, for he giveth of his bread to the poor. He that hath pity upon the poor lendeth unto the Lord, and that which he hath given will he pay him again." Therefore, "He that giveth unto the poor shall not lack." Not only in this life will the blessing of the Lord attend us, but in heaven we shall receive a more enduring substance. God has ever been mindful of the poor. Under the mosaic economy God took special cognizance of the poor, and gave instructions how men should deal toward them: as is recorded in Deut. 15: 7—15. It is here stated: "Thou shalt surely give him, and thine heart shall not be grieved when thou givest unto him: because that for this thing the Lord thy God will bless thee in all thy works, and in all that thou puttest thy hand unto: for the poor shall never cease out of the land," &c. (Turn to the Scripture and read it if you please). From the above we infer that it is the design of the Creator that there should be poor people in the world: and not being able to comprehend every feature in this design of the Almighty, we conclude that it is for some noble purposes. "My ways are not your ways, my thoughts are not your thoughts, saith the Lord: For as the heavens are higher than the earth so are my ways higher than your ways, and my thoughts higher than your thoughts. The Savior told his disciples: "The poor ye have always with you" &c. (Mar. 14: 7.) "They shall never cease." When Paul was sent to preach the gospel; a special charge was committed unto him, to wit: that he should remember the poor: which, says he, "I was also forward to do." "Seek not your own wealth, but every one another's wealth." From this injunction, we infer that we as members of the body of Christ, should be interested in one another's welfare and happiness, both as to things timely and eternal. We should regard one another as being members of one family; so much so, that, should any of our members, through poverty or misfortune, be brought to want or distress, we would feel constrained to sympathize and lend a helping hand. "Rejoice with them that do rejoice, and weep with them that weep." In the days of primitive christianity, the multitude of them that believed had all things common. "Neither was there any among them that lacked." (Acts 4: 32, 33.) The poor were on an equality with the rich.

James asserts: Pure religion and undefiled before God and the Father is this To visit the fatherless and widow in their afflictions. The general acceptation of the term "Visit," in modern days, seems to imply, to go to see: For example: when any person goes to see his neighbors or friends, to pass a social time, an hour, or a day, to eat and to drink with them, is termed a visit. This is seldom a scriptural acceptation of the term. The scriptural acceptation of "Visit," according to my understanding, is always connected with a gift, a blessing or a curse. As in Psa. 106: 4. "O visit me with thy salvation." And as in Exo. 32: 34. "I will visit their sin upon them."

Visiting the fatherless and widows may be performed (even when we meet them by the way) in giving them a penny, a dime, or a dollar, accompanied by words of encouragement: or in dealing to them our bread, or bring them into our house: as is expressed in Is. 58: The Lord speaking upon the subject of fasting expressed himself thus: "Is it not to deal thy bread to the hungry, and and that thou bring the poor that are cast out, into thy house; when thou seest the naked, that thou cover him?" Thus saith the Lord: "Then shall thy light break forth as the morning, and thou health shall spring forth speedily. And if thou draw out thy soul to the hungry and satisfy the afflicted soul; then shall thy light use in obscurity and thy darkness be as the noon-day: thou shalt be as a watered garden, and like a spring of water, whose waters fail not."

Therefore be encouraged friendly reader, to "Visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction:" for what profit would it be, either to you or the poverty-stricken widows, should you go to see them, pass an hour of social conversation, eat and drink with them, and in conversing upon the subject of their penury express much sympathy and depart without giving aught? James asked the question: "What doth it profit? If a brother or sister be naked and destitute of daily food, and one of you say unto them," "Depart in peace, be ye warmed and filled: notwithstanding ye give them not those things which are needful to the body; what doth it profit?" But when we go to see the fatherless and widows who are poor; and take with us a loaf of bread, or a sack of flour and in addition to to this a load of wood or coal, to make them comfortable in in the cold winter days, this would be visiting them in the word and in deed: and for this the Lord thy God will bless thee in time, and when time shall be no more. For in dealing thus to the poor we "Cast our bread upon the waters, we lay up for ourselves treasures in heaven, and make to ourselves friends."

JACOB BAHR.

Moulton, Iowa.

Orphans, How to be Cared for.

This has been a subject of serious thought with me for a long time; so we presented a query to the District Meeting of Middle Indiana, to get the minds of the brethren on the subject of erecting an Orphan Asylum, where the orphan children of members could be cared for, both temporally and spiritually. It was brought before the meeting, and received the sanction of the meeting unanimously. I concluded to insert a notice in the COMPANION, thinking it might be the means of drawing out older pens than mine on the subject, to give some plan how to carry it into effect successfully. Now, brethren, think of the matter. We all know that our orphan children, in the church, are neglected; and we also know that we all want to have our children raised in the nurture of the Lord: whether we live or die, we want our children saved, if possible. Probably not a few of us have heard the dying mother say in her last moments, "Oh! what will become of my poor children?" Why all this? Only because there is no place in the church that they can be taken care of. Now we hope to hear from some of our brethren on the subject.

Singular that the word miser, so often expressive of one who is rich, should, in its origin, signify one that is miserable.

Tune and Hymn Books.

Two weeks ago we announced, that, just as we were going to press, a box of Tune and hymn Books had arrived; but, upon opening the box, it was found that they were cloth binding. This annoyed us very much. However, upon deliberation we concluded to fill our orders with these; as to wait for another supply, would occasion a delay of from one to two months. Accordingly all were sent out, and the orders filled in rotation, as far as the books would reach, and we hope the books will give satisfaction. Many prefer the cloth to the sheep binding. And we believe that our customers generally will be better pleased with the books as they have received them, than they would have been with the sheep binding sixty days hence.

Hereafter we will sell Tune and Hymn Books, and send out such as we have, whether cloth or sheep, as they are the same price. Ten dollars a dozen, or $1 25 per single copy.

The following items are going the rounds of the news papers. We think, however there is some mistake in these people being a kind of Baptists If we are not mistaken they are the Mennonites, who, though they are non-resistants, unfortunately are no longer to be recognized as Baptists.

It was announced the other day that a large number of emigrants had left Russia for the United States to escape military services. The people are a kind of Baptists, whose ancestors left Germany a hundred years ago for just the reason that their descendants are now forsaking Russia. They are conscientiously opposed to bearing arms, and the emigrants from Germany were promised exemption from the military duties by the Russian authorities. They proved to be a very frugal and virtuous class of inhabitants, and their scruples were regarded until lately. The new Russian military law, like that of Germany, allows no exemption. The Baptists had, therefore, to choose between military services and expatriation. They have chosen the latter, and our country is likely to gain a large and valuable accession to its adopted citizens.

Religious Dialogue.

BETWEEN FRIEND A. AND BROTHER B.

A. "Good morning, brother B, I am glad to meet you; I would like to have a short talk about religious matters this morning."

B. "Well, I have no objections, providing we can talk in love."

A. "I hope we shall."

B. "Well, then, proceed."

A. "Well, brother, I believe that your church is right in some things; but, then, there are other things that I can not approve of."

B. "What are those things, that you do not approve of? Perhaps I can make you understand, that we can see alike."

A. "Well, I don't believe in those outward ordinances."

B. "My friend, what do you call outward ordinances?"

A. "Why such as feet-washing, and the kiss, and the supper you eat in time of communion."

B. "Well, what do you understand by the word ordinance."

A. "Why, it is a rule, or law, or rite."

B. "Well, did not Paul praise the Corinthian brethren, that they kept the ordinances as he delivered them unto them?"

A. "True, he did; but they might have been praiseworthy without keeping them all."

B. "It is true you may think so; but if the word ordinance signifies a law, why then we are bound to keep, and obey the law. If we are obedient soldiers, or citizens. And again we might call it also a command; and there are other commands that you keep, that are just as much outward as the one you named."

A. "Please, name some of them."

B. "Well, baptism and communion are just as much outward as the one you objected to."

A. "Well, but we are commanded to be baptized."

B. "But are we not commanded to wash one another's feet? and, also, to greet one another with a Holy Kiss? Not with a Judas' kiss. I cannot see that there is any difference between them at all."

A. "Well, I must confess that I don't believe much in baptism neither."

B. "Then, why do you practice it? for it is wrong to do anything that we have no faith in."

A. "Well, I have faith enough in baptism; but I claim that, if the heart is right, it matters little whether we are baptized at all."

B. "My friend, I agree with you that, if the heart is right, all is right; but I would like for you to tell me how the heart can get right without complying with God's law".

A. "Well, through prayer our sins must be pardoned, and we must feel it that we are right; and if we feel that our load of sin is gone, then we need not be baptized."

B. "So, if I understand you right, you trust all in your heart and feelings. But did you never read that passage of scripture which reads something like this, 'The heart is deceitful, above all things, and desperately wicked; and who can know it?"

A. "Yes, I did; but that has reference to the sinners heart. But if a man is once converted, he knows his heart, and feels that he is a child of God."

B. "So then you are one of those that claim to know the heart; and you claim to be right without obeying God's law; and you also say if a man is once converted, then he knows that he is right. But what do you understand by the word conversion?"

A. 'Conversion means to change from doing wicked to do good"

B. "You have answered rightly; it is nothing else than for a sinner to change from his evil ways to serve God, or in other words, a natural man doth not obey Christ's commandments, but goes contrary to them; but as soon as he is made willing to obey Christ, he doth keep his commandments, which before he did speak against. Such a man is then converted from doing bad to doing good, and, consequently, he loves Christ; for he has said, "He that loveth me keepeth my commandments." Not only a part of them, but all; and as long as a man is not willing to obey Christ in all things, he may tell me he is converted, but that does not make it so. As long as a man can speak lightly of Christ's commandments, and tell me they are not essential to our salvation, I fear that man is not fully converted; for we learn, that the Word shall be our judge at the last day. If we deny a part of it, that stands against us in the day of Judgement.'

A. "Well, I partly agree with you; but I think you put too much stress on some commands."

B. "On what commands do you think we put too much stress?"

A. "Why, baptism is one. You always preach about it, as if a man could not be saved without it; but as soon as he is baptized, then he is good."

B. "I am truly sorry to hear such language from one that claims to be a follower of Christ. I deny that we believe that baptism alone doth save us; but I affirm that we have no promise to be saved without it. Did not Peter tell the Pentecostians, when they asked what to do, that they should repent and be baptized every one of them, for the remission of sins? so you can plainly see that it is about the first step in Christianity that a man takes by which the world can see that he is willing to follow Christ. But, of course, we all confess, that the work must begin at the heart. Unless it doth, it would be of no benefit to a person."

A. "You have just now quoted a passage of scripture that you deny, or don't comply with."

B. "Well, what is it?"

A. "Why, that Peter said that every one shall be baptized; and you deny that infants must be baptized; and the words 'every one' must include infants too."

B. "If you can prove that Peter was preaching to infants, then your logic is good; if not, it is not worth anything"

A. "Well, he was undoubtedly preaching to parents and children,"

B. "But did the children make the inqiry, 'What must we do?"'

A. "I could not say whether they did or they did not; but there must have been children there too."

B. "I claim, if there were any children there, that Peter did not preach to them, but only to those that had sinned. You stated, in your conversation, that we put too much stress on baptism; and I think I am able to prove to you that you put more stress on baptism than we do. Our hearers shall be the judges. You confess that you do not believe that baptism is really necessary, and in face of all that you baptize unbelievers, that is, children, even contrary to the gospel; for neither you, or any other man, can show me one instance in Holy Writ that unbelievers were to be baptized. You force baptism on infants that cannot believe, or understand; and we only baptize such as do believe, or at least, confess to believe, (and if such come we have no right to reject them, if they bring fruits meet of repentance). Now, I think we will close our conversation for the present. Perhaps we will meet again in the future; but I advise you to search the Scriptures daily, and see if you cannot see the propriety of strictly complying with all the commandments. for we learn that Christ said, that "Whosoever breaketh one of the least commandments, and teaches men so, shall be called the least in the kingdom of heaven; but whosoever shall do and teach them, shall be called great in the kingdom of heaven. Now it is for you to decide whether you will still break them, and teach so, and be called small, or whether you will observe all, and teach them, and be called great in the kingdom of heaven. I hope you will never say that the commandments of Christ are of no consequence. So, good day."

A. "Good-bye."

Hidden Life of the Soul.

There is much food for reflection in the following, penned by a worthy writer nearly one hundred years ago :

An unrestrained flow of talk is a sure sign of a trifling, dissipated mind ; and no one can turn readily from useless, frivolous conversation to recollected prayer or spiritual reading so as to profit by them. But there is another kind of silence to be cultivated, besides that of the tongue, as regards others. I mean silence as regards one's self; restraining the imagination, not permitting it to dwell over much on what we have heard or said ; not indulging in the phantasmagoria of picture-thoughts, whether of the past or future. How hard this is, those only who have struggled with the difficulty know! And yet how necessary it is; for how can we hope to hear God's voice amid the invisible but no less real whirl of moral dissipation which such a mental habit induces ? How can we gather those wandering thoughts into a recollected attitude of prayer ?

Be sure that you have made no small progress in the spiritual life when you can control your imagination so as to fix it on the duty and occupation actually existing, to the exclusion of the crowd of thoughts which are perpetually sweeping across the mind. No doubt you can not prevent those thoughts from arising, but you can prevent yourself from dwelling on them ; you can put them aside; you can check the self-complacency, or imitation, or earthly longings which feed them, and by the practice of such interior mortification you will attain that spirit of inward silence which draws the soul into a close intercourse with God.

You must resolve not to be disheartened; but even if you were to fall a hundred times a day, determine to rise up each time, and go onward. What will it matter though you have fallen by the way, if you reach your journey's end safely at last? God will forgive the fall; they often are caused by undue haste, which prevent us from taking fitting precautions, or, with timid souls, from a perpetual looking round for imaginary dangers, which cause them to stumble.

If God requires anything of us, we have no right to draw back under the pretext that we are liable to commit some fault in obeying. It is better to obey imperfectly than not at all. Perhaps you ought to rebuke some one dependent on you, but you are silent for fear of giving way to vehemence; or you avoid the society of certain persons, because they made you cross and impatient. How are you to attain self-control if you shun all occasions of practising it ? Is not self-choosing a greater fault than those into which you fear to fall? Aim at a steady mind to do right; go wherever duty calls you; and believe firmly that God is an indulgent Father, and will forgive the faults which take our weakness by surprise in spite of our sincere desire to please Him.

And these are a certain pledge to it of that expected freedom when it shall enter on an eternal Sabbath and rest in Him forever who is the only rest of the soul.

The Remembrance of Christ.—What can be more soothing or cheering to the heart of a mourning sinner than to think of a Savior who was wounded for his transgressions, and bruised for his iniquities; to remember one whose blood cleanseth from all sin, who has saved thousands of guilty children of Adam, and who still invites all the weary and heavy ladened of his sinful race to come unto him for pardon and peace ?

Prayer.—We may judge of the state of our hearts by the earnestness of our prayers. You cannot make a rich man beg like a poor man; you cannot make a man that is full cry for food like one that is hungry: no more will a man who has a good opinion of himself cry for mercy like one who feels that he is a poor and miserable sinner.

Vanity of the World.—Oh, you who dote upon this world, for what victory do you fight? Your hopes can be crowned with no greater reward than the world can give; and what is the world but a brittle thing full of dangers, wherein we travel from lesser to greater perils ? Scandal and Tattling.

There could be no tattling if there were none to hear. It takes an ear and a tongue to make a scandal. Greedy listening is as dishonorable as nimble tattling. The ear is the open market, where the tongue sells its ill-gotten wares. Some there are who will not repeat again what they hear, but they are willing to listen to it; they will not trade in contraband goods, but they will buy enough of the smuggler for family use. These respectable listeners are the patrons of tattlers. It is the ready market that keeps tale-bearing brisk. It is a chance to listen to ill of your neighbor. Christian benevolence demands that you do not love ill-news. A clean heart and a true honor rejoice in kindly things. It should be a pain and sorrow to know of anything that degrades your neighbor in your eyes, even if he is your enemy; how much more if he is your friend."

On the Death of Hannah Furry.

The above named was the daughter of John B. and Elizabeth Furry, who, in former years took up their residence in the Dunnen,s Creek congregation, where brother John was chosen to the ministry. About the time he had fairly started out in his calling, and had promised a future usefulness,God, in his allwise providence, saw fit that he should exchange time for eternity, and he had to pass over the stream of death, where he at this time evidently is enjoying the fruition of the blessed. He left a bereft widow, (a sister,) and children to mourn the loss of one who had the care over them. The care of the children was now placed into the hands of sister E., who is a daughter of Elder Daniel Snowberger, of New Enterprise. To relieve her of some of the care now resting upon her, Elder Leonard and sister Hannah Furry, grandparents of the subject of this notice, took her into their care, undoubtly with the intention of rearing her up to womanhood. But alas, alas! observe what disappointments and privations we are heir to, while travelling through this wilderness of this world.

When Hannah arrived nearly at the age of 17, she became unwell, and lingering for some time. Little did she or those around her think, that disease was making its inroad to the vital organs to terminate in death But finally she was a prey to the terrors of a scorching fever. She being under the care of her grand parents,we know that no labor or expense was spared to supply her wants, while the raging fever was preying upon that mortal body of hers. An eminent physician was employed, who spared no pains nor skill in puting up prescriptions such as her case demanded, and in applying every remedy that the art and skill of a physician could contrive; but notwithstanding the parental care, and skill of a physician, the disease could not be arrested; the physical organization grew weaker and weaker, the voice grew more and more faint, and, by and by, when the friends stood at her bedside calling her by name, she uttered a mere groan in a tone indicating gloom and languishing pain. Finally, when the appellation Hannah was uttered,no voice was heard. Hannah is no more; she hath gone the way of all flesh, she hath gone to the world of spirits whence no one hath ever returned.

On the 12th inst. her remains were conveyed to the Snowberger meeting-house, followed by the largest concourse of people we ever witnessed there on a similar occasion, where the funeral services were attended to by the brethren, from Matthew 24: 44. The discourse was principally and appropriately addressed to the young; but the heads of families were not forgotten nor neglected. Elder Jacob Miller, while addressing himself to such who had the care over the young and rising generation, and encourging them not to despair in giving them good counsel and good advice, related a solemn an impressive circumstance which he witnessed; namely, he having the care and oversight of a young woman who loved to participate in the pleasures and vanities of this world. such as adorning her mortal body with superfluities, a sense of duty prompting him, he reproved her, telling her the sinfulness of following the vain and useless fashions of this world. Some time after, she became a member of the church of the Brethren. That loathsome disease consumption, now was making its inroad upon the vital part of her mortal body, which terminated in death. Shortly before she took her departure, she called him to her bedside by saying, "Uncle, come here. I have a request to make to you,uncle," said she. "When I indulged in the vanities of this world, you very frequently reproved me, but I did not adhere to your admonitions, and proved disobedient. I ask of you to forgive me. If you can forgive, the Lord will forgive me." He promised her to forgive. Shortly after this she calmly breathed her last with the assurance of a glorious immortality.

While relating this circumstance, a deathly silence prevailed through the entire crowded house. The solemnity of the case was so impressive, that when brother M. had made the statement, sobs were heard in every direction, indicating that a solemn sensation pervaded the breast of every precious soul composing the large assembly. After services the remains of Hannah was conveyed to the burying grounds, where they were laid in their final resting place to await the resurrection morn.

Hannah was like many of our young people are in the present day. She loved the gayety of the world, which, undoubtly, grieved the heart of her kind hearted, aged, and down stricken grandmother, who felt an interest in the welfare of her never dying soul, as well as for every precious soul of all mankind. Hannah, as far as we know, expressed no regret of not making peace with her God in her healthful days; but, inasmuch as she was young and her convictions may not have been so very strong, we may judiciously suppose; that in the dark and gloomy hours when death was staring her in the face, she made reconciliation with her God.

The departure of Hannah hath caused many vacancies, which can hardly be filled: she leaves a vacancy in the community and in social company; she leaves a vacancy in the Sabbath school and in the public school. The vacancies she hath caused are hard to be filled, from the fact that Hannah was at least one among the most intelligent of her sex and age in the community. We would then say to all those to whom this notice may come, to the young especially, take warning from this most impressive and eventful occasion; for we may wisely suppose that, in this dispensation of God's allwise providence, he had a special design. Aside of the instructions and admonition you receive from your christian parents, you have the Sabbath-school and social meetings, where you obtain many good instructions and much good counsel. And public preaching is frequent, where the duties devolving upon you are very forcibly alleged to you. The bride, the church of God, hath devised every plan, and made use of every means, to bring you into the fold of of Christ, and urgently saith unto you, "Come," but you will not come. So we think God hath taken a loved one out of your midst, for the sole purpose of softning those flinty hearts of yours, and to bring you down to the feet of Jesus, there to seek an interest in the wounds of a crucified Redeemer.

An Important Question.

Will one of those brethren whose conscience will not all themlves, nor others to vote, answer the following question: The people of the State of Pennsylvania are called upon by an Act of Assembly to vote, on the third Friday of March next, for or against granting licenses to sell intoxicating liquors, excepting for medical and manufacturing purposes. Presuming that all Christians have the advancement of the Redeemer's kingdom at heart, shall we not vote? You need not tell us how to vote, only give us all the reason and Bible authority why we should not vote. Do it soon and oblige your brother in the Lord.

JOSEPH HOLDER.

Missionary.

DEAR COMPANION.—This lovely Sabbath, as I was at home, I was reading the Scriptures. While reading of the Apostle Paul's ministry, my mind was impressed with the grand importance of the missionary subject—a subject neglected by us, in part, as a church.

Never did the church enjoy liberties such as we do in this our land of gospel freedom; and I often wondered why it is we make so little progress in spreading the gospel. It seems we have not that zeal which was manifested by the brethren in the Apostolic Age. And why? we have all the means. We surely are not poor. There is no necessity of our ministers going at their own charges.

Oh, there is a great responsibility resting upon us as a church! Think, for a moment, what other denominations are doing. How zealous they are! And what is the result? Subverting the truth. Error is at work; and where are those who stand on the walls of Zion? Are the people warned? Do we put forth proper efforts to show them their great danger? It is a sad truth, that Satan has his ministers transformed as ministers of light. Darkness is taken as light, and light for darkness. What shall we do for these poor, deluded mortals? Can we not do something more than we do, to help them out of their perilous condition? I am fearful that, in the day of Judgment, some will say, 'No one cared for my soul." If we saw a burning house, and knew its inmates were asleep, what would we do? We would sooner drag them out by force than see them perish. Ah! how many such sleepers there are—lulled to sleep by the enemy!

We are hastening to an awful crisis! It cannot be possible that the world can exist much longer thus; and the Master has hired us in his vineyard to work. Are we at work as we should be? Let us go back to apostolic times, and see how Paul and his brethren were at work. We read that he went from city to city, ceasing not to declare the whole gospel, amidst the heat of persecution. I do not believe our brethren need fear such troubles under our present mild government, "though we know that this sect is every where spoken against." Still, what privileges we enjoy! When will we appreciate them fully? I belive it is the Lord's doing, that we may work a good work in this our day of gospel liberty.

In the 19th chapter of Acts, we read that, through Paul's ministry, the gospel was preached throughout all Asia, that is, almost a quarter of the globe, and many other places. Now think what we have done? Why, the pure gospel has not been preached over these United States. Considering our liberties, I think it cannot be. The apostle called his brethren to witness, that he was free of the blood of all men.

The commission read, that the gospel shall be preachedto everycreature. Let us see that there is no locality where the gospel has not been preached: so that we also can say, "We are free from the blood of all men." May God grant us grace, that we may stand as witnesses of Jesus, both ministers and laity, and put away this worldliness—the love of money. See that the work of the Lord is not hindered: because, perhaps, we refuse to lift up the hands of those who are fighting for the Lord. If we are the Lord's then all that we have and are is his.

I often ask myself the question, Do I love Jesus? The lips may often say it, when our actions deny it. Methinks we are still inconsisent in some things. My brethren, bear with me, when we put so much stress upon obeying the gospel. But how do we fulfil the commission? Does not that mean the same now, in the eighteenth century, as when Christ uttered these words? The fulfilling of the commission implies all that the angels sang when Christ was born. It breathes that spirit of peace on earth, good will to man, and glory to God on high. We cannot fulfil that great command, to love God with all our mind, soul, and strength, and our neighbor as ourselves, without engaging in this great work. The Lord has not given us anything to do that he will not help us to perform: but he sees fit to test our love and fidelity. Oh! let us not neglect the Lord's work. Our time is so short, eternity so long, our troubles and trials too short to be thought of. And how soon we must die! Then when we are laid on our deathbed, we know we have a clear title to mansions in the skies! None will then say they have done too much; but oh! I fear many will feel they might have done much more to warn poor souls.

SARAH J. MILLER.

MADISON, GA.,) January 22, 1873.)

Dear Brother: When you last heard from me, I had the assurance of a brother and sister to help me in my temporal, as well as encourage and aid in my spiritual undertakings. But again I have been doomed to a sad disappointment. Such it really is; for I have almost come to the conclusion, that our only way to build up a church of the Brethren here, is, to get around us a few standard bearers, that we may meet together as worshippers, and so gradually overcome bigotry, pride, prejudice, and other evils that hinder the cause. The cheering hope of having a brother to talk with, work with, pray with, and go with me to the various meetings I have to attend, and bear up the hands of this weak one, has again departed; and now I feel, if possible, more lonely than ever. Don't you think a preacher without a church is in a worse condition than a church without a preacher? I do. Though destined to so many disappointments and reverses, I am not disheartened; but by God's help shall continue to do what I can, and pray for grace to make me better fitted for the position of an instrument in God's hands.

I often think of writing for the C. F. C., but urgent duties seem pressing. I do not feel capable of using its columns acceptably or with profit as an instructor; and having nothing of interest to communicate, have delayed till a more convenient season. In temporal matters I have no cause for complaint, only that I have undertaken too much for my capital; but with health and no mishap for a little while, all will come right. Here lies one disappointment in the failure of my brother's removing here, as agreed upon between us. I hoped he would take a share of that burthen also.

Amid the darkness that overspreads my pathway, I feel gratified in the assurance, that a kindling spark of hope occasionally manifests itself; and who knows but the time may yet come when our church will be well and favorably known in Georgia, as it is now in Pennsylvania, God grant it.

I did not intend this should reach this length; but I felt like talking a little, and I hope you will pardon the length of it. Of course I do not intend it for publication, but if you can find a kernel or two in the shell, and feel like taking the trouble to pick them out, I have no objection. I will try to get up something for the C. F. C. before long. Till then, Adieu.

Religion Pays.

Dear Cousin Noah. I notice in COMPANION No. 2, page 22, a query on which you wished to have an explanation. Dear cousin, I am happy that we have such a blessed sheet as the COMPANION, through which we can converse with each other. The longer I take it, the better I like its contents. I love it because it is open to investigate subjects, and this is really the way to truth; We see in Matthew 20: 9, concerning the penny a day. Suppose a servant of the Lord labors fifty-five years in the service, and gets his hundred-fold more than the wicked in this life, as we see Mark 10: 30; another works five years in the service of the Lord, commencing at the eleventh hour, and gets his hundred-fold for the twelfth hour. Now comes the evening, or end of life, of both, and both are richly paid for all the time they put in. Now there is no reason to complain. Now the Lord comes with his "penny a day," or eternal life, as a free gift.

MARRIED.

January 23rd, at the residence of brother Reuben T. Myers, by Eld. P. S. Myers, Mr. B. F. SHADE, of Newton Hamilton, Pa., and sister BARBARA BESHOAR, of McVeytown, Pa.

DIED.

We admit no poetry under any circumstances in connection with Obituary Notices. We wish to use all alike, and we could not insert verses with all.

Near McCoysville, Juniata county, Pa., HOWARD BEAR, aged 20 years and 11 months. This young man came to his death in the following distressing way. He was returning home from Perrysville with two horses and sled, and passed his home and went up to the bridge, and on it crossed the Tuscarora Creek, went down the other side a mile or so, opposite his father's house, and in attempting to recross the creek came to his death by freezing, or some other way, as he was found next morning standing in the middle of the creek, in water to his breast and dead! The horses were dead also. Rumor has it, he was intoxicated! Now voters what do you say about "Local option?" Will you go and vote "No License?" Perhaps by neglecting to do so, it will be taken for granted you are in favor of "License," or so careless, that you do not care which side carries. This is no political question, IT IS A GREAT MORAL QUESTION.

S. W. BOLINGER.

In the Elkhart congregation, Elkhart county, Indiana, our beloved brother S. C. STUTSMAN, January 26; aged 49 years and 5 months. He leaves a wife, a sister in the church, and four children to mourn their loss; but we hope their loss is his great gain. The subject of the above notice was feeding a calf, on Tuesday morning, which bit him in the thumb, and taking cold in it, he died on the next Sunday at 12 o'clock A. M. Funeral services by brethren M. A. Hess and D. S. Shively, from Rev. 14: 13.

J. C. LEHMAN.

In the Upper Colorus congregation, York county, Pa., JOSEPH STAMBAUGH, only son of brother Jacob and sister Barbara Stambaugh, of typhoid fever; aged 21 years and 25 days. Occasion improved by brother Andrew Miller, from 1 Peter 1: 24.

PETER H. LAW.

In the Oakland branch, Darke county, Ohio, DANIEL LIME, January 18, leaving a widow and seven children to mourn their loss. He lived a good moral life. I was a neighbor to him for eight years. He was kind, always in good humor, and friendly, and in peace with everybody. He brought his age to 76 years and two days. Daniel Lime and Margaret Holinger were born and married in Pennsylvania. Moved to Ohio about thirty five years ago. They were friends to the brethren. Funeral services by the brethren J. Risser and Adam Helmon.

B. B. BASHORE.

In the Pipe Creek congregation, Caroll county, Ind., on the 3rd of December, 1872, brother ISAAC W. SHRINER, in the 54th year of his age. Brother Shriner was a deacon, faithful in his office, and in the church. He died of disease of the heart in his kitchen, in the absence of any of his family. May the Lord comfort the lonly widow, our sister Rachel. The funeral was very largely attended and the occasion improved, from the language of the Master; "Take ye heed, watch and pray for ye know not when the time is." by the brethren present.

Also in the same congregation January 12th, sister ELEANOR, wife of brother George Erb, in the 53d year of her age. Disease, Cancer. Funeral occasion improved by the brethren; text, "He that is not for us is against us."

The Christian Family Companion. Is published every Tuesday, at $1.50 a year, by Henry R. Holsinger, who is a member of the Church of the Brethren, sometimes known by the name of "German Baptists," and vulgarly or maliciously called "Dunkards."

The design of the work is to advocate truth, expose error, and encourage the true Christian on his way to Zion.

It assumes that the New Testament is the Will of God, and that no one can have the promise of salvation without observing all its requirements, that among these are Faith, Repentance, Prayer, Baptism by trine immersion, Feet Washing, the Lord's Supper, the Holy Communion, Charity, Nonconformity to the world, and a full resignation to the whole will of God, as he has revealed it through his Son Jesus Christ.

So much of the affairs of this world as may be thought necessary to the proper observance of the signs of the times, or such as may tend to the moral, mental, or physical benefit of the Christian will be published, thus removing all occasion for coming into contact with the so-called Literary or Political journals.

Subscriptions may begin at any time.

Family Duties.

In chosing the above subject, I feel my inability to treat it as it deserves; but wish to give some of my thoughts,and then leave it for abler and more cultivated minds to give it its polish.

We have preachers, who proclaim to us the glad tidings of salvation, and the duties it behooves us as Christians to fulfill; but as the failure often lies in ourselves in not taking into account those little things at home,around the fireside, and in our daily duties, it may do no harm to note some of these small things.

The apostle says, "Let no corrupt communication pass out of your mouth, but that which is good to the use of edifying, that it may minister grace unto the hearers;" also, "Let all bitterness, and wrath,and anger, and clamour, and evil speaking, be put away from you, with all malice; and be ye kind one to another, tender-hearted, forgiving one another, even as God for Christ's sake hath forgiven you."

We will now picture to ourselves, a young man and woman before the altar to be joined in the holy bonds of matrimony. Does not, then, love,one of the strongest ties of the human heart, reign supreme? They commence house keeping, and everything goes on pleasantly; because care is taken of these small things of which the apostle speaks. When the husband comes home he is met with kind words, loving smiles and words of cheer, and by the one ministering to the other.

The family may increase, the wife finds more work to do; but by the aid of her husband, in small acts of kindness, all will go on pleasantly. He may, if he has some spare moments, "fetch a pail of water," "bring some wood," "help to dress the children," and do a thousand other little things. He may even, if he has time, "help her wash;" and all this without her asking him; because there is love in the family. The wife, in return, will, of course, do similar acts of kindness to her husband. She may sew on a button, patch his clothes, &c.

Time moves on. The children grow up in the "nurture and admonition of the Lord." They mingle in this love, and home, to them, is the sweetest place on earth, and they can sing with the poet:

"There is beauty all around,
When there's love at home;
There is joy in every sound,
When there's love at home.
Peace and plenty here abide,
Smiling sweet on every side,
Time doth softly, sweetly glide,
When there's love at home."

We hear the cry, "To make home pleasant, get papers to read," &c. This may all be good enough in its place; but if there is no love at home, the most tender ties of youth will remain dormant, and those evils which the apostle warns us of will grow; such as, "hate, envy, strife," &c. We know that the "youths of to-day will be the men and women of to-morrow," and as the Proverb says, "As the twig is bent the tree is inclined." And this has no truer application than in regard to the treatment of children under the parental roof. If boys and girls are always kept at work, from dawn of day till late at night,no recreation being allowed to them and being ruled as with an "iron rod," nothing can be more certain than that suchchildren will become discouraged, and long for the time when they can go away from home and commence a life of their own. In place of raising them in the "nurture and admonition of the Lord," they are looked on as mere tools by which so many dollars and cents can be worked into the pockets of the parents. They are reproved so often that both body and mind become worn down. What may be the cause? Love, yes, in such children the kindest and most tender feelings remain uncultivated, and weeds will spring up in their stead. Such children will frequently seek that love and pleasure elsewhere which was denied them at home, and if they do not "turn out" to be among the lowest class of society, will, in most cases, live through their lifetime in a discontented state of mind ; for, whatever they are made by home education, will, in most cases, be the character of the future homes they are destined to make in the world.

"Take care of the minutes, and the hours will take care of themselves," is another true saying, which may be applied here ; take care of the children, and the men will take care of themselves.

Parents, make home happy. "Be ye kind one to another, tender hearted,forgiving one another." If home is happy for you, it will be for the children also.

"Woman at home," is the true reformer, and can do more to make home happy than the brains of the loudest mouthed and strongest minded women of the age. A child is the true starting point, from which, if she turns it in the right direction, she may see success in a not distant future.

But some wives have great obstacles in their way, if the husband forgets that his wife is his best friend, the most steadfast on earth. She would do more for him in misfortune or sickness than any other on earth. To say nothing of the marriage vow made before high heaven, he owes to his wife a denial of self, by kindly assisting her ; but instead she is sometimes looked upon as a "woman of temper," and marriage is considered a mistake. We will now try and explain some of the causes that bring families into such a dilemma.

Some wives may be cross and sulky ; but I think this is the exception and not the rule, if husbands are aware of their duty. For the affectionate and steady interest,the pride and self-denying devotion, which wives have for the comfort and prosperity of their husbands and children, is a proverb and wonder in all civilized lands. She denies herself in this direction as constant as the flow of time, so loving, so uncomplaining, so heroic, that if angels make note of mortal things, they may well look down in commiseration. But what is her reward in most cases? She fails to be recognized by the very one who is the object of these heroic virtues. In plain language, it is a too general rule, that the wife works harder and endures more than the husband or hired help. Many a husband speaks to his wife in terms more impatient and petulent than he would to his hired help. He even speaks to her disrespectfully in the presence of the servants or children. The husband is the ruling spirit of the family; and the wife naturally craves his love ; but if she is slighted in this manner, the children; the servants, and hired help will soon disrespect her, and, I may say, treat her as their inferior. No wonder, I say, if she is trying to keep her place which by nature is designed for her, by feeling cross and sulky. "Thy desire shall be unto thy husband" is the language of scripture ; but we will still go on a little farther.

A child or other member of the family is taken sick in the night, the necessary attention nearly always falls on the wife, to be extended the greater part of the night. In the morning she is expected to see to breakfast as if nothing had happened. The husband perhaps does not notice the worn out expression, and if every thing is not just right, she is treated with harshness. How often is her rest broken by a restless or crying infant. But this is not all. When in addition to this want of sympathy, thoughtless complaint, and fault-finding, when she did all she could under the circumstances, no wonder if settled sadness is on her face.

The reader may now think for himself; but let us yet be reminded of the words of the apostle, "Nevertheless, let every one of you in particular so love his wife, even as himself; and the wife see that she reverence her husband. Children obey your parents in the Lord ; for this is right. "Honor thy father and mother,that it may be well with thee, and thou mayest live long on earth. And, ye fathers, provoke not your children to wrath ; but bring them up in the admonition of the Lord."

CYRUS BUCHER.

Schaefferstown, Pa.

God Makes no Mistake.

In a town in Massachusetts there is a young man of fine talents and capabilities for active life, who for years has been a cripple, paralytic, and so helpless that he would starve if left alone. A friend was commiserating his condition, when with deep earnestness he exclaimed, as he slowly raised his withered head, "God makes no mistakes. How noble the sentiment! "Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right? Is not this the the spirit of true and devoted piety?"

Thirty Reasons.

WHY THE EARLY CONVERSION OF CHILDREN SHOULD ENGAGE THE ATTENTION OF EVERY TRUE CHRISTIAN.

1. Because children are sinners, and may be lost.
2. Because Jesus Christ died for them, and they may be saved.
3. Because the simple plan of salvation through faith in Christ is the same for children as for grown up people.
4. Because there is a special promise for the young—"Those that seek me early shall find me."
5. Because very many dear children have found the Savior, and are now happy in his love.
6. Because his Holy Spirit is striving in the hearts of many more.
7. Because it it constantly found that there are little ones who want to come to Jesus, but do not know the way.
8. Because they are not safe until they shall come.
9. Because the child's heart is tender, and not yet hardened by a long course of sin.
10. Because the child receives the truth in more simple faith than the adult.
11. Because it is easy for children to love, and therefore they may be taught to love Jesus.
12. Because it is easy for children to trust, and so they may be led to trust in Jesus.
13. Because the converted in early life make the most earnest and consistent Christians.
14. Because they who spend their youthful days in learning in Christ's school will become the wisest Christians
15. Because, having life before them, they are the likely to be the most useful Christians.
16. Because we now have the children with us, and it is easy to get them to listen to the story of the Cross.
17. Because when they grow up to be young men and women it will be very difficult to reach them.
18. Because thousands of children leave our Sabbath schools at thirteen or fourteen, and leave them unconverted.
19. Because it is a startling fact that these old Sunday-scholars form nine-tenths of the criminals in our jails and the unfortunates on the streets.
20. Because we live in a fast age, when children rapidly learn the manners, and too often imitate the voices, of grown-up people.
21. Because these children may become the fathers and mothers of the next generation.
22. Because they may die while they are still young.
23. Because the Lord may come, and none of them may ever grow up to be men and women.
24. Because children may be so readily gathered together in the school-room, the cottage, or the drawing-room; in the open air, and by the sea-shore.
25. Because a little book or tract given to a child will always be accepted and read, which is not always the case with grown people.
26. Because a letter written to a child is sure to be treasured up and read again and again.
27. Because a word can be spoken with freedom to a child, and all of us meet with children sometimes, and have many opportunities of individually pointing them to Jesus.
28. Because this work amongst the young does not want special gifts so much as earnestness and love to souls.
29. Because it is a work that brings us so near to Christ.
30. Because the lambs are so dear to the heart of the Good Shepherd, who said, "Suffer the little children to come unto me, and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of heaven."—The Christian.

For the COMPANION.

To-Morrow.

Dear reader, allow me to introduce a few ideas or thoughts on this important subject of not putting off your return to God until to morrow. Yes, to-morrow will be a very important day. We expect to accomplish a great many things to-morrow that we leave undone to-day. We will rest to-day, so that we can work with great strength to-morrow. It will require a great deal of labor and fortitude to accomplish all this work to-morrow, as we have been very negligent and idle ever since our boyhood, so that the mass has become almost like mountains, to remove. Yes, our sins are as mountains, and still increasing. Sinner do not put off your return until to-morrow, as to-morrow may not come. You have no promise for to-morrow. Ere the dawning of to-morrow you may be in a hopeless eternity; yes, death may intervene and blight all your expectations of to-morrow.

"To-day, if ye hear my voice, harden not your hearts." But alas! it is too often the case with us poor, sinful, fallen creatures, that we disregard his knocking at the door of our hearts, and turn a deaf ear to his many calls.

How many hopes and fears concentrate in to-morrow! and yet how uncertain is it, what the events of to-morrow will be! who can tell what a day will bring forth? To-morrow is near at hand: a few hours only separate it from the present moment, yet, what it will bring, with what events it will commence, with what changes it will progress, and with what events it will close, none can tell.

To-morrow may make the rich poor. To-morrow may make the well sick, and the happy, miserable. Those who laugh to-day may weep to-morrow. The good for which we hope, may not come with to-morrow, while the evil we never suspected, to-morrow may bring upon us. Some children who have kind parents to-day, may be weeping, sorrowing, friendless orphans to-morrow. What is a rose to day may be a withered stem to-morrow; and those whose cheeks bloom like the morning rose, may be cold in death to-morrow.

Dear friends, think of these things. Think how uncertain life is. Sinner, do not put off your return to God until it is eternally too late. Do not wander farther from him. Call upon him while he is near. Seek him while he may be found: for his Spirit will not always strive with man. "When they shall say safety then sudden destruction cometh, upon them.

An Item.

If you count the words in ten lines, in a book or newspaper, and divide the number by ten, you get the average number of words in each line. Multiply this by the number of lines in a column, and you have the number of the words in a column. Multiply these by the number of columns (provided they are all alike and set up in the same kind of type) in a single copy. Multiply this by the number of copies issued, (twelve if monthly: fifty if weekly) and you have the number of words in a volume. By this method it is easily ascertained that the CHRISTIAN FAMILY COMPANION publishes nearly as much reading matter as all the other papers of the Brethren combined.

The columns on title pages are shorter, and the editorials are leaded; hence these contain fewer lines. But those set up in smaller type contain more lines and more words. Hence allowance must be made in the calculations.

WESTERN BROTHER.

A fault of present day is that people are poorly instructed in the history of the Church. When books of sentiment and story-telling were less abundant than they are now, people read more history. The taste for solid reading was acquired, and conscience being awakened and developed by the study of the truth, the trash was not so much cared for. If all the Christian world would study the battles fought and sacrifices made for the cause of the Master, they would more highly appreciate it. By the mass of Christians it is only known in a general way that the track of the Church has been made in blood through many centuries.—Us Pres.

The Scriptures. No. 3.

By referring to my former essays on this subject, the reader will discover, that I have briefly treated some of the leading characteristics in the history of the Scriptures; but many points have been left untouched, that might have been largely dwelt upon, even with interest and edification to the reader. Permit me however to say, that the Scriptures, as handed down to us by our predecessors, are nothing more or anything less than the pure and untarnished truths of High Heaven. They are "perfect, converting the soul; sure, making wise the simple; and right, rejoicing the heart;" so that the perfection of the Scriptures cannot be gainsayed, in this that they answer the original design. Yet skeptical men will use up and audaciously say, that Jesus Christ was an impostor; and consequently the Bible is an imposition upon the human family, from the fact, as they say, that the Scriptures of divine truth clash.

The writer not long since read in a regular Boston periodical, a carefully prepared list of scriptural passages selected from all parts of the Scriptures, that really seemed to contradict each other in the way they were selected. But when I came to examine closely into their proper connections, there was nothing but harmony and union throughout. Passages of scripture were taken, and, in many instances, disconnected and placed side by side with other full quotations, for the sole purpose of blindfolding the ignorant and unweary in their feeble search after truth. Thousands and multiplied thousands unfortunately, are led in this way to disbelieve the Scriptures, especially when men of talents and influence have the effrontery to make such delusive and uncalled for allegations.

The Scriptures, as handed down to to us through the many different versions, in a few instances, may seem to be more or less obscure. This may be on account of impure translations. Notwithstanding all this, the literality of the Scriptures is not so materially changed in our modern versions but that we can fully understand the mind of God, especially when we earnestly and prayerfully examine the same. Undoubtedly the Scriptures could now be read Verbatim, as they came fresh from the hands of the authors, and providing the people at the present day were surrounded by the same customs and manners of the people in vogue then, which not unfrequently gave rise to certain things recorded in the Scriptures by way of explanation, these difficulties would be unknown. From the spirit and tenor of the Old and New Testament writings, the Bible in its present canonical form, is beyond a reasonable doubt, God's own book. It was indited by men of old, who spake and likewise wrote as the spirit directed them; men who were supernaturally endowed with ideas from the mind of God himself.

In confirmation of this, the Scriptures bear abundant testimony that "all Scriptures are given by inspiration of God," &c. And again, when the Savior sent out his disciples among "the lost sheep of the house of Israel," to preach "the kingdom of heaven," a part of his charge to the twelve was, "Take no thought how or what ye shall speak; for it shall be given you in that same hour what ye shall speak;" "For it is not ye that speak but the Spirit of your Father which speaketh in you."

Paul, in his epistolary writings to the churches, gives us plainly to understand, that he belived in the divinely inspired characteristics of the Scriptures. Hear his own testimony on this point. "And my speech and my preaching was not with enticing words of man's wisdom, but in demonstration of the Spirit and of power: That your faith should not stand in the wisdom of men, but in the power of God." Evidently the apostle's "speech" did not consist in sonorific or high-sounding words, and bring into play "the fancy flights of imagination," and "the flowers of rhetoric," merely to entertain and tickle the hearer's ear, such as infidel orators made use of in these days, and too many of one learned pulpit divines do now. A display of man's wisdom in the form of pulpit eloquence, does well enough to gain the good will and applause of men; but divine testimony can only be produced by the Spirit and power of God.

Again, Peter writes, "for the prophecy came not in old time by the will of man; but holy men of God spake they were moved by the Holy Ghost." David, the sweet Psalmist, says, "The Spirit of the Lord spake by me, and his word was in my tongue." Likewise in the second book of Kings we read, "And the Lord spake by his servants, the prophets." From the above quotations, as well as many others that bear on this point, the reader can plainly see, that the inspiration and antheuticity of the Scriptures is a fact beyond dispute.

The term Scriptures, as used in the New Testament writings, has direct reference to the Old Testament; in particular, to 'the Law" and "the Prophets." The Savior said on one occasion to the Jews, "Search the Scriptures, for in them ye think ye have eternal life, and they are they which testify of me." In fact, they foretold his coming into the world, and while he was here upon this stage of action, he frequently referred them to the Scriptures, that they might see and believe for themselves that he is the Messiah. Peter, when preaching to one Cornelius, and his associates, said, "To him give all the prophets witness." The Savior, in his last conversation and instructions, refers his disciples to the Scriptures, by saying, "These are the words which I speak unto you while I was yet with you, that all things must be fulfilled which were written in the law of Moses, and in the Prophets, and in the Psalms, concerning me." "Then opened he their understanding that they might understand the Scriptures." First, he refers them to the Scriptures—to Moses, the Prophets, and the Psalms—and then gives them to understand what was predicted of him especially at this time, in regard to his death and resurrection.

It appears that the disciples had an idea, that the Savior was come to restore Israel to its prestine glory again, from which it was fast departing, and in its stead establish an earthly kingdom. But when they saw their leader overcome by an infuriatee mob, and arrested to be tried and without a just cause condemned to die the most shameful and ignominious death of the corps, on the rugged tree upon Mount Calvary's brow, they felt forlorn and disappointed, perhaps, far beyond their expectations. The consequence was, they returned to their former occupation,—fishing. It appears that not a glimpse of hope remained, to cheer their gloomy minds in this dark and drooping hour of trial. All had fled from the tablets of their minds. This sorrowful tragedy was indeed beyond their comprehension, when, perhaps, they retrospectively reviewed his past history, and reflected on how he "manifested forth his glory" in performing many diverse and wonderful miracles, and "Spake as never man spake." Well might the Savior say to his disciples, "Thus it is written, and thus it is behooved Christ to suffer and to rise the third day from the dead," &c., evidently referring to the prophetical Scriptures of Isaiah, that were to be fulfilled in due time. These things he said by way of comfort and explanation, and served as a clue to unravel the majority of unbelief under which they had been laboring. "And behold I send the promise of my Father upon you;" namely, the promise of the Holy Ghost, which was to qualify them for the great work before them, even to perform miracles in confirmation of the blessed truths, of the glad tidings of salvation, and to spread the Redeemer's Kingdom among the children of men.

Is Elijah's Coming yet Future?

Our readers are doubtless aware, that the question of Elijah's coming has attracted the attenion of many. Some contend that he has come, while others look for his coming in the future. Now for the law and testimony.

As a starting point, we refer to the propheey of Malachi 4 : 5, "Behold I will send Elijah the prophet, before the coming of the great and dreadful day of the Lord; and he shall turn the hearts of the fathers to the children, and the children to the fathers, lest I come and smite the earth with a curse." In examining this subject, we must look carefully at the contents with which the promise stands related. The probet predicts a coming period, namely, "The great and dreadful day of the Lord." This day is to "burn as an oven," in which "all the proud, yea, and all that do wickedly, shall be stuble; and the day that cometh shall burn them up, * * * that it shall leave them neither root nor braneh." Malachi 4 : 1.

We must not forget that Malachi's propheey does not relate to the Gentiles, or the saints of God, but to the children of Israel. First, he charges Judah with having dealt treacherously; and declares that "an abomination is committed in Israel." This has truly been fulfilled

The prophet sees a day approaching in which the sons of Levi shall be purified and purged as gold, so that they may offer an offering unto the Lord in righteousness; then shall the offering of Judah be pleasant unto the Lord, as in the days of old.

This purifying process will be severe for those who pass through it. The prophet declares that he shall "suddeuly come to his temple;" but who shall stand when he appeareth? To those who are prepared to meet him, he will be a source of blessing aud joy; but to the wicked, he will be a consuming fire. He is compared with "a refiuer's fire and fullers soap," and declares that "he shall sit as a refiner and purifier of silver." Mal. 3 : 2, 3.

These comparisons clearly teach us that his character will be that of a Judge, who shall burn up the dross of Israel, leaving a purified remnant, who shall worship the Lord in true holiness. The proud and wicked will be severed from the just, and God's burning judgment will be showered upon their ungodly heads, reducing them to ashes under the feet of the righteous. The Lord will come, not as the despised Nazarene, but as a mighty conquerer. He will come, not to be dragged before a human tribunal, there to receive the insults of wicked men; but he will come as a Judge to execute judgment and justice in the earth. His glory will cover the earth as the the water covers the sea. His personal appearance will be brilliant. His countenance, John describes, as the sun shining in his strength, and his eyes as a flame of fire. The proud and wicked of the earth may call on the mountains and rocks to fall on them, at that time, but they cannot hide from him who sits on the throne; for as John says, "The great day of his wrath has come and who shall be able to stand?" Rev. 6 : 16, 17 : as the prophet Malichi says, "The great and dreadful day of ehe Lord." Before this terrible day, the Lord has promised the children of Israel, to send their old prophet Elijah. About fine hundred years previous to the days of Malichi, Elijah was removed from earth to heaven; 2 Kings 11 : 2. The Lord will send Elijah into their midst again. He will send Elijah, from which we understand that he was then in existence, but absent from them. He passed into heaven by order from the Lord, and by his power, he will be will be sent by the same from heaven, in fulfillment of God's promise to Israel.

For what purpose will he be sent? "Behold, I will send my messenger, and he shall prepare the way before me. Mal. 3 . 1. It is evidant from this, that Elijah's mission is to prepare the way for the Lord's manifestation to Israel. They have strayed away from God for ages past. They have been outcasts aud wanderers in the earth. They have rejected their king and crucified him. They have been suffering the vengeance of God in their d-spersions. Yet there is a day of reconciliation predicted by the prophets. At the present time they are yet far from God, and know not his will concerning them. They seek salvation in paths of their own choosings, and will not receive the word of the Lord in its simplicity. They They are in dispersion without a king or leader. They are powerless for want of union. Their Holy Land is trodden down by profane feet of Gentiles. They still reject Jesus as the Messiah. They are not in a fit condition to meet the Lord, the Judge. If he should meet them in their present condition, it would be to curse, and not to bless them. What is to be done? He says, lest he come and smites the earth with a curse, he will send Elijah to them, that good old prophet, who shall prepare the way of the Lord before them. How? "By turning the hearts of the fathers to the children," &c. His mission, then, will be one of reconciliation. He will convince the children of the errors of their ways in departing from God. In this manner the way will be prepared for the appearance of the Lord. But it is evident there will be stubborn souls in their midst. They shall melt like wax before him. Against all characters known as sorcerers, adulterers, &c., he will be a swift swifsness. Mal. 3 : 5. They will be consumed from his presence like the fat of Lambs: into smoke shall they consume away. Thus will he purify his people for the great work he has in store for them.

Has Elijah come? Matth. 11: 14, "For all the prophets and the law has prophesied until John, and if ye will receive it: it this is Elias which was to come." Again, "This is he of whom it is written, Behold I send my messenger before my face, which shall prepare the way before thee." Matth. 11: 10.

Many, on reading these words, at once say the prophecy of Malachi has been fulfilled. Can it be possible that our Lord intended to teach his disciples that Elijah the prophet had actually come and fulfilled his mission? By no means. But he says, "This is Elias which was for to come." It appears as if John would be Elias to as many as received or believed his mission, and were thus prepared by him for the Lord's coming. John was a forerunner of our Savior's first advent. John prepared the way for our Lord, by taking out a people from the nation of Israel, who confessed their sins; and who, by bringing forth acceptance with God, preparatory to the coming of His Son. When the Son was manifested, he found a people restored by John, ready to accept him. Our Lord does not deny that Elijah's coming is yet in the future, but strengthens it by using the future tense in connection with it. Matth. 18th. After his transfiguration on the Mount, his disciples ask him, "Why do the Scribes say that Elijah must first come?" Our Lord replies, "Elijah truly shall come, and restore all things." This was spoken after John's mission was fulfilled At this time the Lord uses the future tense concerning Elijah's coming, and declares the statement true that "Elijah shall first come;" and not only shall he come, but he shall restore all things. It was predicted concerning John's mission, by the angel Gabriel, Luke 1: 17, that he should "go before the Lord in the spirit of and power of Elias, to turn the hearts of the fathers to the children, and the disobedient to the wisdom of the just, to make ready a people of the Lord." This removes every difficulty. He was not that Elijah promised by God through Malichi; but he was like him in spirit and power. He was a preparer of the people of our Lord's first advent. This he did by turning the hearts of the fathers to the children, &c. In this respect, he resembles Elijah, who shall come and restore Israel, and prepare them for our Lord's second advent, when he shall come as a great Judge, and as a refiner's fire, to purify his people with judgment. To as many as received him, therefore, he was that Elijah who is still to come. The reason why this is so, is, that Elijah's mission is for the same purpose as John's so far.

The priests and Levites who came from Jerusalem to ascertain who John was, proceeded to question him. They asked him if he was the Christ. He declared he was not. What did they say then? "Art thou Elijah?" "I am not." Now, did John speak the truth, or not? This answer was direct, "I am not." Elijah could not be in existence in Heaven and yet be on earth in the person of John at the same time, nor in any case. Elijah the prophet is one person. He went to heaven in a fiery chariot, while John lived here on earth, and died here on earth. The angel Gabriel predicted the birth of John alluded to Elias; but did not say that Elijah the prophet should come in fulfillment of God's promise, but that a child would be born whom they should name John, and that he should "go before the Lord in the spirit," &c. If a person is said to have the spirit of another, it is clear that both can not be the same person, any more than a substance reflecting a shadow can be the shadow and the thing.

We conclude that Elijah's coming is still future; because the attending circumstances of his coming have never been fulfilled, at least in our estimation. He is to appear as a fore-runner of our Lord's second advent, as is evident from the fact that the Lord at that time will purify the sons of Levi; and purge the people with the fires of judgment, because, when Elijah comes, he will evidently appear just previous to "the great and dreadful day of the Lord," which is yet future. This is the day that "shall burn as an oven, and all the proud, and all that do wickedly shall be stubble; because at that time the righteous will be blessed"—"grow up as calves of the stall, treading the ashes of the wicked under their feet." This they never have done yet, but the reverse has often been.

What is True Conversion?

The question heading this article is one of vast importance, when considered in the light of the gospel, and one that justly demands the serious attention of every candid and intelligent mind.

It is admitted by all the different christian denominations, that conversion is a prerequisite to christianity, and that no man can possibly become a true follower of Jesus, without becoming converted. But when the question is asked, What constitutes true and genuine conversion? we find a difference of opinion.

The term conversion, as defined by Webster, in a moral and theological sense, means, "a change of heart or disposition, in which the enmity of the heart to God, and his law, and the obstinacy of the will, are subdued, are succeeded by a supreme love to God and his moral government; and a reformation of life."

I regard this definition as being a very good one, the full meaning of the term touched in a few words. In our natural state we are all at enmity with God; "The carnal mind is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can it be." Hence it is evident that a change of heart must take place, in order to become truly converted to God. But here is the point where the difference of opinion seems to come in: How is this change of heart brought about? or how shall we know whether the individual is truly converted or not?

Some claim it is the work of the Holy Spirit, without any effort on the part of the creature. They will tell you, if the heart is right all is right. With the latter I acquisce, for the heart cannot be right without the love of God is shed abroad in it, and, if the love of God exists in the heart, then the heart must necessarily be changed already, and the result will undoubtedly be an entire resignation to the will of God, and a faithful discharge of all the duties enjoined upon the christian. But this change of heart will not take place without an effort on the part of the creature.—The truth is simply this, if it was the work of the spirit alone, then, God must be a respecter of persons, or he would certainly convert all, and any effort on the part of the creature to resist the Spirit, would have no effect to the contrary. But we are inclined to believe that by far the greater part of the human family die in an unconverted state. And yet we learn that God makes himself free of the blood of all man. His Spirit is continually striving with man. Christ invites us to come, "the Spirit and the bride say come," and let him that heareth say come, and partake of the water of life freely without money and without price. Man is a free moral agent, and it is optional with him to obey or disobey God's law, to yield to the callings of the Spirit, or to resist it; but he must abide with the consequences. Our reward will be according to our deeds. When we yield to the callings of the Spirit, then it is that we become willing to follow the Lord in all his footsteps, we will find no non-essentials in the commands of God. Whatever is required of us in his word we will be willing to do. The office of the Spirit is to lead us into all truth. Therefore I assume to say that if a man is not willing to comply with all the requisitions of the Gospel, let it be whatever it may, we may at once conclude that he is not truly converted to God, however loudly he may profess christianity. By the fruit we must know the tree.

Oh, that all might become truly converted and "bring forth fruits meet for repentance," is the prayer of your unworthy brother.

Looking Back.

"And Jesus said unto him, no man, having put his hand to the plow, and looking back, is fit for the kingdom of God. Luke 9 : 62.

We may be looking back many times and not be aware of the fact. There are many ways of looking back, but we shall speak of but one; but this a very conspicuous one. When we leave the good old order of the church, and take up with the foolish fashions of the world, we are looking back. We have seen many young brethren and sisters at the table of the Lord dressed after the custom of the world; and it is only at communion seasons that some of the sisters wear a cap, and then a circular comb placed on top of their heads to keep the cap from touching their heads. I suppose, perhaps, the cap so seldom worn hurts their heads a little. We are very much pained to see the fruits of looking back. Whenever we put upon our garments a ruffle, or trim the borders, and put in a great quantity of tucks, we are desirous of again participating in foolish fashions of the world; consequently we are looking back. Some parents dress themselves very plain, but dress their children just as the world does. We believe this is cultivating a taste, and instilling a principle that will be very obstinate to subdue, and they, (the pareuts,) cannot be justified in any such doing; they, too, are surely looking back.

There can be many excuses offered, but they all have a similarity to that of our father Adam. When the Lord called him, he said he was afraid because he was naked; and being asked if he had eaten of the forbidden fruit, Adam replied, "The woman which thou gavest to be with me, she gave me of the tree and I did eat." But this did not justify him in the act; neither will any excuse offered in defense of fashion have any effect. It would be just as well to own, with our mother Eve, that "the serpent beguiled me and I did eat."

Some excuse themselves by saying that there are other members that dress fashionable, and that we have as good a right to dress as they. A very poor excuse, indeed. If we see others do wrong, we will do wrong too; instead of pleading with them to do right, we will encourage the wrong, by taking pattern after their ways.

It may hurt the feelings of some very much to abuse the poor, perishing fashions; but if we are all going to sit and watch pride climb into the church, and say nothing, and not give admonition because we are afraid of touching the feelings, the world will be in the church with all the pomp and style. If we see others looking back, we will stand and watch them; thus we are all looking back together. "Them that sin rebuke before all, that others may fear." Oh, how beautiful it would be, if we would all do right—all keep to the good old way.

To those of us who are looking back, we would say: "But thou, O man of God! flee these things; and follow after righteousness, godliness, faith, love, patience, and meekness." "Prove all things; hold fast that which is good." "Let us watch and be sober." Let us cease to look back. Written in love.

Love God.

"But as it is written, eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither hath entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love him;" 1 Cor. 2: 9. What lovely words, full of rich consolation, and nourishment for the soul. When we read them over we stop and try to view with the spiritual eye, those things which God has in store for those that love him; but if we do not love him we have no promise; consequently may not ever be in possession of those valuables.

Once in talking of this verse, a friend of mine remarked that every one will share of these things, for said he, we all love God. It is quite easy for us to say, "we love." But merely saying so, will not do. We should give evidence that we love our God. And we do not really love unless we obey him. Not only a part, of his command. It will take us our lifetime to prove that we love our God. In all our talk, in all our walk, and in our every action, we are only proving, whether we love or not. No difference where we are, no difference what circumstances abound, this proof is going on all the while. If we love God, we will come to him, and endeavor to be like him; meek, gentle, lovely, merciful, and good in every way. "God is love."

But if we love the world, we will go with them, and try to imitate them; we mingle and co-mingle with them, and thus will prove that we love the world better than we do God? Although we may say we love God, our actions prove where our love is.

But the "enemy of our souls" will endeavor to get us to believe that we can be a little like the world, and partake of their pleasure, and yet love God. Let us read Luke, 10: 27, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy strength, and with all thy mind." We can plainly see that it will occupy all of our time to love our God without being encumbered with the world, or worldly things. If we would dress and act a little like the world, and go and enjoy their mirthful amusements, we would surely love so to do. Consequently we would only love God with part of our heart, soul, mind, and strength. May our Father dwell near by us, who are so weak, and help us to live in an acceptable way before his face, so that when we depart from this world, we can fly with full assurance to our God, for the reception of the things which he has prepared for them that love him, is the prayer of your weak sister.

Galileo Before the Inquisition.

The following interesting account of the great Astronomer's troubles with the Inquisition is condensed from the Private Life of Galileo, recently published.

The most interesting period of his life was that in which he was brought to trial before the Inquisition on the charge of heresy.

We, in these times, can hardly conceive of anything so ridiculous as bringing a man to trial for asserting that the earth moves, and that the sun is the centre of the solar system, yet Galileo had committed no greater offence than this.

He had written a work in the form of a dialogue, in which were discussed the two systems of the world, the Ptolemaic and the Copernican. Before this could be printed, it was necessary that he should obtain permission from Rome. After a delay of nearly two years, in which Galileo experienced much anxiety, he was allowed to print his work, provided a preface written by the Pope should be incorporated in the text. Galileo, of course, felt much reluctance to accede to this requirement, but rather than have his book suppressed, he consented, and soon copies of the work were circulated all through Europe; it was received apparently with great gratification. Soon, however, there came from Rome an order for the sequestration of the book, and then a summons for Galileo to appear before the Sacred Congregation at Rome and answer to the charge of disseminating in the Dialogue heretical doctrine. The old philosopher– for he was now nearly seventy years of age—received this order with sorrow and apprehension. His physical condition would not admit of so long a journey at once, and he procured a respite for some months, when he was again ordered to appear immediately. Finally, he set out upon his journey in January, 1633, and arrived at Rome on the 15th of the following month. As a mark of respect to his age and condition, he was not at once confined in the Holy Office, but was allowed to be the prisoner-guest of the Tuscan Ambassador, Niccolini, who was one of Galileo's best friends at Rome, and one of the most influential intercessors with the Pope in his behalf. On his first appearance before the dreaded Inquisition, he was merely asked if he knew why he had been summoned, and answering in the affirmative, he was remanded, and this time to the Holy Office, being provided, however, with one of the best rooms, and receiving every attention, besides being allowed the liberty of walking freely in the court.

When next he was brought before the Inquisition, he was suffered to speak for himself. He offered to add two more chapters to the Dialogue, refuting the Copernican theory, as a proof that he did not hold the forbidden doctrine. After this examination, Galileo was conditionally released from the Holy office, and allowed again to become the honored guest of Niccolini.

On May 10th, he was brought before the inquisition for the third time, and was told that he might have eight days in which to prepare his defense. His written defense embodied in the main the answers and explanations he had made during his previous examinations, and terminated with a most touching appeal for the mercy of the tribunal. Galileo had been given to understand that many of the members of the Inquisition were personally well disposed torward him, and that he might expect an immediate discharge. But he was not to get off so easily. The Pope caused a decree to be issued, in which a final investigation was ordered for June 21st, when he was to be rigidly examined as to his motive in writing the Dialogue. He was to be menaced with torture, which, if not successful, was to be followed by exacting an abjuration from him of the charge of heresy. Whether the Pope meant this to go into effect or not, is not known. Meanwhile the Inquisition were deliberating upon his sentence. On June 22d he was ordered to appear before the Sacred Congregation and receive his sentence. Upon his knees he received it. He was condemned to imprisonment during the pleasure of the Holy Office, and was, by way of penance, to recite the Penitential Psalms once a week for three years. He then recited the abjuration which the Pope had prepared for him, and signed it with his own hand. In this occurs the following: "I have been judged vehemently, suspected of heresy—that is, of having held and believed that the sun is the centre of the universe and immovable, and that the earth is not the centre of the same, and that it does move. I abjure with a sincere heart and unfeigned faith, I curse and detest the said errors and heresies, and generally all and every error contrary to the Holy Catholic Church. And I swear that, for the future, I will neither say nor assist in speaking or writing such things as may bring upon me similar suspicion. I also swear and promise to adopt and observe entirely all the penances which have been or may be by this Holy Office imposed on me. And if I contravene any of these said promises, protests, or oaths, (which God forbid), I submit myself to all the pains and penalties which, by the Sacred Canons and other decrees general and particular, are against such offenders imposed and promulgated. So help me God, and the Holy Gospels, which I touch with my own hands."

It is said that when Galileo arose from his knees after the abjuration, he murmured: Eppure si moue"—"It does move, though." But if he was not so bold as thus to bid defiance openly to the Inquisition to which he was so obedient, he held his opinions the same as ever, and had multitudes of such oaths been required of him, they could not have changed his opinon, which his intelligent mind taught him was right and incontrovertible. It is a fact, that at that time, of the many who so loudly inveighed against the Copernican theory as advocated by Galileo, most knew little more about it or about Copernicus than do some of the inhabitants of Africa at the present time. Some of the priests even preached against the doctrine held by "Ipernico, or whatever you call him."

"To the Poor the Gospel is Preached." Luke 7: 22.

These words Jesus spoke to the disciples of John in answer to the question that John wished to know whether he was the Christ, or whether there would be another. John no doubt understood the principles of the Christian religion, from the answer that Jesus sent to him. Jesus was showing faith, at that time by some of his works, and among the rest the poor were to have the Gospel preached to them, which was a new principle at that time, as the poor, according to the Gospel, the real poor had no privileges according to the law. In other words, the poor, as Lazarus had not wherewith to fill the requirements of the law, but under the Gospel, the real poor have not only the privilege of hearing the Gospel but of obeying the same. Then brethren, let us be careful, that we lose none of those first prineiples, by which the power of Christ was known. In looking around us at this present time, we think the real poor, are, by some, very much slighted. In fact, it is doubtful whether such a character, as Lazarus is represented to have been, would be allowed to enter some of the magnificent temples, where the Gospel is represented to be held forth to man. Let us look well to ourselves, that we slight no one, let their standing in this world be what it may. Jesus has been the friend of the poor, and has given them the promise of his kindness and has specially commanded his followers to condescend to men of low estate, and not to be high-minded, for what is highly esteemed, is abomination in the sight of God. "Do justly, love mercy, and walk humbly before thy God."

The Origin of Scandal.

Said Mrs A.
To Mrs. J.
In quite a confidential way.
"It seems to me
That Mrs. B.
Takes too much—of something—in her tea."
And Mrs J.
To Mrs. K.
That night was overheard to say—
She grieved to touch
Upon it much,
But "Mrs. B. look—such and such!"
Then Mrs. K.
Went straight away
And told a friend, the self-same day,
"'Twas sad to think"—
Here came a wink—
"That Mrs. B. was fond of drink."
The friend's disgust
Was such she must Inform a lady "which she nursed,"
"That Mrs. B.
At half past three
Was that far gone she couldn't see!"
This lady we
We have mention, she Gave needle-work to Mrs. B,
And at such news
Could scarcely choose
But further needle-work refuse.
Then Mrs. B.
As you'll agree,
Quite properly—she said, said she,
That she would track
The scandal back
To those who made her look so black.
Through Mrs. K.
And Mrs. J.
She got at last to Mrs. A.
And asked her why
With cruel lie,
She painted her so deep a dye?
Said Mrs. A.
In sore dismay,
'I no such thing could ever say,
I said that you
Had stouter grew
On too much sugar—which you do.

Boyhood Memories. No. 2.

BY F. M. SNYDER.

Like most boys of those days, I entered school very young. Regardless of the distance, I was anxious to accompany my senior brothers to the old country school-house. I had heard them talk much about their good times there, and wished to share with them in their boyish amusements. During the more disagreeable weather, when fierce winds blew, or when the white snow flakes came noiselessly down on the frozen earth, I would sit at my lonely window, eager to catch a glimpse of my brothers on their return home. I would then have been the first to meet them, had not another friend of their's—our dog—managed to out run me, or run in my way and have me fall over him. Some dogs are tricky.

At last the cold days of winter disappeared. Spring returned. The sun shone beautifully in a clear sky. The earth put on a new beauty. The birds sang sweetly. The green creeping grass could be seen everywhere. The buds on the trees began to swell; and the early flowers began to bloom. School was again in session; and I was going to be admitted as a new scholar. Imagine my delight on hearing that I was permitted to attend. No longer need I ask so many questions concerning school life. I was now going to see and learn for myself. A few more days were required to dry off the roads, and then a little rugged country boy would count it only fun to walk a mile and a half to where he expected to have lots of sport.

Soon the day arrived, when, with my primer under my arm, I could start for school. It was a bright Monday, I believe. It seems to me now, that it could not have been otherwise. Many were the questions I asked, while on my way to school, the most of which I have now forgotten. Soon we passed the ruins of an old log cabin, that looked more like the home of the dead than of the living, whose rude appearance had so often frightened an old deaf lady who believed in ghosts. However, I managed to pass it without any fears of seeing ghosts. You see it was day time, and I was taught to believe that ghosts were night animals, and that they generally made their appearance during those intervals in which the owls hoot. How foolish, that little girls and boys ever believed in ghosts. On our way we saw but little more to attract us, save the roaring of the water, and a large wheel that set in motion a woollen factory.

Scarcely had this passed my notice, when I was lost to know what I had best do with myself when I should reach the school-house. It would not do for me to go there and lie down on the shelf; for I knew that was the place where they put books. I did not dare to ask my teacher to do any such thing, for she could only have laughed at me, and with a toss of her dignified head, asserted; "I've better use for you, sonny." This would have been the way it would have turned out, I believe. She din'nt believe in idle boys, lying on shelves, who some day might lie senseless on side-walks.

But here we are at school. Almost I can persuade myself how I then felt. The little boys gathered around me, peering into my eyes, eager, perhaps, to know whether they might see in the new scholar a warm friend. I don't know exactly how I treated them. I believe I acted selfish. I had never been used to meeting so many little boys, all at once. I could see too plainly that, while some liked me, others did'nt. They had the advantage of me, too. While I did not know all the alphabet, they knew more than I did; for they had attended school long enough to gather some wit, which some used in kindling a smile in my face; others, in putting a blush on it.

You don't know how glad I was when we were called to our books. Then I could sit down with my primer; with nothing to trouble me, save the penetrating gaze of a handsome lady teacher, who managed to hold my eyes, with hers, long enough to induce me to smile in spite of myself. But I must confess I did it with some degree of bashfulness. Perhaps she was contriving a plan to get me in readiness to tell my name, without being asked for it the second time. Soon, as I had expected, I was called for the first time in my life to recite my lesson in school. How changed since then! How many who shared in childhood sports in those days, have passed the meridian of their youth, and are engaged, some in making themselves useful: others in making themselves miserable.

My son, defraud not the poor of his living, and make not the needy eyes to wait long.

Make not a hungry soul sorrowful; neither provoke a man in his distress.

Add not more trouble to a heart that is vexed; and defer not to give to him that is in need.

Turn not thine eye away from the needy, and give him none occasion to curse:

For if he curse you in the bitterness of his soul, his prayer shall be heard of him that made him.

Memories.

BY WIEN FORNEY.

Who lacks memories, sweet, enchanting,
Trooping on his vision dim—
Memories of the dead or lost ones—
Sighs for error and for sin?
In my reveries oft I gather
Sweet responses from the plain
Of recollection's richest harvest,
Piled with sheaves of golden grain.

First come memories of our childhood—
Rushing like a fountain bright,
Paths with flowers forever blooming,
Days which never knew a night.
There are eyes now beaming on me,
And a face angelic sweet—
With a form of beauty beck'ning
At the trusting place to meet.

True love never dies in memory—
Mem'ry keeps it green and vernal—
It survives all pain and changes;
Like the soul, it is eternal.
Memories of such love surround me,
Whereso'er my footsteps stray—
Like the prophets' holy ensigns,
Fire by night and cloud by day.

Memories of a homestead humble,
Where dwelt honor, virtue pure,
Where the psalm of life was duty,
Where naught of evil did allure.
If man ever had a memory
Which gave his heart exalted tone,
It was recollections, hallowed,
Of his boyhood's sinless home.

Mother! with enrapturing feeling
I have clung to thy dear name—
Waking, thou art lingering near me—
Sleeping, it is still the same.
Wearily, I have strayed, since when
At thy feet I kneel'd a child,
Thy tender caresses to receive,
Or admonition wisely mild.

There is devotion, grand, exalted!
Shrinking from no danger near—
And dauntless courage courting conflict,
Which doth scorn ignoble fear.
But of all devotion earthly,
That no sacrifices can move,
Lofty in its constant strivings,
Is a mother's trust and love.

Memories of old friends departed
Long since to the silent grave—
Dreaming, I have heard the calling
From old Jordan's stormy wave.
"Hasten, brother; Oh! life is weary;
Hasten to the shore, Oh! come:
Warmer welcome here awaits thee
Than e'er greeted thee at home."

Hark! I hear their heavenly cadence,
As the psalm of life they sing,
And sombre shadows I feel on me
Of my guardian angel's wing—
And thus ceaseless memories stir me
With a rapture ill express'd
With aspiration ever reaching
To the realms of the blessed.

The Cripple at the Gate.

There was every reason, he might think, why he should be contented. What if he could not walk? He managed to be carried every day. What if he did not get all he wanted? He did not have to work for what he did get. Putting all things together, he was probably as well off as the average.

So that day when "Peter and John went up together into the temple," he held out his hand without raising his eyes, asking an alms. If they had anything to give, he would be glad to receive it, and if not, he would ask those that came next.

The apostles stopped. Something attracted their attention. Fastening their eyes upon him, Peter said: "Look on us." He raised his eyes, still holding out his hand, "expecting to receive something of them."

No money had they to give, but in Christ's name they offered him, something far better. Such as they had they gave. "In the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth, rise up and walk."

"What do you mean? Rise up and walk? Why, I do not know how to walk; I never learned. I could not balance myself if I should try; I should only fall. Even if I could make it out now, I am not sure I should succeed. I want some assurance that I could keep agoing, before I am ready to begin. It would be a great deal worse to begin and then fail, than not to try at all. I want strength for all my goings now. And then, really, if I could not walk better than some people I know, I would rather not make the attempt. There's so and so, who makes great professions to be a walker, but he fell the other day and broke his leg. And another acquaintance sprained his ankle just by stepping on a little piece of orange-peel. And some one else climbing up a ladder, lost his hold and had a terrible fall. There are many who go by on crutches, and some have a wooden leg, and plenty just limp and hobble along; and of those that go all right now, there is no telling how long it will last. No, no, if I could not walk better than such people, I would rather not walk at all.

"Besides, I can't give up my present pleasures. It is very comfortable lying here lazy, in the shade; and when it gets too hot, or when it rains, why, they just carry me over there under cover. It is very pleasant to see the crowd go by, and it is a very easy way of getting my living. I enjoy myself altogether too much to think of undertaking the arduous responsibility of walking.

"No, no, Peter; some other time, not now. I really have not the time to attend to it. And don't you see, you are interfering with my gains. All these people going by, and I have not been able to ask or receive anything. Some other time perhaps I should like to make the attempt, but not now business is too good. Come sometime when the crowd is not here, and we will talk about it."

Is that the way the cripple replied to Peter's effort to help him? Ah, no! Faith flashed from eye to eye. The outstretched hand of the beggar was siezed by the apostle, and Jesus' "name, through faith in his name," made the man strong. "And he leaping up, stood, and walked, and entered with them into the temple, walking, and leaping and praising God."

And so, my friend, lying conscious of your helplessness at any of the numberless beautiful gates that lead up to grace and glory and God, "in the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth, rise up and walk." Sweep away the cobweb excuses which would still keep you helpless, and believe on him. "Christ Jesus makes thee whole."

Jacob Abbott says, somewhere, that if the matter communicated is within the reach of children's minds, no special pains need be taken to bring down the language to their comprehension. A writer in the Sunday School Times, speaking to the same point, says:

A preacher of great celebrity was once publicly giving his experience in the line of children's preaching, his efforts in which have been attended with great success. It was agreed by most of those who heard him; that to preach once a month to the children is a fine thing.—But another, a minister of even greater success, followed him with the remark. "I preach to my children twice every Sunday." And so he does. Instead of setting one table for children, he portions out to all from the same board a gospel feast, ample for all, and plain enough for the refreshment of the least and lowest. Would that thousands of our ministers would do likewise. Our children do not want baby-talk. All they ask for is a sound, common-sense gospel, expressed so they can understand it.

For the Companion

Loved Ones, Mingle not with the World.

A few days since, sister H. and I. called at the house of some of our friends in our town. On our leave we were much astonished, as the gentleman invited us to remain until evening, so as to attend their social gathering. Our tongue was just going to excuse us by saying, that, according to Scriptures, we cannot attend such places. This reply would not only have concurred with our sermons every Sabbath, but it would have been scriptural. But I suppose our countenance at once spoke our sentiments; for, before we had time to reply, his daughter said, "Do stay, the sociable is so nice." "Why," said she, "some of your members attend and write pieces for it." I acknowledge we were hushed up in shame, and did not utter our sayings; because they could at once have said, "You do not all speak the same thing; for some think it no harm to go, for they prove it by their attendance; while some of you, and your ministers, speak so much against such gatherings." This surely is a mistake. Can it be that any of our members attend this society, and write for it? No, it cannot be; they surely cannot go there and feel that they meet Divine approbation; because we cannot find one sentence in the New Testament to uphold such, but many to the contrary.

What would we think, to know of members attending the theatres and ball-rooms? We would at once know that they were not drawing nigh to Christ, so as to have him draw nigh unto them; but that they were going from Christ so that he would go from them

"But," says one, "this society is not a theatre." No, it is not; but is it not one step toward it? Oh, I fear it is. Then stay from it. I suppose that it is a nice place for the worldly; but it cannot, surely, benefit the Christian to go there and spend his time in writing in that cause; while, at the same time, our editors, not only plead with us, but try to hire us, to write and assist them. But that is not heeded: for we have no time, talent, or opportunity. What a shame that we do not try to spend our time in as profitable a way as we can; and try to assist in some good cause.

Perhaps, my readers say, "Sister Snavely, you are too hard; the young members like to be in company too, and not always stay at home." Well, let us see, it may be, but I have the Testament right along with me; especially, where good old Paul emphatically says, "Abstain from all appearance of evil;" 1 Thess. 5: 22. As there is no appearance of good there, it must be evil. Then flee from it. There are other places where there is appearance of good; go there. In our town, close at home, we have no less than four widows. When the young members wish to take a walk, there are those to visit and comfort, and that will be doing good; consequently Christ will draw nigh to them then. How good they will feel! And when they wish to write, let them help to support our valuable paper.

It appears to me to be impossible that any of our members would thus imitate the world. Why, we may just as well imitate them in dress as in ways and in manners. I see no difference. We had much better try to get them to imitate us in visiting the Sick, and the Widows, and Orphans, and in doing good every way we can.

Dear ones, do you not know that worldlings are astonished at you for gathering and mingling with them? They are surprised when they see you come; for they know as well as we do ourselves, that it is not right for the Christian to countenance any such doings. But, of course, they rejoice at winning you back again. They know we preach it down; but if you go and help them build it up again, where is your gain.

Now, brethren and sisters, if any of you have been ensnared and attended this or any other worldly, mirthful place of amusement, please, do stop, and say, "I have erred in once going, but will not again." Do not say that you see no harm in going there; for we all know that there is no good done there; and we know very well that Christ is not near by us at any such places. So, next Friday evening, when you would repair to the society, wend your steps to the house of our loving old sister Burns; there spend the evening with the lonely widow and fatherless children; and I know that Christ will be in the midst of you. You will feel that he is right with you. Thus you will meet divine approbation. Draw nigh to Christ, and he will draw nigh unto you. Please read my scattering thoughts in the same spirit in which I have written them, in love.

Rebecca Snavely.

Hudson, Ills.

There is much goodness in the world, though at a superficial glance one is disposed to doubt. What is bad is noised abroad, is echoed back from side to side, while what is good goes at best like sunshine, quietly through the world.

A muddy stream, flowing into one clear and sparkling, for a time runs along by itself. A a little further down they unite and the whole is impure. So youth untouched by sin, may for a time keep its purity in foul company, but a little later they unite.

DALE CITY, PA., FEB. 18, 1873.

On account of a press of outside work this week we have been unable to prepare any editorial for this number. We hope in a short time to be able to direct our attention into the direction in which it ought to be laboring. In the mean time our correspondents are making our paper sufficiently interesting, for which they have our thanks.

Answers to Correspondents.

S. H. Caylor: You had the proper credit on our books. It was a typographical error, and should have been $10 50 instead of $10.00.

Christ. Myers: We did not acknowledge it, because we had no account of it; but the almanacs were sent and we do not intend to charge you for them. The paper and envelopes were also sent.

J. W. Byrne: We noticed it. Are sorry for it; but hope there will be sunshine when the cloud has passed by.

J. D. Leedy: The one dozen cost $10.00. We had sent one before, at $1.25.

Wm. Leatherman: No account of the money. Tune and Hymn Books, 6 for $5.00 sent by express; by mail $6.00.

John H. Wirt: Don't know where the trouble is, as you are all right on our books.

J. Zug Jr.: All right. We will gladly make the exchange.

D. J. Meyers: After sending the book you are still entitled to $1,50 percentage.

C. C. Andress: We have examined, but can find neither of those names on your former list. They are now entered.

Louiza M. Engle: The names were all entered on our book, but when they were to be put into type, a number of them were omitted by the printer. Such errors sometimes occur, and we are always sorry for them. Hope all will be right hereafter.

A General Appeal to the Church.

We have been solicited repeatedly to appeal to the annual conference for a hearing, but hitherto have refused. We are now willing to make an appeal to all the saints, as a united body, acknowledging the supremacy of the Father in Legislation, the Son executively, and the Holy Spirit judicially. And the gospel of Christ to be the power of God to salvation, to them that believe, and condemnation to them that disbelieve; and the miraculous operation of the spirit of God, of raising the dead, and healing the sick, ending with the confirmation of the gospel. "And after the gospel was confirmed, with signs and wonders, and with divers miracles and gifts of the Holy Ghost, according to his own will;" (Heb. 24.) Necessity did not require a reconfirmation.

And all the strenght of receiving or excluding members is continued in the divine law.

And all sincere persons manifest their faith in the Lord Jesus, and compliance with his laws, by making application to be baptized into Christ.

And all forms of doctrine that are given by inspiration, ought to be obeyed from the heart.

And no form of doctrine that was not introduced by the great Head of the church, and his witnesses (the apostles) ought to be held sacred by the church.

The only form that we have for baptism is given by Matthew, 28: 19.

The form of washing and wiping the Saints feet is recorded by John 13: 45.

The preparation and partaking of the Lord's Supper, and the emblems, are recorded by Matthew, Mark, Luke, and Paul. Passover supper and Lord's supper, in the divine law have reference to the identical meal. And the preparation and partaking of the supper, and also the partaking of the emblems, ought to be in strict accordance with the law, with all its bearings. No Interval between the supper and the partaking of the bread and cup. Matthew's testimony (26: 26). "And as they were eating, Jesus took bread and blessed it. Mark's testimony (14: 22). And as they did eat Jesus took bread and blessed and brake, and gave to them, and said, take eat (not tarry) this is my body.

Dear brethren we believe that the laws given by inspiration, ought to be obeyed, according to their original forms, without any alteration whatever. And the official members of the church will have to be either Elders or Deacons, not sub-deacons, neither sub-elders. Traits of character, and a supply of Holy Spirit, qualifies brethren for the office of bishop or deacon.

Now dear brethren, if you feel disposed to let us have a hearing through the C. F. C. not for the sake of contention, but for edification, that we all might be more fully united in the bonds of peace. And if the brethren would be so kind as to correct us, if we have erred from the truth, in relation of our views, we will confess our faults and solicit your fervent prayers. This seems to be the main object of the C. F. C., to advocate truth and to expose error. And we trust that the object will be performed by the Spirit of meekness, for the edification of the church, and not for destruction.

Yours in love.

On the Goodness of God.

The love of God has indeed abounded toward me in innumerable ways, both in temporal comforts and spiritual privileges; but especially am I indebted to his long-suffering and long-sparing mercy, that I have not been cut off in the midst of my sins. There is a way of access to the throne of grace. No one can keep me from holding communion with God in secret. No time is unfit for such a purpose; no place unfit for such devotions. There is no corner so dark, no place so secret but God is there. I am still lying on my bed, or sitting on my bed side. My limbs are swollen and as weak as they were at first. I do not know that medicine strengthens my limbs any. I have not been able to move one of my feet for almost one year without some assistance. Many are the trials I am called upon to encounter; but all these things do not move me from my steadfastness in the Lord. I know that it is my duty to depend upon that supreme power by "whom we live, move, and have our being."—Unless we are aided by the blessings of an over ruling providence, the medicine we use will be of no use to us; but with that sweet peace of conscience, with that implicit trust which maketh our election sure, we feel that our afflictions are but for a day, and if the giver of all good will bless the means used for our restoration, we may be satisfied; if not, still the same; for I know that the time is not far distant, at the longest, when I shall have done with trials, and then I shall be forever at rest.

Dear Editor: I would inquire of the C. F. C., if there is any such a thing as getting religion at a mourners bench? I live near a Methodist church, where there is a protracted meeting in progress; and several of my friends have declared that they have experienced religion at the alter. But I have never seen it manifested there. I never could perceive how they could get religion there. Many of them have declared that they have got through, and their souls are greatly blessed. Now I would ask some reader of the COMPANION, if there is such a thing as getting through, as I am only 13 years of age. I have never read much of the Bible; but I have never seen anything about the mourners bench in it, Information Wanted.

We have relatives living in the East somewhere. Information through the Companion, or by letter to my address, will be thankfully received. In 1816 I emigrated, with my family, from Franklin county, Virginia, to the State of Ohio. I had two brothers, John and Samuel Starne. My father-in-law's name was Christopher Walker; He lived in Bedford county, Va. There were ten children in the family: William, Andrew, Josiah, George, Samuel and Henry; Elizabeth, Hannah, Sarah, and my wife Mahala.

BROTHER HOLSINGER: As you desire church news, I will give you an item. A little over one year ago brother John L. Hook, and our old bishop, Jacob M. Thomas, commenced a meeting, in what is known here as the Boyer school-house. They continued the meeting for about a week. Through their efforts, accompanied with the blessing of God, there were eleven added to the little flock in that neighborhood.

This fall the same brethren held another meeting, about the same length of time, and with the blessing accompanying their labors, there were twelve more made willing to unite with us, and were baptized, as Christ has given command. This makes 23 members in less than one year, all in one neighborhood, besides large accessions, in other sections of the congregation. This church extends over a large territory, a good part of Preston county, W. Va., Alleghany county, Md., and part of Fayette county, Pa., so that, besides the body of members at Salem, we have two sub districts for the transaction of business. One at Markleysburg, Pa., and one at the Boyer school-house. We have regular meetings in convenient distances for nearly all the members to reach.

Oh, what a blessing it is to live in a place where we have good church privileges, and that we can after meet with those we love, and to anticipate the great meeting that knows no parting, where all is peace and joy.

We see in many places near where the church well established, neighborhoods where much good could be accomplished, with additional efforts on the part of the ministry; but many of our ministering brethren are not able to spend much of their time in travelling to preach the gospel. I often think if the brethren would, in certain cases, extend a helping hand, and give more encouragement to the minister of the gospel, that the cause of Christ might be advanced, and much good accomplished. We are placed here for the purpose of helping one another, and to love one another, and to live in such away and manner as to accomplish the most good we can in this world. And while we have the privilege let us be engaged in the cause of our Redeemer, and let us all try and do something to advance his kingdom and the enlargement of his church here upon earth. Let us all be up and doing while it is called to-day for the night will soon come when we cannot work.

Our old brethren are working and laboring hard, and why should we, who are younger be idle, and not do our part? May the Lord help us that we may all become faithful laborers in his vineyard, that we may receive the crown that is laid up for the finally faithful.

Voting for No License.

By reading the COMPANION, I read two articles, the first, headed, "License or No License," on page 37, present volume, written by my beloved brother Moses Miller. The other headed "An appeal to the brethren and friends in Pennsylvania," on page fifty, written by brother C. G. Lint. By reading the said two pieces, I was induced to write the following in my weakness, and limited knowledge.

What my dear brethren have written appears to be very plausible and right, but it appears to me there is some danger connected with this going to the polls to take an active part in voting with the world. Yet I shall not dictate, whether the brethren shall go and vote or not, but those that will go, I would advise to consider well what they are doing, considering the following passages of Holy Writ.

"Know ye not that ye are the temple of God, and that the Spirit of God dwelleth in you?" 1 Cor. 3: 16. "For as many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God. The Spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit, that we are the children of God;" 8: 14–16. Now if the Spirit of God dwelleth in us, and if we are led by the Spirit of God, and that Spirit beareth witness with our spirit," then the question would arise: Will the Spirit of God and Christ go with us to the polls, which is an arrangement of the world? If not, then we can certainly not go and mix with the world, and take an active part in their doings. I think it very dangerous to go to any place where the Spirit of God and Christ will not accompany us, for we are then on strange ground, and will hardly come away without more or less injury to our souls. For there will be no edifying. There is levity and vanity, and sometimes it fits very well to throw an idle word in with their vain talk, of which we have to give an account in the day of judgment. A brother must be exceedingly well guarded if he comes away as he goes there.

One of the above named writers says, this is no political question. Yet some of our tectoralers have heretofore tried to make it such.

Now if the election on the 27th of March next would be exclusively for to decide for or against License, then it might be a little different, but at the same time the township officers will be elected and some of our neighbors will run for an office. They will come very friendly and offer you their tickets and say, you are here now, you may as well put my ticket in with your "No License" ticket, and it is very likely your good neighbor will persuade you to do so, and you violate the words of Christ when he says, "My Kingdom is not of this world."

And again, our neighbors, especially those who sell or drink strong liquor, will censure you and say, now the Dunkards come out to vote, why don't they come to other elections?

But if, I say, if the Spirit of Christ will go with us to the polls, then we need not care what the neighbors will say of us.

We have often been asked, why don't you vote for good men? You wish to have a good Government to protect you and your properties. Then we are ready to tell them, that we belong to a Government or Kingdom, which Christ says, is not of this world, and tell them, we do pray for those in authority. They say, if your prayer availeth anything in behalf of our men in office, then it certainly must have the same effect in praying for "No Licens." There is something in this, which is to be considered, as, "The effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much:" James 5: 16.

Brethren, let us weigh the matter well, and not only consult reason, but also the denying doctrine and principle of our Lord Jesus Christ. Then if done so go and cast your vote, if you can do it with a good conscience to God. For my part I must say, according to my knowledge and understanding of the doctrine of my Savior Jesus, I cannot go and take an active part at the polls with the world.

Ephrata, Pa.

Congress, Ohio. Feb. 7th, 1873.

To the Readers of the Companion.

Dear brethren and friends, during the present week I have witnessed much and felt some sorrow. Brother Elijah and sister Catharine Showalter, from Waterloo, Iowa, came to Wayne county, Ohio, to visit their relatives. While being at brother Mahlon Meyers', the parents of sister Showalter, their little boy, Jesse Lyndon, was taken sick. Medical aid was sommoned, but the disease was unyielding. The loving parents and grandparents watched over the child with tender care for some weeks; but, finally, on Saturday, Feb. 1st, death received the little sufferer, at the age of three years 2 months and 22 days. On Sunday 2nd we buried him at the Mohican meeting-house, a large congregation being present, to whom we tried to preach, from 2nd Samuel 12: 22, 23.

Before we left the house, we received the sad, but not unexpected news, that we are to meet again on the next day. John Garver son of David Garver dec'd, was born April 12th, 1825; was united in marriage with Catharine, daughter of Elder John Shoemaker, March 12th. 1846: united with the church in 1848; has for many years held the office of deacon, and has always done his duty faithfully. About 8 weeks ago he was prostrated with a complication of diseases, which successfully baffled all the medical skill that was brought into requisition; and on Saturday Feb. 1st. at 4 P. M. the spirit took its flight. On Monday the 3rd, all that was left of brother John was laid into that gloomy prison that waits for us all. Thus passed away one of our number; and one whose place in the church, and in the neighborhood, we are not able to fill. Brother Garver was a man of good natural abilities. In counsel, he was wise and discreet. His words were generally put to the right place, and spoken at the right time. In exhortation and in prayer he was strong. As a neighbor and friend there are no better. He always had a cheerful word for all; was ready to "rejoice with them who do rejoice and weep with those who weep." In summing up his character, I would not do justice to the memory of brother John, if I did not say that, in his death, I have lost a valued personal friend—one who stood by me, for the past ten years, in sunshine and shade, and especially in storm and trouble. Peace to his ashes. Sometime previous to his death, brother John took the advice of the apostle James, called for the elders of the church, was anointed "with oil in the name of the Lord." Being absent from home, I was not permitted to witness this ministration; but, at a subsequent visit, he told me all was clear—all was well. He retained his mind to the last, and died in peace. He had selected 2 Tim. 4: 6—8, for his funeral text, with a request, that brethren Jacob Garver and Brown preach it. Which we tried to do to the best of our ability. The day was stormy; the weather disagreeable; yet, the large meeting-house was nearly filled with relatives and neighbors. Brother John had many friends; and as is usually the case with men who are worthy, he had but few enemies. These seem to be a necessary evil, and a man that has none at all, will not be likely to be of much use in the world—even "A man's foes shall be those of his own household." Matt. 10: 36.

Brother John leaves a sorrowing widow, a sister in the church, and nine children, three of them married, one in the medical and one in the legal profession; but sorry to say, none in the Christian profession.

On Thursday [the 6th] of the same week, we were called to preach the funeral for a grandson of old brother Wm. Ramsey, in Ashland county. The parents, Samuel W. and Catharine Ramsey, of this young man, (named after his grandfather, William R Ramsey,) live in the State of Michigan. The boy being in feeble health, and the climate and medical facilities not being favorable for his recovery, he was sent to Ohio, and placed under the treatment of Dr. C. J. Warner, of Congress, Ohio. But, "When death enters there is no defense."

Although the parents were far away in the snow-clad wilds of Michigan, all that human aid could do was done for the boy; but he died on the second of February, aged 18 years and 2 days. The mail and telegraphic facilities were used and the corpse was kept from Sunday until Thursday, in order to get the parents to the funeral, but all in vain; the other relatives wept over his grave in their stead. He was buried at Orange, in Oakland county, and the funeral was preached in the Presbyterian meeting-house at that place. A large congregation was present. Text Isaiah 38: 1. Brother William Sadler being present and like a true brother he assisted in the exercises. "Therefore be ye also ready." P. J. Brown.

New York, Feb. 1st, 1873.

H. R. Holsinger,

My Dear Christian Brother, It has been a long while since I have had the pleasure of seeing you, and longer since I have said anything to my dear brethren and sisters through the columns of your much valued paper. There are various reasons for this, chief among which is the fact that I have all the while been undecided as to how long I should stay. I have been here since the 8th of last April, except the little time spent in traveling, and now I find myself so completely absorbed in business, that to find time to write seems almost wholly out of the question. I can assure you, however, my interest in the cause of our blessed Redeemer, and the success of his church is not abated.

I have learned since my stay in this city, that New York is truly, not only the metropolis of business, but also the maelstrom of fashion and dissipation. Yet, with all this, if we had a church organization here, we would certainly be the means of accomplishing a great good. There is here such a powerful tendency to infidelity, that Christians of whatever name, are warmly welcomed in most of the churches.

The people here are sociable and warm-hearted; and but for the want of the society of my brethren and sisters, I could find contentment and happiness. But I can not become reconciled to the place for the want of this precious Christian intercourse. And because I was undecided, I have not changed "papers;" hence it is only occasionally that I have had the happiness of reading the "news from the churches," and seeing those old, familiar names, which used to afford me so much pleasure. I have now instructed one of your agents to send me the Companion, which, I am sure, will be like a feast to the soul in a desert of sin.

I was very much interested in the work of the Maine Missionaries; and as soon as I heard they passed through this city, I wrote to brother Longaneeker, at Skowhegan, asking him to stop and see me on their return. I presume, however, they had already left the place, as I have, as yet, received no reply.

Pray for me, brethren, that I may not enter into temptation. I presume

I have not a brother or sister in all this great city. May heaven water and bless the good seed wherever sown, until all the ends of the earth shall hear the glad news of salvation.

The Christian Family Companion. Is published every Tuesday, at $1.50 a year, by Henry R. Holsinger, who is a member of the Church of the Brethren, sometimes known by the name of "German Baptists," and vulgarly or maliciously called "Dunkards."

The design of the work is to advocate truth, expose error, and encourage the true Christian on his way to Zion.

It assumes that the New Testament is the Will of God, and that no one can have the promise of salvation without observing all its requirements, that among these are Faith, Repentance, Prayer, Baptism by trine immersion, Feet Washing, the Lord's Supper, the Holy Communion, Charity, Nonconformity to the world, and a full resignation to the whole will of God, as he has revealed it through his Son Jesus Christ.

So much of the affairs of this world as may be thought necessary to the proper observance of the signs of the times, or such as may tend to the moral, mental, or physical benefit of the Christian will be published, thus removing all occasion for coming into contact with the so-called Literary or Political journals.

Subscriptions may begin at any time.

Faith Alone.

Brother J. S. Flory's article in No. 5, p. 21, has forcibly brought to my mind the great necessity of warning the repenting sinner against so dangerous a doctrine as the faith alone doctrine. We are glad when we hear of sinners repenting; and the Savior has told us that the angels in Heaven rejoice when a sinner repents. But, after all the rejoicing, there is danger of the sin-sick soul being lost, by not receiving the right kind of medicine. It appears sometimes needful to take up the prophet's lamentation, "Is there no balm in Gilead? Is there no physician there? Why then is not the health of the daughters of my people recovered?" The balm certainly is there. But what of the physician? Yes, there is a balm to be had, and free for every one. If the sin-sick souls would only resort to that instead of those miserable quacks of divinity, they would speedily recover. But they have sent their palatable and easily administered medicine broad-cast over the land, so that you can scarcely pick up a religious tract without finding lots of it advertised for the sinner. The dangerous doctrine of "only believe in Jesus, and lay all your sins on him," has taken such a firm hold on some, that it is almost impossible to get them to believe otherwise.—When once they imagine that they have gone to Jesus and laid all their sins on him, they are indeed in a hopeless condition. Now I doubt whether any one can lay his sins on Jesus. It seems to me it looks too much like imposing on the goodness of Christ. I do not believe that the Savior is pleased with such proceedings.—But there are some who have so much faith in Jesus that they leave all for him to do, and they go on their way quite contented, without ever touching one of his commandments; they don't appear to be in the least concerned about those outward ordinances, or non-essentials, as they call them. They profess to have been to the fountain's head and there received the assurance that they are accepted of him; and some of them have such a high opinion of themselves that it is beneath their dignity to stoop so low as some of the commandments require. They ask the Savior to be their servant, and give him all the work to do. Not considering that Christ has already done more for the sinners than they deserve. Jesus has provided the means whereby we can get relieved of all our sins, and they who will not accept of these means, if they are placed on the left hand of the Judge, it will be their own fault. Many poor souls will be wofully disappointed when they are brought up to give an account. "Not every one that saith unto me Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven." Thus it is plain that there is something for us to do, and that faith is dead without works. Our sins, with the sins of the whole world, were once laid on the Savior, when in the garden of Gethsemane, and became so heavy that an angel was dispatched from heaven to strengthen him. "And being in an agony, he prayed more earnestly, and his sweat was as it were great drops of blood falling to the ground. And to attempt to lay our sins on him the second time would be nothing less than to crucify him the second time. It would be best not to harbor such a thought, or depend upon it, you can not do it. Our Savior has risen triumphantly over all sin, death, hell, and the grave; and has taken his seat at the right hand of the throne of God, where no sin can enter. But, says one, did he not say, "Come unto me all ye that labor and are heavy laden?" Yes, certainly, you must go to Jesus and confess your sins, and your inability to do anything of yourselves, and ask him for strength and courage to do your duty; and then take his yoke upon you, which will not leave you the liberty to take your own way when he directs another. Never go to the Savior with the intention of laying your sins on him, but take them to the place where he has told you through the apostle Peter on the day of Pentecost, and there have them buried beneath the waves in a watery grave. Then you have the promise of the gift of the Holy Ghost, which will lead you into all truth, and you will also receive that rest which is sweet to the soul But then don't forget to go daily to him, and ask for strength to hold out faithful, and also thank him for providing a place wherein you could get relieved of all your sins, and be assured they will all flow down with the stream into the ocean of forgetfulness; and then try to be consistent with what you profess. Let all our actions correspond with our profession. Give no occasion for the enemy to bring reproach upon the church, but walk in wisdom's ways toward them that are without. David prayed to be led in a plain path, because of his enemies, and his observers. They know we profess to have renounced the sinful pleasures and vain pomp of the world, and to see the contrary in us confirms them the more in their deluded way; and it is one of the greatest hindrances to the cause of Christ. Brethren and sisters, let us be careful how we walk towards those that are without, and at the same time not forget the love we are to go by towards those that are in the sheep-fold. Let us not unnecessarily find fault with our brethren, and give room for the enemy to say, "They are fighting among themselves." Give no occasion whereby our brother or sister may become offended, or made weak in the faith. Christ has so indentified himself with his people, that when we sin against the brethren we sin against Christ. I know we have to meet with many difficulties and trials, and it is not always easy to decide which is the best way to pursue so as not to offend. One thing, however, is clear; our young members ought not to give any occasion for the more thoughtful members to feel that the church which Christ has purchased with his own blood, is losing its strength and beauty through their conformity to the world. It is the duty of all of us to aim for peace in the church; but then it will not do to cover the truth for the sake of peace. We need brethren and sisters that are not afraid to stand in the hottest of the battle, to contend for the faith once delivered to the saints. The apostle Paul urges us to lay aside every weight, and the sin which doth so easily beset us, and run with patience the race set before us, by the consideration that we are compassed about with so great a cloud of witnesses. Some say that each one has his besetting sin, some one way, and some another way; but I think the apostle here means unbelief to be the besetting sin. I think he proves it by bringing in so great a cloud of witnesses in the preceding chapter, who having all died in the faith without receiving the promises. If we would always keep in view the promises that are promised to the faithful there would, perhaps, be less imperfection. But we are such forgetful creatures, that we sometimes do things we ought not, before we consider. But, nevertheless, let us lift up the hands that hang down, and the feeble knees, and make straight paths for our feet; and pray to God to make us more perfect in every good work, to do his will, working in us that which is well pleasing in his sight, through Jesus Christ to whom be glory forever. Amen.

What Constitutes Gambling.

Chief Justice Thompson, of Pennsylvania, in a recent case gave his opinion of gambling in the following words :—Any thing which induces men to risk their money or property without any other hope of return than to get for nothing any given amount from another is gambling, and demoralizing to the community, no matter by what name it may be called. It is the same whether the promise be to pay on the color of a card, or the fleetness of a horse, and the same numerals indicate how much is lost or won in either case, and the losing party has received just as much for the money parted with in the one case as in the other, viz: nothing at all. The lucky winner is of course the gainer, and he will continue so until fickle fortune, in due time, makes him feel the woes he has inflicted on others. All gambling is immortal. I apprehend that the losses incident to the practice disclosed within the past five years have contributed more to the failures and embezzlements by public officers, clerks, agents, and others acting in fiduciary relations, public and private, than any other known, or perhaps all other causes; and the worst of it is, that in the train of its evils there is a vast amount of misery and suffering by persons entirely guiltless of any participation in the cause of it.

The Religion of Paying Debts.

Men may sophisticate as much as they please, they cannot make it right, and all the bankrupt laws in the universe cannot make it right, for them not to pay their debts. There is a sin in this neglect, as clear and deserving of church discipline as in stealing or false swearing. He who violates his promise to pay, or withholds the payment of a debt, when it is within his power to meet his engagement, ought to be made to feel that in the sight of all honest men he is a swindler. Religion may be a very comfortable cloak under which to hide, but if religion does not make a man deal justly it is not worth having.

Change.

The written words we dim with tears,
Traced by the dead in other years;
When from its temple flown the mind,
How dear each record left behind!
How mournfully our glances rest
On aught by their loved hands impressed;
Each penciled word, each careless line.—
Lost friend, how may I look on thine?

The smile that oft my glad eyes met
Doth beam for others brightly yet;
The voice I loved of old to hear
Still falls on many a listening ear.
The angel of the silent land
On thee hath spared to lay his hand;
But, even than death, more sad and strange,
Between us lies the gulf of change.

The dearest hopes that life hath brought,
The holiest dreams, the purest thought,
By thee inspired in days gone by,
I would not bid their memory die.
So bright these long-departed hours;
So crowned with hope's most fragrant flowers,
That thoughts of thee, through good or ill,
For their sweet sakes I cherish still.

The idols of those years passed by
All broken on their altars lie;
No hand their beauty may restore;
The young heart's trust will come no more.
Yet, as we dream, 'mid winter's snows,
Of the sweet time when bloomed the rose;
So fond and faithful memory
Whispers of those past hours and thee.

False Precept.

We lately took up a monthly paper, originating from one of the publishing cities, in which we found an article headed, "Earning and Spending." The first part was sensible and true enough; but the latter portion expressed a theory quite unsound and in opposition to the plain teachings of the Bible. It was this, 'See that you are proud." Let your pride be of the right kind·" "Be too proud to be lazy." &c.

A great blunder indeed—a gross mistake—to exhort and encourage persons to be proud, or to contend that pride is ever necessary when nothing in scripture is more positively condemned. "Hear ye, be not proud; for the Lord hath spoken. But if ye will not hear it, my soul shall weep in secret places for your pride." Jer. 13: 15, 17. "See that you are proud"—"Be not proud." Can two such opposite principles harmonize? No better, we think, than truth and falsehood can. One is a human requirement, the other divine. Which shall we obey, God or man? "Every one that is proud in heart, is an abomination to the Lord." Prov. 16, 5. Is it proper to commend what the Lord abominates? Even a "proud look" Prov. 6: 17, is hated of the Lord. "An high look and a proud heart is sin;" Prov. 31: 4. How does the ring of the writer's bell chime with this? If pride is sin, then there is such an article as "the right kind" of sin required of us. Nothing can be more false or unsound. That which qualifies the noun heart, the Bible pronounces sin; and 'Sin is the transgression of the law." John 3: 4. What is "the right kind" of transgression of God's law? The conspicuous writer might call it "the right kind of pride." But we have never believed in the existence of such an abstract. Pride is all wrong; because it is sin and because God hates it. "God resisteth the proud but giveth grace unto the humble." James 4: 6. "I am against thee, O thou most proud, saith the Lord God." Jer. 50: 30.

Pride prevents men from seeking after God; it leads to destruction. "The wicked through the pride of his countenance, will not seek after God." Ps. 10: 4. Pride goeth before destruction." Prov. 16: 18. It is what "will finally destroy its possessor." "And he shall bring down their pride." Isa. 25: 11. "Woe to the crown of pride." 28: 1. Many other texts might be cited in its condemnation; but not one found where it is commended. Not one particle of Bible logic is in its favor. Hence all other logic when opposed to God's word must be false, if the Bible be true. But humility, wisdom, and prudence are commended.—These applied in practice will comprehend man's duty. If the definition be correct, that prudence means "a conformity to the rules of reason, truth and decency, at all times, and in all circumstances," instead of saying as many of the ignorant, and those devoted to foppery and fashion will say, "Have pride enough to be decent," we should say, have prudence enough to be decent; prudence enough to speak the truth, and not to lie, cheat, steal, or to be lazy. We think it proper for all to examine the scriptures more fully, and to seek the true meaning of words befor applying them. Let the best lexicons be consulted, and language used corresponding and coupled with God's word. This will constitute the basis of all true principle.

How Long!

"Behold I make all things new." Rev. xxi, 5.

Still do they linger—these slow treading ages,
How long must we still bear their cold delay?
Streak after streak the glowing dawn presages;
And yet it breaks not the expected day

Each passing year with prophet lips has spoken,
"Prepare your praises, Earth awake and sing!"
But yet yon dome of blue remains unbroken;
No tidings yet of the descending King!

Darkness, still darkness;—nearer and yet nearer
The lightning gleams, the sea's scorched billows moan;
And the sere leaf of earth is growing sorer;—
Creation droops and heaves a bitter groan.

O storm and earthquake,-wind and warning thunder,
Your hour is coming;—one wild outburst more,
One other day of war, and wreck, and plunder,
And then--your desolating reign is o'er.

These plains are not your battle-fields forever;
The glassy deep was never made for you;
These mountains were not made for you to shiver;
These buds were not for your rude hand to strew!

Flee! and give back to earth its verdant gladness,
The unsoiled freshness of its balmy dew!
Take hence your sackcloth with its gloomy sadness,
And let the wrinkled skies their youth renew!

Give back that day of days—the seventh, and fairest,—
When, like a gem new-set, earth flung afar
Her glory,—of creation's gems the rarest,—
Sparkling in beauty to each kindred star!
Come back; thou holy love—so rudely banished,
When evil came, and hate, and fear, and wrong!
Return thou joyous light,—so quickly vanished—
Revive, thou life that death has quenched so long!

Re-fix, re-knit the chain so harshly broken,
That bound our lower orb to your bright heavens;—
Hang out on high the long-desired token—
The sign of earth renewed and man forgiven!

Withdraw the vail that has for ages hidden
That world of brightness from our lower sphere!
Renew thy fellowship so long forbidden!—
O God! Thyself take up thy dwelling here!—Sel.

Is Christ's Coming Delayed?

When Christ spoke to his disciples of his second advent into the world he said, "Of that day and hour knoweth no man, neither the angels in heaven, nor the Son, but the Father only." How the Son, as one with the Father knew not the day neither the hour in which this event shall take place depends mainly upon the meaning of the term know. The passage has given rise to many speculations, and is freely used by those who do not believe in the essential Deity of of Christ. It is, however, not with this aspect of the passage that we are now concerned. We believe that the text clearly teaches that eighteen hundred years ago the Father knew the day and the hour of Christ's second advent. It was then as definitely fixed in his mind as it is now; as definitely as the time of the first advent when Daniel's prophecy of seventy weeks was delivered.

Not only does this passage indicate that fact, but there are others equally clear on that point. We may make such a broad application of the passage in the Acts, where it is said. "It is not for you to know the times and the seasons, which the Father has put in his power" With more immediate reference to the second advent of the expression made in 2 Tim. vi: 15, Which in his times (or time) he shall shew. That is, God, the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, will show, set forth, or bring to pass the glorious revelation of his Son at the time which rests in the counsels of God.

From other events, as well as from the infinite perfections of God, the same fact is evident. The first advent, as above stated, occurred when the "fullness of the time was come." Other events have occurred "in his time," as specified by the word of inspiration. And from the general tenor of revelation we are warranted in concluding that the times and seasons of all events are known to God.

At the times thus known to God all events transpire. There is no delay in the transpiring of any events; there is no actual hastening of them. We need not even fall back upon God's prerogative to predestinate events in order to find a ground for such belief. His unlimited foreknowledge of all future events includes a foreknowledge of this particular event, the second coming of Christ. And although it is natural to conclude from the language of the apostle that they looked for this event in their day, yet it never was so fixed in the counsels of Jehovah. He changeth not, neither in his plans, purposes or knowledge.

The time of the coming of Christ has, therefore, not been deferred; his coming has not been delayed by any untoward events which may have occurred. When he will come God knows, and in the fullness of that time he will come—not sooner nor later. It, therefore, makes altogether a wrong impression on the minds of hearers and readers to speak of the delay of Christ's coming. Some men have become so completely possessed of the idea that this event will take place at a certain period, that when it does not they are prone to speak of the delay of the second advent. The signs may now favor the belief that the event is not far distant, but we are not warranted to make any positive declarations on this head, as if we knew the day and the hour, and then speak of a delay when we fail to realize our anticipations. We prefer to leave the times and seasons with God, just where the Bible leaves them, and yet so to live that that day shall not overtake us as a thief in the night. It is inconsistent with our belief in the omniscience of God to intimate that any special event has failed to transpire "in his time."

License or No License.

The people of Pennsylvania will, ere long, be called upon to vote on this question. Some of our able brethren have given in their views upon the matter; and, so far, those that have written on this point, have all expressed themselves in favor of No License. This alone should give us a reason, that we should, if we are spared, go to the polls and vote No License.

But the question arises at once, what class of people is for and what class against license? Let us, all my dear brethren, consider this matter, not only carefully, but prayerfully, in a Christian spirit. I ask again, who asks for license to sell the poisonous drug? Is it the true Christian? "No," you answer. Well, is it the moral man? "Well, yes, I suppose it is," you will say. Well, let us sift the matter a little.

We have it on good authority, that, in our own county, those landlords who keep what we may call a moral tavern, are in favor of No License. This proves to us that the moral man is not in favor of License. But we go on, and we find a class of people, who not only have no respect for themselves, but no fear of a God of justice, who will drain the poor beggar's pocket of the last dime in his possession, take the last piece of clothing off the drunkard's body, do not care to ruin the peace and happiness of poor families here, and destroy the immortal part of their victims. These are the men, with their customers, who will vote for License.

But some of the Brethren will say, "I am no drunkard, have no desire for the pernicious cup, therefore have nothing to do with this question." Brethren, you who reason thus, let us reason the subject a little farther. Let me ask you first, what is the duty of the Christian? is it not to love God supremely, and our fellow-men as ourselves? Well, now, if we love God supremely, will we not then do all we can to bring the evils of our day to a decrease instead of increase? You will, no doubt, admit, that, under our present License system, the evil of intemperance is on the increase. And may we not give all the opportunities which are afforded unto us to bring it to a decrease, a helping hand? Where is the brother in the whole church, if in his power to sweep drunkenness out of existence, who would not do it? Have we such a brother in the whole church? If we have, he is one only such in name, and no member of Christ's church.

Again, it may not interest us so much individually. I can say this, brethren, if I had no other temptation to overcome than the appetite for ardent spirits, I would indeed feel a happy man. So, individually, I am not concerned in this matter. But to love my fellow-man as myself, is my Master's command; and how can I love him, when I help to destroy both body and soul? Brethren for the sake of our holy religion, which we profess, let us deal with this matter carefully. Who of us knows and remembers not a dear friend, who has been ruined by the use of the intoxicating cup? I could name numbers of families, who, had it not been for these hell-holes, could have been useful to society. But need we go out of our own families in order to find one of Satan's servants in frequenting these hell preparing places? Where is the father or the mother, whose heart has not almost been broken by some drunken member of the family? Parents, who have watched their children from their infancy to keep them from all the danger humanity is exposed to, whose prayers have ascended to God, to keep their children in the path of virtue; but on a day when no danger seemed to threaten, when perhaps they looked upon their children, with a clear conscience, knowing they had raised them according to Paul's direction, when they were in hopes that they would be ornaments, in God's house, when, perhaps, the mother was looking for the return of her loving son, from the place of business, instead, of receiving, perhaps the welcome kiss of a husband, she had to behold a drunken husband, or the return of a drunken son. Only a few years ago, a case very like the above happened in our neighborhood. A son of a worthy brother and sister, who I feel had done their duty in raising their children, went away in the morning, to school. By the enticement of others, who had not been raised so carefully as far as regards Christianity, he was induced to visit one of these manufactories. In the evening he was brought home drunk. And oh! the mother! I know, if she could go to the polls, she would vote No License. The father and the son, who now is a respectable young brother will go and vote, unmistakably No License.

Brethren, I feel, if we examine this matter carefully, no one who is able to go will stay away, but go and swell the majority against License, that others will say that we, the church of the Brethren, are certainly a strong Temperance Society.

A Foretaste of Hell.

Brother Holsinger: I did not think that so soon after leaving you, I would find one of those little primary habitation of devils, too often unseen by the thoughtless, but always recognized by serious thinkers. Your readers will please excuse me for clothing my thoughts in such a tasteless, and unpleasant garb. I feel as though the horrors of hell had taken hold on me. I only need to step through one door to get into the bar-room, where there is enough sin to make angels weep. Those who were once so pure and innocent, are being poisoned by that deadly fiend—king alcohol. O, that there might yet be a remedy. I feel so unpleasant. The wife of the whiskey vender has just passed me. Pity caused me to look up. For a moment my eyes were peering into her sad face. What a volume I read at a single glance! She looks so unhappy. You know she could not look otherwise. Sunshine warms other homes; but here there is nothing but darkness. Great God, pity the creatures whom thou hast made!

A rather dull looking boy, with long, disheveled hair, handed me the pencil with which I am writing. Will I ever grasp that hand in heaven? Perhaps not; and yet his soul is as precious as mine. His little girl is standing on the otherside of the table, studying her spelling lesson. She spells aloud. Her voice seems to me rather pleasant, and I have almost forgotten the unhallowed influence, with which I am surrounded. But, she has dropped her book; gone out into the kitchen and her mother speaks to her, as she looks at me, and that makes my blood run cold. Shall she be brought up under such unhallowed influence. O how I wish that I were in some happy home to-night, where I could bask this weary soul of mine in the light of the unseen world. Will the holy angels watch my silent breathing when I lay my weary head upon its pillow, in a home like this? Why did not I try to stay one night elsewhere? Why am I staying at a hotel of this kind? I wiee did I shudder at the idea of staying here, only to get my consent after being assured that intemperance is the worst crime—the only real crime aside from ignorance, that holds in bondage this Christless place. "All things work together for good to them who love God," says the Bible, and the lesson that I learn here to-night is one of profit to me, may it be the same to our readers who should pray for and labor in the temperance cause.

Pleasant Plants and Strange Slips.

"Because thou hast forgotten the God of thy salvation, and hast not been mindful of the rock of thy strength, therefore shalt thou plant pleasant plants, and shalt set it with strange slips. In the day shalt thou make thy plant to grow, and in the morning shalt thou make thy seed to flourish; but the harvest shall be a heap in the day of grief and of desperate sorrow" Isaiah 17: 10, 11.

"Because thou hast forgotten" signifies thou hast known these things. They do reasonably apply, at the present day, to those who have embraced Christ, and learned his goodness in taking away our burden of sin, and bringing us into close relationship with him. "Oh happy day, when Jesus washed my sins away." We felt then as though we never again would go back into the "beggarly elements of the world;" but now Satan comes to us as he did to Jesus after he was baptized, and tries to get us to worship him, by leading us away from the path of the cross. We feel strong at first, and could by no means be persuaded to leave or forget our Master

But we are living in a world of labor and business, and many are the avocations of life to which our minds are attracted in order to gain a livelihood, which also is a command of God. Now Satan is ready, and while the mind revolves in business, he holds before man the most glowing and brilliant prospects. He shows him all the kingdoms of the world, the wealth of the face of the earth, and the hidden treasures in the earth, and says, "Of all these you shall have abundance, if you will just come with me." But the Christian who stands upon the rock, says, "No, I love not the world, neither the things that are in the world. I am seeking 'the riches of the full assurance of understanding, to the acknowledgement of the mysteries of God, and of the Father, and of Christ, in whom are hidden all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge.'" Col. 2: 2, 3.

Jesus said, "Watch and pray that ye enter not into temptation." The spirit is willing, but the flesh is weak; and if we neglect this duty we give occasion to the adversary, and are most likely to be led captive at his will. The tempter seeks opportunities, and will steal into our minds and tell us, "You are a little late this morning and hav'nt time to pray, it will do as well at night." We partake of our bounty and go about our business, leaving the soul without a morsel of food. We pass the day in busy cares and toil; night comes; I am tired, the flesh is weak, the soul also has been fasting to-day, no time to read or pray, consequently, can not watch. The tempter is on time, and reasons thus, "I have had good thoughts all day, been honest in all my dealings, God knows I am all right, I'll go to bed and take my rest." Soon I fall asleep and sleep all night, wake up in the morning, well rested, ready for another busy day, forgetful of thanks for this rest. Business is now the master-piece, and the time for prayer is soon forgotten. Sometimes thought of, but hastily passed over, as it becomes a gloomy thought. Now the charms of earth grow brighter, and the prospects for life fairer; I see no use in so much self-denial; I will lay aside the cross of humility; there is no use in being old fashioned and keeping myself out of society; there is no harm in going to the state fair and see what improvements are made, or to picnics: is it all civil amusement; it matters not whether we go to church so often, we can do just as much good at home, or whether we belong to a church at all; we can be just as good outside the church as in it. This is pleasant reasoning and very agreeable to our nature. But let me call your attention to the text, "Thou shalt plant pleasant plants," because thou hast forgotten, and what next? "shall set it with strange slips." Now turn to your test book and see what kind of slips these be that you are setting, before you go too far. "In the day shalt thou make thy plant to grow, and in the morning shalt thou make thy seed to flourish." But what of the harvest? "It shall be a heap in the day of grief, and of desperate sorrow." What a disappointment!

Man's ways are not God's ways. There is a way that seemeth right unto man; but the end of that way is death. We cannot be guided by any such reasoning. We have the plain written word, and it must be our light, our guide, and life. The Christian way is a rugged path; thorns and briers infest it. Many inconveniencies and little crosses come to us, but when we look to Christ he makes them easy. Alongs ide of this path are many beautiful gardens which our eyes may behold, but we dare not stop to look at them; we are running a race, and if we stop, we retard our speed and may become a stumbling block in the way of others; and if we pass over to them, we may be enticed to remain there, and turn in with those gardens in setting pleasant plants.

My dear young Christians, as you travel along on this apparently rough, and ugly road, and see these beautiful gardens by the side, where many laborers are employed planting pleasant plants, just say to yourself, "They are setting strange slips, which they know not, but I know that my redeemer liveth, and that he has walked this way before me, and I can follow where he leads, and my reward shall not be "a heap in the day of grief, and of desperate sorrow; but the association of angels and the riches of God's heavenly storehouse."

Variety.

In nature we see variety everywhere. The earth, with its hills and valleys, its mountains of snow and mountains of fire, its rivers and lakes, its seas and oceans, presents to the eye and the imagination, a variety and grandeur pleasing to behold and contemplate.

If we examine the animal, vegetable, and mineral kingdoms, many things will be seen that are much alike in appearance, yet the eye will behold a pleasing variety in every face, leaf, and stone.

All creation being filled with variety, it is no marvel that man refuses to eat bread alone.

Many of us remember well the time when water-baptism began and ended almost every sermon preached. Now, however, for a minister to read for a text, "He that believeth and is baptized," &c., is quite as new as many other texts we hear expounded.

The COMPANION has variety in every number. Yet the fields and mines from which its corps of correspondents may range and dig are inexhaustible. May they, as they travel over the fields and excavate the mines, pen that only that will educate, purify, and elevate the mind. Give us variety, brethren, but let it be a good variety.

In jotting travels, that only should be noted that is of general interest. To go on a tour and write a report for the COMPANION, and tell with whom I dined and with whom I took tea, &c., could only interest the actors, and would be of no use to the general reader. But when we are permitted to enjoy the hospitality of those whose families are an exception for their true piety and Christian walk, our pencil might make a sketch that would cause others to have Christian homes.

Old Hundred is a good old tune; but if we hear no other it becomes dull, and we desire new tunes. New tunes, and old ones, too, are found in the Brethren's Tune and Hymn Book, and by a little effort every congregation might procure them, and easily learn to sing many spiritual songs understandingly. The songs of Zion are food to the soul; and, if the food of the Shepherd is not palatable, the songs of the fold may be made sweet to the taste and cheering to the soul.

It is said, that it costs the United States $50,000,000 annually for tobacco. How many meeting-houses could be built every year with the money that the brethren expend for tobacco, no one knows. If it could be so applied soon, every congregation would have a comfortable house, in which to worship God.

Different Degrees of Glory.

Sometime ago, as I was visiting at the house of a brother, the conversation turned upon the subject of different degrees of glory, which caused me to search the Scriptures, to see what foundation I had for my opinion.

I find in my Bible many texts, that, according to my way of thinking, will prove that there are different degrees of glory, a few which I will cite. Although it is not the "one thing needful" to secure the soul's salvation yet, that being our belief, it may incite us on to nobler deeds of action in the cause of our blessed Lord and Master. I will now call your attention to a few passages of scripture that will substantiate my ideas.

The first that I turn to is, Matth. 5: 19, "Whosoever therefore shall break one of these least commandments, and shall teach men so, he shall be called the least in the kingdom of heaven; but whosoever shall do and teach them, the same shall be called great in the kingdom of heaven."

Rev. 22: 12, "And behold, I come quickly; and my reward is with me, to give every man according as his work shall be."

For the sake of brevity, I will point you to a few texts which you can read at your leisure: 2 John, 8th verse; 1 Cor. 15: 41; 3: 8; Luke 18: 16,18.

I add no more, for I think these are sufficient. We know that we are but unprofitable servants at best; yet we should be careful that we are not drones in the hive, but be busy workers in the Master's cause.

Dear brethren and sisters, let us work earnestly and faithfully while it is called to-day; for the night cometh wherein no man can work. Let us try and be instrumental in leading some, if it is only one, sin-sick soul to Christ, and let us also be careful, that, while we try to do good to others, we ourselves are not castaways. For verily we will have our reward; for,

"Our troubles and our trials here,
Will only make us richer there,
When we arrive at home.
Oh, what a happy time that will be!

If we have lived a truly Christian life in this world, our heavenly Father will bid us come and sit down on his throne, then we shall know for surety what our reward shall be.

How the World Judges Christians.

There are persons who would judge of Christians as men would judge of apples, who should enter an orchard and go stooping along upon the ground in search of them. He picks one up, a hard, green, thing, no bigger than a walnut. He bites it; it puckers up his mouth and sets his teeth on edge.—"Ha!" he says, throwing the untimely fruit away, "I hear them speak of apples as being so delicious; I am sure I don't think much of this one."

He picks up another which looks yellow. There is a hole in it, but he don't know what it means, so he bites into it and finds a worm.

"Bah! apples delicious, indeed;" he cries in disgust; and picks up a third, which is crushed by his touch, for it is rotten. So he condemns apples because he has looked for them upon the ground instead of on the trees above head, where they hang ripe, juicy and luscious, a chief treasure of autumn.

So men judge Christians, so long as they take for fair samples those that lie rotten on the ground.—Beecher.

Lifting up Both Hands to Christ.

During the winter season a young lady, while crossing the ice, came to a thin place, and fell through. A gentleman sitting by his office window, hearing a cry for help, hastened to the spot. He immediately put out both hands, saying, "Clasp my hands tightly, and I will save you." She replied, "O, I cannot lift up both hands! one rests upon the ice; were I to raise it I should surely sink." He answered, "Let go your hold upon the ice; trust me, and I will save you; were I to take but one I could not draw you out." She then raised up both hands, he caught them, drew her out, and she went on her way rejoicing. Are there not many who, while walking upon the sea of life, come to some point when they see their needy condition and cry for help? The Savior hears the cry, and stands with "outstretched arms" to save them, but like the young lady they are unwilling to put up both hands, saying in heart, if not in words, "O, were I to loose my hold upon earth I should surely sink for He might not save me; then what should I have to lean upon?" But the Savior stands waiting, saying, "Trust me. You cannot cling to both. Let the fleeting world go. Look to me. I will take you from the horrible pit and miry clay, and set your feet upon the rock, where you can rest secure for time and eternity." Some obey the voice, lift up both hands, crying, "Lord, save me or I perish," are saved and go on their way rejoicing. But, alas! too many would be saved by raising one hand to Christ, while cleaving to the world with the other, placing it either upon its riches, honors, or pleasures, feeling they cannot give up all for Christ. And when Christ says, "Leave all and follow Me," they turn back and sink deeper into worldliness and sin and are lost; yes, lost forever.—Selected.

He that will not hear before hand, must take what comes afterward.

We would better not profess Christianity at all, than to fall back into pride afterward.

We cannot expect a blessing from heaven, if we are ashamed to ask for it.

MY GRANDMOTHER'S HOUSE

BY MARGARET MASON.

Built years ago—large, quaint and square—
Things old-fashioned everywhere;
Grandmother's house, were you ever there?

In quest of a place on a summer's day,
When they went to build, did they lose their way
And among the buttercups go astray?

Lose their way, and say to each,
We'll place it here by the rocky beach,
Just from the waters out of reach?

And so they built it; large and square
Cosey corners here and there,
Old-fashioned wonders everywhere.

Unlooked-for nooks on every side,
Queer old places where one might hide,
Grandmother's house, our childish pride.

Old-fashioned dishes, fit for elves,
Stowed away on closet shelves,
Unmatched platters by themselves;

Curious China, quaint and old,
Thirteen stars in blue and gold,
Two gilt doves in circle hold.

All alone there stands a plate,
On topmost shelf, without a mate,
Relic of an ancient cate.

Oft have I turned from dainty spread,
Forgot my slice of wheaten bread,
To con that pictured plate instead.

Its full-rigged ships of deepest blue,
The seas unruffled, sailing through,
Toward a distant landscape view.

Flying pennants at masthead each,
Ships that sail, but never reach
The bluish pebbles on the beach.

In its red case, standing tall,
Ticks the clock against the wall,
Its benediction on us all.

On braided mat in a cosey chair,
The glory of the house is there,
Time's gathered snow upon her hair.

The story of her life is told,
She's drifting away in the mist and gold
Of a life beyond that never grows old.

Drifting away, and out of sight,
Into the glory of greater light,
Into a day that has no night.

And in all the world there never will be
A house, old-fashioned, like this for me,
Among the daisies down by the sea.

Children's Literature.

Some one exclaimed, upon some occasion long ago, "Thank God! A song for the women as well as the men." Looking over the long lists of publications designed exclusively for children, I am always moved to parody the grateful little outburst with "Thank God! books for the children, as well as the men and women."

But a careful reading of the reviews of some, will dampen the delight of the children's best friend among us "children of a larger growth." There is any amount of fairy stories. New ones and new versions of old ones, bearing such bewitching titles as "War in Dolldom," and "The Pea Green Nose," etc. And mentions of, with quotations from, the most musically jingling rhymes for the littlest of little ones.

Now, why in the name of common sense could not these books have been books containing truth and facts? Why not have a book entitled "The Rose Red Nose,"—an alliterative title, bearing a truth on its face, instead of "The Pea Green Nose," which never existed in actual life? Whereas, the other does, and perhaps under our very noses,—if not on our faces. This book then, not bearing an untruth on its cover, might contain a lesson inside. A lesson to be learned and attractively taught, of a vice to be shunned. For, surely a writer with the ability to make a story about a "Pea Green Nose," could dress out fact charmingly.

I am to the rescue of the children, the little human rose buds, from whom I would not take the shadow of a joy or pleasure. Their dear little soft heads may not be able to take in Latin or Greek in the beginning of what, we know, alas! will be a toilsome march. But I do maintain, that they might from the first be better fitted for it, by being taught wholesome truths. They can be sottened or given in as light a dilution of fanciful thought as one chooses. A thoughtful mother dilutes wholesome food for their stomachs. Why should not those who have their mental health in charge, dilute facts, truths, and even science for the children. "Truth is stranger than fiction," to us. Might it not be presented in as beautiful form to the little ones as fairy nonsense and rhymes?

It may be urged that in this age, children need no forcing or stimulus, that the mind of the average American youth is already too advanced. To such an objection, one need only answer—With what? And the reply to that in all honest, thoughtful minds is, with books that are going to form character, that is, at best, formed in a fragmentary way. Nonsense and flippancy predominate. There is nothing to set the young minds to that investigation and thought, that is quite as effective to keep them from turning to mischief or evil, as it is to put employment in their fingers. Their childhood's days would not hold less brightness, but their manhood's or their womanhood's might, if a toy were a philosophical one, instead of a "jumping jack," or contained a principle of chemistry instead of sawdust. Knowledge is always power. It is the Thor's hammer, that comes back to the hand of the hitter with increased momentum for another fling. Then why not train the tiny hands to use it, after making it light in accordance with their little strength. Teach the children to think. Give them something worthy to think about, and for mothers.—Time will be conquered, and their crown won!—Free Lance.

HOMES REDUCED BY DRESS.

Only those women who have not the money to "dress" can fully appreciate the weight which society ruthlessly heaps upon this disability. To be unable to "dress" is to be treated with almost disrespect in the car, the boat, at the public gathering, the street, and the shop; to be ignored; to feel the shrug of contempt, the sneer of levity, and the smile of scorn; to be thrust aside, to be laughed at, to be unceremoniously displaced, to be cruelly driven out of good society, to have your heart, your intelligence, your thoughts, your virtue, your character, held as nothing against silk; to be stung, to be outraged, to be proscribed, to be insulted; all this and much more for the lack of money to "dress."

It matters not whether this rule of society is right or wrong, the fact remains to blight and ruin. The fashionable lady thinks nothing of paying $75 for making a dress, made up of forty yards of silk, at from $4 to $10 per yard. These are the women who rule the street, drawing-rooms, theatres—dare we say churches? After such the lesser lights pattern. What defence have the girls who work for from $4 to $10 per week against this array?

The rich can be fashionable, the poor cannot be by honest means. The poor industrious shop girl looks upon even $50 dresses, and they are beyond her reach. There is a $40 gulf between her and them—between her and the respect and attention of society. Her virtue will span the chasm. She longs to lift the load of poverty, to receive the caress of society, to be freed from bondage. She sells herself to hell for dress. After the first step is taken, it is not long before all useful labor is eschewed, and the foul vice made to be the only service of income. This is no picture, but what happens every day, and is a plain statement of how the recruits to brothels are made. This mania for "dress" is devastating our American women to an alarming extent. The wives and daughters of the rich men who lead society in this fearful race of extravagance are responsible for a great share of the prostitution which curses the nation, as well as for thousands of business failures, scattered families, and the long train of miseries among us under the cover of "keeping up appearances." Let those who have the courage take this lesson and act upon it.—Exchange.

A Woman's Counsel to Women.

"Shirley Dare" gives some useful hints to women in these paragraphs:

Does a woman deserve respect who calls the work of her sex drudgery? There are women who always speak of it by that name, but they are usually inferior and underbred—women who write about "musses" and "messes" for print, prigs or guys of the feminine gender, tiresome in society, egotistic at home. These are the class who complain of cramped faculties and heavy burdens, whose time and ability are too precious to waste in seeing that the soup is piquant, or the shirts well aired. They bring out "last articles" in manuscript to amuse particular friends, and converse in a topical way, unconscious what a stuffy odor pervades their rooms, or how shockingly matched all the colors of their furniture may be.

I do not speak of the women who neglect their houses either for study or society, but of those half-sensible women who perform commonplace duties in a grudging, disdainful way, all the time feeling that they waste, to use their formula, "abilities which might be so much better employed." They dust rooms, and mend clothes, and bake cake, and call this housewifery, and say the noblest calling of women means no such frivolous pretense, but work genuine and comprehending washing of dishes and kettles, scouring of tinware, and blacking stoves, paring of potatoes and putting on of coal; in short, the whole horrid round indispensable to bright houses and good fare. Many women may not be called on to do these things, but every woman, princess or peasant, ought to know how they should be done, and have dexterity and practice enough to do them. This is woman's province, which all gentlewomen should learn, just as men of rank learn the science of war, till they know how much sand goes to a charge of gunpowder, and how much labor goes to squaring earthworks. Many people are saying this over in different ways—George Eliot and George Sand indirectly, in their heroes and heroines, who are never, by any possibility, afraid of the meanest labor; Mrs. Craik, Fredericka Bremer, and Mrs. Stowe more explicitly.

Noble Words.

Dr. Chalmers beatifully said, "The little that I have seen in the world and known of the history of mankind teaches me to look upon their errors in sorrow, not in anger. When I take the history of one poor heart that has sinned and suffered, and represent to myself the struggles and temptations it passed through—the brief pulsations of joy; the tears of regret; the feebleness of purpose; the scorn of the world that has little charity; the desolation of the soul's sanctuary, and threatening voices within; health gone; happiness gone—I would fain leave the erring soul of my fellow-man with Him from whose hands it came."

It is only a poor sort of happiness that could ever come by caring very much about our own narrow pleasures. We can only have the highest happiness, such as goes along with being a great man, by having wide thoughts and much feeling for the rest of the world as well as ourselves; and this sort of happiness often brings so much pain with it that we can only tell it from pain by its being what we would choose before everything else, because our souls see it is good.

Cannot we trust God, who has given us ninety-and-nine pleasures, that if He withhold the hundredth it is from no forgetfulness, no niggardliness? Cannot we feel assured that He ever makes us "as blest as we can bear," as happy as will consist with our highest welfare now and forever?

Some have an early religious education. They accept Christianity in certain stereotyped forms. They could hardly change their faith if they would, and would not if they could. Others are left entirely to the many conflicting winds of doctrine to be shaded by this, and that, or all, else to grow up unconsciously and fearfully indifferent to the whole matter. The preacher of partial and distorted views of the gospel of Christ has driven many into skepticism and infidelity.

The spirit of true religion breathes gentleness and affability; it is social, kind, and cheerful; far removed from that gloomy, illiberal superstition and bigotry which cloud the brow, sour the temper, deject the spirit, and impress moroseness on the manners.

Have courage enough to review your own conduct; to condemn it where you detect faults; to amend it to the best of your ability; to make good resolves for your future guidance, and to keep them.

Ill Reports.—Resist the temptation of circulating ill reports. If you cannot speak well of another, at least do not speak ill of him. Never speak ill of another behind his back. Why should you consider his character of less value than your own? Speak of others as you would were they present; speak as a friend of him who is absent, and cannot speak for himself.

With all the characteristic energy of the people of this country, it is a remarkable and lamentable fact that the children of those who have raised themselves to social position and influence by their personal efforts, almost invariably waste what their parents accumulated. With superior advantages and a bright prospect before them to occupy a higher place than their prudent, persevering fathers, they fall by vice and dissipation into neglect and absolute nothingness. Neglected opportunities is the sin of those who imagine themselves something, when, at the end of a useless life, they discover themselves to be nobodies. It is natural for parents to hope, pray and labor for their children, with an ambition to leave them useful and prominent among men. But necessity alone develops power, and honest devotion in the steady pursuit of a reputation above reproach, secures what those who waste their opportunities never obtain—a good name.

Proposed Visit.

We wish to say to our brethren and friends in Armstrong county, that we intend to leave Dale City on the 7th of March, to spend about a month with them. This notice is given so that the necessary arrangements may be made to use our weak services to the best advantage. We have long been impressed with an ardent desire to make one more effort to encourage our brethren and sisters in the Lord, and to reclaim our associates, friends, and neighbors from error's way.

We would prefer to labor principally in the Cowenshannoe congregation, at the meeting-house and at some point in the other end of the territory; but we will be subject to whatever arrangements may be made.

If the brethren can procure a fellow-laborer, we will feel grateful. Upon this however we will not insist, as there is ample force in that county, if it can only be concentrated. But we recommend that the brethren and sisters devote themselves to united, fervent, and unceasing prayer, that the Lord may work mightily among them through our weak instrumentality. Let them consecrate themselves wholly to his service; and so arrange their affairs that they may meet with us punctually and regularly, to encourage and assist by their presence and their prayers.

Lippincot's Magazine.

An illustrated monthly of popular literature and science. The March number. J. B. Lippincott & Co., Publishers, 715 and 717 Market St., Philadelphia:

The current issue of Lippincot's Magazine is highly attractive, both in respect to its articles and its illustrations. "The Roumi Kabylai," which forms the initial contribution, describes a tour through modern Algeria, and is replete with interesting delineations of a country which, although abounding in natural beauties and historical associations, is seldom visited by travellers, and but little known to the general reader. The engravings which accompany this article are beautifully executed. "The National Trans-Allegbany Water-Way," by Professor Thompson B. Maury, describes the method by which it is proposed to connect the waters of the Mississippi with those of the Atlantic Ocean, and thus establish direct communication between Omaha and the ports of Europe. The almost incalculable advantages which would result from the realization of this scheme render the present paper not only interesting but profoundly important. Several views and explanatory diagrams accompany the text. "New Washington," by Chauncey Hickox, is a sketch of the æsthetic, social, and political condition of the National Capital. It contains many shrewd remarks and pertinent suggestions, and deserves a careful reading from all who feel a proper interest in the good order, beauty, and dignity of the representative city of the land. In the article entitled "Cuba," the main points of the difficulties which have arrayed the inhabitants of that country against the Spanish government are presented in a clear and succinct manner. "Unsettled Points of Etiquette" dwells upon the unfortunate diversity of opinion which prevails in elevated circles of American society regarding the propriety or impropriety of certain polite observances. The remedies suggested are both simple and reasonable. The poems in the present number of Lippincot's Magazine are "The Hermit's Vigil," by Margaret J. Preston, and "Winter," by Lucy H. Hooper. Both are above the ordinary average. "In the cradle of the deep," by Charles Warren Stoddard, is a well-written sketch of an experience of maritime life gained during a long and tempestuous voyage.

We notice that the publishers of Lippincot's Magazine offer as a club premium one of the most magnificient chromo-lithographs ever executed in this country, and upon the productions of which eight thousand dollars have been expended.

How to be Saved.

"Look unto me and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth; for I am God, and there is none else." Isaiah 45: 22.

What glorious news to poor sinners lost in sin, under condemnation, on the very brink of ruin, struggling for life everlasting. God says, "Look unto me." Does sin oppress you? Have all your prayers failed? Have you resolved to live a better life and failed? "Look unto me," says God. Are you afraid you cannot hold out, but will fall back as others have done? "Look unto me," says the Lord. Are you young and subject to the temptations of youth? "Look unto me." Are you old and hardened in sin, and fearing your day of grace passed? "Look unto me; for I am God." Have you tried some of the means of salvation that men offer, and failed to receive peace? "Look unto me and be saved." "Be saved;" not that you may hope to be saved, but saved. "I give unto them eternal life, and they shall never perish," says Jesus. Take God at his word, and be still. If God is for you, who can be against you?

Now, anxious one, if your eye sees this, look to God with your heart open to him, and you will have peace. Do not say, "Oh! if I could only look aright, I would have peace." No, look to Christ, as your righteousness. Come, look to God as your advocate, and all will be peace and joy. Many are kept back by trying and not looking. Jesus becomes your Savior as soon as you give him something to save for you. You may believe he died to save sinners; that he is able and willing to save, and yet he is not your Savior, until he is actually saving you. The banker, however safe his bank, or honest the man, or how willing to receive deposits, is not your banker until you make a deposit with him, he is a banker for you, but not your banker. So with Jesus. He is a Savior for you, and becomes yours when you deposit your soul, your hope of heaven, with him. Then your life will be hid with Christ in God; your treasures will be in heaven, where rust doth not corrupt nor thieves break through and steal.

All Things Earthly Have an End.

But who believes these things? who realizes them? and so the whole careless multitude of mankind will run the rounds of mirth and sin, squander the hours of grace and the opportunities of salvation, till their mirth shall be turned to wailing, and their glory, to despair, when the last day shall burst in all its majesty upon a sinful world. The scoffers, walking after their own lusts, say, "Where is the promise of his coming?" but whether men admit or deny it, they will know it and see it all at last. They will understand it when it is too late. The present things will be the last things ere long; there will be for every sinner a last Sabbath, a last solemn assembly, a last sermon, a last entreaty, a last invitation, a last warning, a last appeal. There will be a last hesitation, a last struggle, a last decision, a last refusal to heed the gracious call. There will be a last rejection of the offers of mercy, a last neglect of the great salvation, a last despising of the riches of God's long suffering, a last resisting of the Holy Ghost, a last trampling underfoot of the Son of God, a last hiding of the deep drawn sigh, a last smile to veil the anguish of a burdened heart, a last light answer to the solemn question of eternity, a last saying, "Go thy way for this time, when I have convenient reason I will call for thee." There will be a last opening of the book of God, a last rebellious rejection of the rule of Christ, a last refusal to confess him as Lord of all, a last day of mercy to a godless world: the last tear will be shed by those who go forth weeping, bearing precious seed; and the last sheaf will be gathered for the garner of the Lord. Some faithful minister, some praying church, some godly father, some pious mother, some believing brother, some pleading sister, will have gathered the last soul in by some last appeal, some strong exhortation, some tender invitation, some tearful entreaty. It will be well for those for whom the last crown of glory is prepared. What a prize! millions of brows, and only one more crown, only one vacant place in the shining ranks of the redeemed, only one royal seat at Christ's right hand, only one more diadem of glory which shall shine through all the coming ages of the incomprehensible existence of our God! The last soul in the ark, and the flood will come; the last wise virgin will be gathered to the marriage feast, and then the door will be shut; the last sinner saved, and he "that is unjust shall be unjust still." Men will not know the last opportunity. When it comes they will not believe it is the last, until it is gone; they will spend that day as carelessly as they have the days before it; they will dream and idle, they will forget their Maker, they will banish from them the thoughts of God, and death, and judgment and eternity; they will set their hearts against the voice of mercy and the call of grace; they will walk boldly towards perdition across the crimsoned soil of calvary; they will tread beneath their feet the broken body of the Son of God; they will count the blood of the eternal covenant an unholy thing; they will do despite to the Spirit of grace; they will stop their ears to the divine entreaty, "Turn ye, turn ye, for why will ye die?" and they will dream of hope, and pardon, and salvation, until they wake in terrible surprise, to find that all is over, and that they are lost at last. Then those who had been warned shall wail because of him; the saints shall rejoice that their redemption has come; the thronging multitudes of men shal divide to the right hand and the left, before his throne. On which side then shall we be found? How shall it be with us then? Let us rather ask, how is it with us now? As we stand in time we must stand in the judgment day. If we are saved here, we shall be saved eternally.

Church News, from Ephrata Congregation, Lanc. Co., Pa.

Brethren Editors, I will try to give you a few lines of church news, and thereby tell you how we are getting along in this part of God's moral vineyard. We have our ups and downs, our joys and our sorrows, but we still try to take new courage and press forward in the work whereunto the Lord our God hath called us.

The members are in tolerably good health, as far as I know, except a few old ones, and one of our ministering brethren—Wm. Brice—who was very seriously injured, about three weeks ago, by being thrown from his sleigh upon a large stone, while on his way to meeting. His horse became uncontrolable and run off, hence the cause. Although his skull was somewhat fractured, otherwise used up, he is doing better than was at first expected; and we hope he may soon be able to be at his post again. We have a sort of Social Meeting once every week, at one or the other place in our branch of the church, in which we sing and pray, read a chapter of the Sacred Word, and then try to edify and build each other up in our faith; and we feel as though all present are more or less encouraged thereby on their way Zionward.

On the 29th of January, we had two young maidens, aged about 16 and 18 years, added to our number by baptism. Although the temperature was near Zero, the rite was well accomplished, it being performed in spring-water. We hope these two young pilgrims may go on their way rejoicing, and be true to their Master, and grow in faith to the Lord, and thereby become examples to others. We also had several very good meetings not far from us, which we attended, and feel assured that the power of the Lord was there, and the "sword of the spirit" was wielded with such power and demonstration of the truth, that it made many almost quake and tremble, and we hope the good fruit may come forth in due season.

LEVI ANDES.

Lincoln, Pa.

DECKER'S POINT,
Feb. 13th, 1873.

Dear Editors: I read a good deal of church news which is interesting to me and I hope to others also; and as I know of none you ever received from this small branch of the church, by request, I will present to the brotherhood in general, a few thoughts.

Now, through the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, we do not frustrate the grace of God, but this one thing we endeavor to do; forgetting the things that are past we are pressing forward toward the mark of the prize of the calling of God. We are few in number, but we trust not without the help of God; for we are still gaining ground, as the common saying is. About six gladly received the Word of the Lord, baptized, and added on the Lord's side, and one restored again, within two years. One of them came about fifty-five miles to have baptism administered according to the word of the Lord. The number of brethren and sisters here is thirty-four—sixteen brethren, and the balance are sisters. We have three speakers and four deacons. We have preaching every two weeks; and when preachers from other districts come to us, we have more. We had very good meetings on the 27, 28 and 29 of Jan., by brethren Jos. Berkey and Hiram Musselman.

I will now tell you, my much esteemed brethren and sisters, that we, here in these backwoods, are poor and deprived of a privilege that very few are deprived of in the Western District of Pennsylvania; namely, that of the meeting together in meeting-houses for the worship of God. We have to meet together in our dwelling houses, barns, and work-shops; and, as a general thing, they are not comfortable, especially for that purpose. This is known to the brethren that visit us. On some former occasions, we fared some better. We had the public school-houses to hold our meetings in: but are deprived of that privilege now. We undertook to build a meeting-house about the time the war broke out. Different arms of the church sent in their mite which was thankfully received by us. We gathered up quite a lot of materials, and thought we were getting along well; and I believe, could have built easier then than we can now, had our brethren escaped the draft, but this was not the case. We paid commutation as long as we could, and those that could paid for themselves. This stopped the meeting-house building for that time. However, I want it understood that we paid back what money had been sent to us, as far as we could.

Last Summer we tried it again, with a hope that the brethren would help us; and, up to this time, I think we have received about twenty-five dollars from adjoining churches, which was thankfully received. Now our means are about exhausted, and our house is not fit for meeting, yet. We have it raised, planked, and roofed, partly floored and weather-boarded. Doors and sash are made. The size of the house is 40x60 feet, with a basement 20x60 feet. We are short of means about four hundred and fifty dollars. Now brethren, and especially you that live in Western Pennsylvania, we call on you for help; and if you feel that we should have it, as much as we feel that we need it, you most assuredly will help us. But you, brethren and sisters, are to be the judges of this matter: it is our place to make the call, and yours to receive and heed or refuse. Those wishing to help us, can send their contributions to Henry Spicher, Hillsdale, Indiana Co,, Pa., as he is our treasurer, or to brother H. R. Holsinger, the editor of the C. F. C., or the money can be sent with the delegates to the district meeting from the churches that would prefer this plan. Our begging, we are aware, is not very pleasant to you, and much less to us, but it is necessity that moves us to make this call. We read that "it is more blessed to give than to receive;" so, in this case, you being the givers, will receive the greater blessing. In Matt. 25: 40, our blessed Savior says, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me."

Many of our preachers that have been with us here in the Montgomery branch know this statement to be correct. I will give you the names of some of them: Eld. Grabill Myers, brethren John W. Brumbaugh, George W. Brumbaugh, Solomon Bensboff, Joseph Berkey, Hiram Musselman, William Beyers, Samuel Brallier, Jos. W. Beer; and quite a number of other speakers, which we cannot here name, know our circumstances to be as I have stated: I will now close my article by saying to my brethren and sisters, give the request your prayerful consideration, and then do what you know to be right in a needful time; and the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all, now, henceforth, and forever more. Yours in hope of heaven.

PETER BEER.

Explanation.

MARTIN HOKE, Beloved brother, you want to know "Why the woman should have the sign that has no husband." Woman is dependent on man, whether married or unmarried. Before she is married she is to be in subjection with her father, or, if she has no father, to him on whom she is dependent.

But you might again say, that woman do not all marry. If so, I would reply that that is not God's fault; for the word says, "Let the younger woman marry." The angels are "ministering spirits, sent forth to minister for them who shall be heirs of salvation;" but can we for a moment believe that they would be permitted to minister unto those who are disobedient and exalt themselves in their pride? Therefore let the woman "have power on her head because of the angels."

Rebekah covered herself with a veil before she met Isaac, although he was not yet her husband, no doubt, as a sign that she considered it her duty to be in subjection to him if he should become her husband, in order to please God, so that he would send forth her ministering angels to minister unto her wants. "Because of the angels," are words of meaning.

Beloved brother, I cannot understand why you say, "You seem not to know what the covering was." Refer to my article and you will find these words, "It was a disgrace for a woman to be stripped of her veil." There is one thing that I am ignorant of, as already stated, namely, in what way God informed woman first to put on this veil. I know not how God informed Cain and Abel to offer sacrifices, but I do know that they did offer them. I know that the phrase, "because of the angels," is differently understood; but I hope you will bear with me for only giving the view I have adopted. If we would pursue the same course with our garments as you would have the brethren pursue with the covering, or veil, we would involve ourselves in many difficulties. I think that it would be your duty, brother, to show by Paul's writings, that the brethren have substituted the present covering in place of the one that Paul commanded to be used, and then the brethren will soon "come back to the old order." But until this is done we cannot "consistently make a change for the better." "Love the brotherhood." "By this we know that we have passed from death unto life, because we love the brethren." May the Lord perfect us in love. Peace be unto you and yours. NOAH LONGANECKER.

Faith 100 per Cent.—Works 25 per Cent.

In current volume number 4, of COMPANION, I notice the above heading; and the writing so forcibly expresses my sentiments, that I cannot forbear giving my approval to the same, may it be worth ever so little; if nothing more should be gained by my effort than to give some encouragement to brother P. H. Beaver, who is a vigorous writer; and I hope that he may be prepared at all times to unlimber his heavy ordnance, and pour his grape andcanister right into the strong fortifications of the enemy. The field is a large one, and the enemy is well fortified. They also have a shrewd leader; though they may not acknowledge him, or, in other words, they may not know who their leader is. Under a former dispensation, certain people worshipped a golden calf; in this our day, many worship, not an image of gold, but dollars and cents. The way some people hold to them is a caution. For the sake of a few paltry dollars, they will barter their souls salvation Esau selling his birth-right for a mess of pottage, is not to be compared with these modern self-styled servants. The monster is showing his brazen head in the church, to an alarming extent. "The love of money is the root of all evil;" and yet people, and, I am sorry to say, men who profess to be the followers of the meek and lowly Jesus, will strive, day and night, with mind and body to obtain it. They will worship at the shrine of wealth without ceasing, and tug and toil to such a degree that, when the day of rest comes, they are so worried that they cannot keep it holy; for they must of needs worry about the next week how or in what manner they can bring a few more of the coveted dollars into their coffers; or if they do go to church, ten to one if they do not go to sleep before the minister has fairly opened his subject. Now if this is not "whipping the devil around the stump" I do not know what is.

"How can they hear unless they have a preacher?" and how can they preach, if they have no place to preach in? I fear if the brethren would go to Altoona, when the mercury sinks ten degrees below zero, as at the present time, their hearers would be few, were they to stand on the streets and preach. Why all this? Just because the brethren in the Middle District of Pennsylvania are not able (willing) to give up of their abundance to purchase a commodious house at a very reasonable price. Surely, religion must be at a very low ebb.

Brethren there is something wrong in this. If some who are adding acres to their already large farms, or dwellings to their possessions, or dollar after dollar to their already overflowing coffers, would consider that they have all this on trust only, and that soon they will be brought to a strict account for their stewardship, perhaps there might something good result from the experiment. Try it brethren. Now do not each of you look to your brother to commence. It is you—"thou art the man." It is passing strange that, whenever there is an effort made in the good cause that requires the purse-string to be opened, there are always such very plausible objections: "So and so it was when the brethren first started in America; and so it ought to be still." I wonder if the brethren then were so extremely careful to keep their purse-strings closed. I wonder if they could sport beautiful match horses and vehicles to correspond. I wonder if they could furnish their children with such gaudy dresses. I wonder if they were in the habit of training their children from the cradle to worship dress? All this costs money. So much, at least, that we have very little to give for religious purposes.

I once saw an article headed, "When has Man Enough? Not until he has a little more." I have been taught by my own observations that the saying is only too true. When the brethren have to resort to the laying of taxes when they wish to build a meeting house, in order to raise the necessary funds, instead of a liberal donation given by all, it looks to me as though there was some other God who deserved the first notice; at least, it shows that some would not like to give up all for the Lord's sake. "It is more blessed to give than to receive," is certainly lost sight of by some of the brethren; and oh! what a terrible waking up will there be, when Christ comes to collect his jewels—when to those who lulled their conscience to ease with the thoughts, "I belong to the church of God; I attend to the ordinances of his house; all at once, the truth will be made known, in thunder tones, that they had been worshipping the mighty dollar instead of the Almighty God At the shrine of wealth you have paid your devotions! It is all over. You are lost, and why? Because you were covetous. "Be not deceived, God is not mocked; whatsoever a man soweth that shall he also reap."

J. L. WINELAND.

Answers to J. T. Meyers.

Editor of the Christian Family Companion, Allow me to offer a solution of the two queries by J. T. Meyers, of Somerset, Pa., in COMPANION Vol. 9, No 4, page 62.

QUERY 1st. The inquirer wishes to know the antecedent of the first pronoun he, appearing in verse 11th, chapter 11th of St. Matthew.

ANSWER. The two words, "he that," taken together, are equal to the word whosoever. The antecedent to "he that," or whosoever, is understood, and not expressed. It may be James, John, Samuel, or any one. The plural might have been used; as it is not very likely that only one person of billions would alone be in a certain one degree of existence in heaven. Then, the language would, no doubt, have been, "They that, (they who,) or, those that (those, who,)" are least in the kingdom of heaven are greater than he.

QUERY, 2nd. The inquirer wishes a reconcilation of the declaration, "This is Elias which was for to come," by Christ, in verse 14th, chapter 11th of St. Matthew, and the answer, "I am not," by John the Baptist, to the question "Art thou Elias?" by the Jews, in verse 21st, chapter 1st of St John.

ANSWER. The answer to this question is rather complicated, by covering a wider field, and therefore more lengthy than the first one; but it is equally certain and clear.

Let me here remark, that both the above questions are very important, and deserve the serious attention of all faithful believers in God; especially, the second one, for it is upon such, that skepticism bases its argument in attempting the destruction of the Divinity of the Bible. And if such questions are simply sneered at, and not fairly and reasonably answered by the Chirstian world, it makes their cause only the more dark and insignificant, and draws forth skepticism only the more conspicuously, and makes the invalidity of the Bible more likely. We have come to such a state of existence, when the civilized world is no more governed by myth and faith, but by truth, from the stand-point of reason.

Before I proceed to answer the second query, allow me to point out a very peculiar feature contained therein, as given by the querist. He seems to ask the question more for himself than to allow the Jews to ask for themselves; since he asks to this effect, "Are you the Elias, that was to come before Christ?" Mark! the Jews simply ask, "Art thou Elias?" and not as the querist asks. This difference is of the most vital importance; for, as given by the inquirer, it would produce the most fatal result; while, as given by the Jews, no difficulty at all is pendent.

In answering the second query we must notice:

1. That Elijah and Elias have the same signification, only that one is a latin, and the other a greek term.

2. That the Jews, and all who paid any attention to prophecies, were, for four hundred years laboring under a very grave error, as to the forerunner of Christ.

3. That the great mass of people had, at the words of the prophet Malachi; (chapter 4: verse 5th,) conceived the idea that Elijah, who had ascended in the chariot, would again bodily and personally return to the earth, and strike the first note of Messiah's immediate coming. This theory was so well established among them, that it required more than ordinary efforts to reform the mistake.

4. That the drift of the question, "Art thou Elias?" by the Jews, to John the Baptist, is, as to whether he was the Elijah who had long since left the earth; and the baptist knowing this, very appropriately answered, "No."

5. That Malachi in his prophecy (Chap. 4th, verse 5th,) had no reference to Elijah the ascended, as the Jews thought. Hence the answer by John the Baptist.

6. That Christ also knowing this old fashioned belief among the Jews, corrected and completely upset their old theory, by a well worded and a well fitted speech, made prior to the declaration of the real facts. Mark the strong, forcible, and well built language, used from the beginning of verse 7th, to the first comma of verse 14th, of chapter 11th of St. Matthew, altogether preparatory to the declaration, "This is Elias &c. The very, last sentence, "And if ye will receive it," is very forcible indeed, and well grounded. The anchor is well pitched, the point is well gained. "If ye will," the very climax of the forcible and astounding, preparatory speech, intended not to leave the least chance at rebuke. Then comes the declaration, "This is Elias which was for to come." This really must have been very absorbing to the hearer who was so long in this peculiar error. Whole pages could be filled and hours consumed in commenting on the forcible and beautiful speech of Christ, prior to the declaration, but I will, as speedily as possible, come to a close.

In summing up the evidence, we see:

1. That Malachi spoke of the Messiah's fore-runner, whom he names, Elijah; but not meaning that old Elijah should return.

2. That, from this prophecy the Jews expect the prophet Elijah, to return to the earth, as Christ's fore-runner.

3. That the Jews asked the Baptist, John, theoretically, whether he was Elijah (Elias) of old.

4. That Christ corrected the Jewish error, and declares that John the Baptist, was "Elias which was for to come," and not Elijah who had ascended in the chariot.

Finally, we see the reconciliation existing in, John the Baptist not denying what Christ declared him to be; but simply stating that he was not the Elijah whom the Jews expected.

CORNELL, ILLS., Jan. 20th, 1873,

DEAR COMPANION:—While I was passing the time this cold and stormy day, the thought came to my mind, while looking over your columns, "What a blessed thing it is that we have a paper in the brotherhood. We can hear from the brethren from all parts of the United States." And as I am writing to the COMPANION, I would say, by way of advice to those who are fond of reading, to send brother Holsinger $1 50, and he will send you the COMPANION one year, instead of paying out money for some political paper, or a paper made up of loose stones or foolishness, which can benefit you nothing. I do not take the COMPANION myself, but my father takes it, and has taken it ever since the first issue; and I read it ever since and found it growing better every year. In February, 1872, I united with the disciple church, being baptized by backward immersion. During this time I have read a great deal in the Testament, and doubted the path I was pursuing; and,

I think, if I propose a portion of scripture, to some of the COMPANION readers can help me out of the dark. The scripture that I would like to have explained is recorded in Rom. 6: 3, 4, and reads as follows, "Know ye not that so many of us as were baptized into Jesus Christ were baptized into his death? Therefore we are buried with him by baptism into death; like as Christ was raised up from the dead by the glory of the father, even so we also should walk in meanders of life."

Aged 38 years 6 months and 14 days. He left a dear companion, a sister, and five children to mourn his premature death; to whom we say, love the Lord and put your trust in him, for he has declared himself "a father to the fatherless, and a husband to the widow." Funeral services by the undersigned, from 2 Cor. 5: 1. J. P. HETRICK.

JOHN A. CLEMENT.

In the Middle Creek congregation Somerset county, Pa., Feb. 2nd. sister CATHARINE SNYDER. wife of Elder Adam Snyder, aged 67 years 4 months and 2 days. Thus passed an other bright and shining ornament from our midst, to breathe the fragrant atmosphere of the heavenly climes. Earth seems lonely as friends and cherished ones leave for the better land; but precious and sweet are their memories, and comforting the hope of meeting at last on Eden's fair and beautiful shore.

To the afflicted father and children, we offer our deepest sympathy. Their loss is no common one; yet we congratulate them that it is theirs to cherish the memory of so worthy a mother, whose example in the divine life is so worthy of our imitation. Blessed is the memory of good and pious mothers. Funeral services by brother Tobias Myers and the writer, from the words, "We know that if our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God, a house not made with hands eternal in the heavens"

The Christian Family Companion. Is published every Tuesday, at $1.50 a year, by Henry R. Holsinger, who is a member of the Church of the Brethren, sometimes known by the name of "German Baptists," and vulgarly or maliciously called "Dunkards."

The design of the work is to advocate truth, expose error, and encourage the true Christian on his way to Zion.

It assumes that the New Testament is the Will of God, and that no one can have the promise of salvation without observing all its requirements, that among these are Faith, Repentance, Prayer, Baptism by trine immersion, Feet Washing, the Lord's Supper, the Holy Communion, Charity, Nonconformity to the world, and a full resignation to the whole will of God, as he has revealed it through his Son Jesus Christ.

So much of the affairs of this world as may be thought necessary to the proper observance of the signs of the times, or such as may tend to the moral, mental, or physical benefit of the Christian will be published, thus removing all occasion for coming into contact with the so-called Literary or Political journals.

Subscriptions may begin at any time.

"Who Hath Believed Our Report?"

It is natural to suppose, that every person ought to believe the report of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, as it is proclaimed to all, and is so faithful and so well worthy of all acceptation that we would think it should be received and believed by all. But it appears to be otherwise; for few believed the prophets who spoke of Christ before his coming; and when he came himself, few of the rulers or Pharisees followed him, and the unbelief of the Jews in our Savior's time is expressly said to be the fulfilling of his word. How many, to this day, do disbelieve the report of the prophets of old concerning Jesus, our Savior, "For unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given; and the government shall be upon his shoulders; and his name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, the Mighty God, the Everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace," and of the apostle, as recorded after the birth of our great and glorious Redeemer, who went about doing good, and preaching and teaching the doctrine as set forth in the book of divine inspiration, that all who would come may come and drink of the water of life freely, and go in and out and find pasture. Yea, think for a moment, the grief and sorrowing of our Savior, who, when he was a little above thirty years of age, was supposed, by the Jews, to be not far from fifty.

His condition, on many accounts, was a sorrowful one. He was unsettled in life. He had "not where to lay his head," and was opposed by his own; for "he came to his own, and his own received him not." He was "a man of sorrow acquainted with grief;" not only in his last scene, but throughout his whole life he underwent the sentence sin had subjected us to, that we should eat bread in sorrow all the days of our life. And now look for a moment at Christ in the hands of his enemies, where he was scourged, a scarlet robe put upon him, a crown of thorns on his head, a reed in his right hand; "and they bowed the knee before him and mocked him, saying, Hail, King of the Jews!" and they spat upon him, and smote him, and mocked him, and then led him away and crucified him. Behold! the veil of the Temple was rent from the top to the bottom; the earth did quake; the rocks were rent; "and the graves were opened, and many bodies of the saints which slept arose."

Kind reader, think for a moment of Jesus, who made the lame to walk, the blind to see; who raised the widow's son; who said, "Lazarus, come forth," and he came; who saved Peter when he cried, "Lord, I perish, Oh save;" now nailed to the shameful tree. O thou sinner! thy heart is harder than a rock, if it will not yield or melt at the suffering and death of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, who came into this world to save all who would follow him. Now is the day of salvation; harden not your hearts. Turn to the Lord, and call upon him while he is near. To-day is yours, to-morrow is the Lord's. Oh, "how beautiful are the feet of those who preach the gospel of peace, and bring glad tidings of good things!" But if you have not believed the report of Jesus as once delivered to the saints, you shall be cast into outer darkness, where there is weeping and wailing and gnashing of teeth; where the moanings and groanings of the lost shall ascend from the bottomless pit forever and forever. But if you have believed the report of Jesus, then you shall hear the welcome voice, "Well done thou good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joys of the Lord." This is our hope. Blessed be God, that the righteous have hope in death, through Jesus our Lord.

Robbing Churches.

The above may seem a little coarse for the heading of a religious article ; but we can think of no other that is so short and explicit.

A very plain answer is given in number 3, by brother S. M. Minnich on this subject, to which we believe the scriptures will give sanction. But this subject comes up at a very eventful time, and for that reason we feel more than common interest in it.

When Paul said that he had "robbed other churches taking wages of them" to do the church at Corinth service, he was writing to them his second letter. In his first he had met the errors they had fallen into, by one of the best productions that ever came from any man's hand ; but it remained for a second letter to answer the charges brought, by his enemies, against his own person and character. In meeting these charges, he tells them that he had preached the Gospel to them freely ; that the brethren of Macedonia had supplied all his wants when he lacked ; and that, in this condition, he intended to keep himself. This all seems very plain ; but we have another view or two to give upon the subject of robbing the church, or churches.

When it was necessary for Paul to write to the brethren at Corinth, to correct their errors and reprove them for their blunders, it consumed time, dear reader, that might have been given to other churches that demanded his care and attention. You remember that he said something about his trials, his perils, and his sufferings, "besides * * * the care of all the churches." Had they all obeyed his word, his cares had been fewer and much lighter ; but they ran into sin, and he labored night and day for himself and for them. Had the church never suffered any hindrance from its members, there would be few people in the world to preach a Gospel to. Thus you see, dear reader, this church, by the course they had taken, cost the apostle more labor, more care, and more time, all of which might have been given to other churches or to other people. But, perhaps, it was well for us ; for we could not have the examples of wrong-doers and their reproof as a warning to us, if every one had done right in the church in early Gospel times.

Another view. Our brother, with many others, thinks that the ministers of the Gospel should be paid something for their preaching, and that they have a right to expect it. We only give our view. So far as expecting pay for preaching is concerned, we know that that part is fulfilled by some, at least, whether they have a right to it or not. We have a question to ask : Do you look upon preaching the Gospel as a business by which we can obtain a living for ourselves and our families, or do you hold it as a sacred duty, that we owe to God and our race, as much as in you lies, to preach the Gospel to every creature? If the first is your view, and you can secure an engagement of that kind, and for that business; you may have a right to expect pay ; but if the second is your candid conviction, what reason have you to expect pay for doing your duty ? If it is your duty to the church, to the world, and to God, you ought to do it freely ; and, brethren, you know how we value the word "OUGHT." If at home, we go to meeting anyhow ; and we need not refuse to speak because we are not paid in money for it. If we do refuse, how can we explain the words of Jesus, "Whosoever shall forsake houses, lands, wife and children, for his name's sake," &c. ? Besides, not one in fifty of our brethren, and, perhaps, of all the preachers on this round earth, need any other support than their two hands. We think expenses should be borne, and if all the time is spent in preaching, more should be given. But it is not a business, brethren, and but few really have need of more than kind faces and warm hearts, with the prayers of God's people.

LANDON WEST.

About the river of human life there is a wintry wind, though a heavenly sunshine ; the iris colors its agitation ; the frost fixes its repose ! Let us beware that our rest become not the rest of stones, which, so long as they are torrent-tossed and thunder-stricken, maintain their majesty, but when the stream is silent, and the storm passed, suffer the grass to cover them and the lichen to feed on them, and are ploughed down into dust.—Ruskin.

He who teaches men the principles and precepts of spiritual wisdom, before their minds are called off from foreign objects, and turned inward upon themselves, might as well write his instructions, as the sybil wrote her prophecies, on the loose leaves of trees, and commit them to the mercy of the inconstant winds. —Leighton.

The Door of the Church.

"I am the door: by me if any man enter in he shall be saved, and shall go in and out, and find pasture." John 10: 9.

In the above passage of scripture, Jesus compares himself to a door; his church, to a sheep fold; his followers, to sheep, and his word, to pasture. Christ entered in through obedience to the will of his Father, and baptized by John, in Jordan, was recognized as the Son of God, and became the door leading into the church. This teaches us that there is but one door into the church, and that door is Christ; that by entering in through the door, we enter in through Christ, and "put on Christ." See Gal. 3: 27, and Rom. 6: 3. It, also, teaches us that if we do not enter in by him unto the sheep fold, we shall not be saved.

By entering in through Christ, we all become sheep; all become one in Christ Jesus—pure, harmless, teachable—acknowledging but one Shepherd. "The Lord is my Shepherd; I shall not want. He maketh me to to lie down in green pastures: he leadeth me beside the still waters. He restoreth my soul: he leadeth me in the paths of righteousness for his namesake." Ps. 23.

Jesus declares himself to be the "Good Shepherd," and that all that ever came before him are thieves and robbers." Mention is made of these false shepherds in the 34th chapter of Ezekiel, in these words: "Woe be to the shepherds of Israel that do feed themselves! should not the shepherds feed the flocks? Ye eat the fat, and ye clothe you with the wool, ye kill them that are fed: but ye feed not the flock." These characters the Savior openly reproved, as thieves and robbers; for they had stolen the key of knowledge, and robbed God of the fruits of his flock, by prejudicing the minds of the people of Israel against the doctrine of Jesus, and by imposing tithes and burdens grievous to be borne. It is but just to remark that false shepherds are still in the world, who prejudice the people against the truth, and who care more for the fleece than for the flock.

But the question may arise, how can Jesus be the door into the sheep fold, and the good shepherd of the sheep at the same time? This is a proof of his divinity: He is everywhere present. I thank God for the assurance that there is but one fold and one shepherd, and that no one is able to pluck them out of his Father's hand. We as the sheep of his pasture, belong to God. We are all sheep, whether bishops, ministers, deacons or lazy-members. The scripture directs us to a higher leadership than man. Titles of honor, such as Pope, Archbishop, Heads of churches, Reverend, Right Reverend, &c., with those who wear them, must belong outside of the fold and flock of Christ.

"And shall go in and out." Does this clause give the sheep the privilege to jump the fence occasionally and eat a little pasture outside? is a question with some. In Acts 1: 21, we have a scriptural illustration of the meaning of the phrase, "In and out." Wherefore of these men which have companied with us, all the time that the Lord Jesus went in and out among us, beginning from the baptism of John, unto that same day that he was taken up from us, must one be ordained to be a witness with us of his resurrection." Will any one dare to say that the Lord Jesus went outside of his duty, church, or kingdom from his baptism by John to his ascension into heaven? Into, denotes an entrance, whereas, in, denotes a condition within: but the phrase "in and out" has a grander meaning.—It implies, according to Webster, the different departments of duties in any organization, civil, moral, or religious. It means that we must go into one duty and out of it, and into another and out of that, and so on, in order to the development of all our spiritual powers. Action is development; such is the school of Christ.

The good shepherd maketh his flock "to lie down in the green grass: he leadeth them beside the still waters." They "find pasture:" the bread of life which came from heaven—the word of God. "Man liveth not by bread alone, but by every word which proceedeth out of the mouth of God." Let us, then, obey all the commandments of God; for it is only by obeying all, that we can live by every word. This is real Christian life and experience: we feed on every word of God by passing through every department of christian duty, and thus prepare ourselves for eternal glory.

Bible Quotations not in the Bible.

There are many familiar phrases in constant use which the majority of people suppose have their origin in the Bible, and use them in that connection. The New York Observer corrects this error in the following manner. But, as the phrases are very fine, we still love to use them. To prevent misquotations from the Scriptures it gives them thus:

"God tempers the wind to the shorn lamb." From Sterne's "Sentimental Journey to Italy." Compare Isaiah xxvi: 6.

"In the midst of life we are in death." From the "Burial Service," and this originally from a hymn of Luther.

"Bread and wine which the Lord hath commanded to be received." From the English Catechism.

"Not to be wise above what is written." Not in Scripture.

"The merciful man is merciful to his beast." The Scriptural form is "A righteous man regardeth the life of his beast."—Prov. xii: 10.

"A nation shall be born in a day." In Isaiah it reads: "Shall a nation be born at once?"

"As iron sharpeneth iron, so doth a man the countenance of a friend." —Prov. xxvii: 17.

"That he who runs may read." "That he may run that readeth."—Hab. ii: 2.

"Owe no man anything but love." "Owe no man anything, but to love one another."—Job. xii: 8

"Prone to sin as the sparks to fly upward." "Born to trouble as the sparks fly upward."—Rom. 5: 7.

"Exalted to heaven in point of privilege." Not in the Bible.

Eve was not Adam's helpmate, but merely a help meet for him; nor was Absalom's long hair the instrument of his destruction; his head, and not hair upon it, having been caught in the boughs of the tree. (II Samuel xviii: 9.) A London wig maker once had a sign upon which was painted Absalom suspended from the branches of the oak by his hair, and underneath the following couplet:

"If Absalom hadn't worn his own.
He'd ne'er been found a hanging there."

He that will not hear before hand, must take what comes afterward.

We would better not profess Christianity at all, than to fall back into pride afterward.

We cannot expect a blessing from heaven, if we are ashamed to ask for it.

Love and Fear.

"God hath not given us the spirit of fear, but of power, and of love, and of a sound mind." 2 Tim. 1: 7."

Effects prove their cause. A slavish fear arises from a consciousness of guilt; but whensin is removed, the fear of punishment is taken away. Nothing tried more to hinder our usefulness than a base fear. It was this that caused the wicked servant to bury his talent when he ought to put put it into the hands of the exchangers. Truly, all men are to be loved, but no man is to be feared. (Luke 12 : 4,5.)

Beloved, zealous follower of the Lord,through our repentance, conversion, and acceession to the church of Christ, our heavenly Father hath taken from us the spirit of fear; but observe attentively what he hath given us in lieu of it: the Lord has given us the "spirit of power"—of courage and resolution to meet all trials and difficulties with becoming fortitude. View the contest. The Son of God had battled with the power of darkness; he met the enemy with the power of God—the word of God. Therefore, humble believer look to the Lord, and he shall strengthen our hearts by illumminating the mind and drawing our affections to himself.

Our heavenly Father has also promised us, through his Son, our blessed Redeemer, "the spirit of love" to God, which will not fail to raise us far above the fear of man and all that men can do unto us. Then let us be of good courage; and let this hope that is within us, inspire us to press on vigorously toward the reward set before us in the Gospel. Thus we are inspired, by the spirit of grace, to fight valiantly under the banner of Christ, feeling certain of being led on to victory.

Dear, fellow Christians, the Lord also promises us the "spirit of a sound mind;" Yea, a quiet, peacable, and gentle mind, so that we shall enjoy ourselves under all circumstances. But we have many things to discourage us in our way of duty, by the creatures of our disordred imaginations, which a sound, solemn thinking mind would remove. The spirit God gives to his people, is not a fearful, but a courageous spirit. If we are members of the body of Christ,how safe and secure is our salvation, if we trust and confide in the promises of God. Our strength lies in the Lord; and we only can realize it by faith in the Lord, or his word. The spirit of love to God supremely, and to man dearly, needs only to be exercised to inspire us with new life, and strengthen our feeble powers to be successful in our calling; while a sound mind will give us fortitude to face the most intrepid foe, though he come with a mealy tongue, or water on two shoulders, before your face your best friend, but when absent your worst enemy at heart—"the roaring lion." "Let us be as wise as serpents and as harmless as doves," or stand the most impetuous storms of life, which we all know are so incident to the Christian life. Let us remember David, the little shepherd boy, who went forth to meet the Philistine general, Goliah, trusting alone in the strength of the God of Israel. Then, dear brethren and sisters,let us all take great courage, considering what the apostle Paul said, when moved by the spirit of Christ. In the midst of his trials he besought the Lord that the thorn in his flesh might depart from him; therefore,we, with him, can and will give him glory and everlasting praise. that, in the midst of our trials, he appears unto us chief of all that is lovely, and hear his voice, "My grace is sufficieut for thee, for my strength is made perfect in weakness." Therefore, beloved, let us be strong in the Lord, that, when we are done with the troubles and sorrows of this life,we all may enter into life eternal.

The Model Family.

The model family is au orderly family. "Order is heaven's first law." To have order, there must be system; to have system, there must be rules and regulations. The laws of the family should not be too stringent nor too flexible. There should be a place for everything, and everything in its place—a time for everything, and everything in its time—a way for everything, and everything in its way. "Let all things be done decently and in order."

The model family is a polite family. They need not study Chesterfield; but they must learn the manners of common sense and good rebeding. The members should treat each other as gentlemen and ladies. "What?" should not be used for "sir?" or "ma'am?" and "yes" aud "no" should be followed with "sir" or "ma'am."

The model family is an agreeable family. In any family where there is individuality, spirit, and independence, there will be differences; but they should not be permitted to grow into disagreements. "For where envy and strife is, there is confusion, and every evil work."

The model family is an industrious family. Rich or poor, every one is bound to be busy in some good work. Manual labor or mental toil, or both, is a binding obligation. The diligent parents will bring up their chil to honest industry. "Why stand ye all the day idle?" "We command you, that if any man would not work neither should he eat."

The model family is a cleanly family. Tidiness, neatness, cleanliness, is amiable. The cleanness must respect the house, the furniture, the cookery, the person. "Be clean and change your garments." (Gen. xxxv. 2) "Let them wash their clothes." Ex xix 10. Ceremonial, but founded on the literal.

The model family is a cheerful family. At home, there ought to be more sunshine thau shadow. Books and papers are funds of enjoyment as well as information and profit, and, first of all, the good book and religious paper. "A merry heart doeth good like a medicine."

The model family is a pious family. A Christian home is next to the sanctuary, the place where God records his name, and where he delights to dwell. "It shall be well with them that fear God."

The model family, in a word, is a family where love is the ruling spirit —love to God, love to each other, love to man.—Christian Instructor.

Science and the Bible.

The thing to be lamented is, that the moment men of science get hold of a fact they instantly begin to set it in opposition to God's word. But the vaunted "fact" of Tuesday often takes another shape on Wednesday, and by Thursday is found to be no fact at all. The truth is that geology, as a science, consists mainly of probable guesses. "That field of peat," says Sir Charles Lyell, has probably been 7,000 years in course of formation." "No," replies a friend of his own, in a published criticism, "I think it quite possible that it has only been 700 years growing." A piece of pottery is found in the valley of the Nile, and a geologist immediately argues that it must have lain there more than 20,000 years. But an antiquary soon points out marks upon it which show it to be less than 2,000 years old. Yet it is upon guesses of this kind, which do not amount to a tenth part of a proof, that the Lyells and Owens and Colensos venture boldly to assert that it is clear that Moses knew nothing whatever of the subject on which he was writing. Just in the same spirit do Bunsen and his followers unhesitatingly assert that the growth of languages proves that the world must be more than 20,000 years old. We refer them to the confusion of tongues described by Moses, which at once dissipates their dream. "Oh! but that was a miracle," they reply, "and we have made up our minds never to believe in a miracle." Very well, gentlemen, there we must leave you; for men who make up their minds before inquiring are not acting like reasonable beings. A dozen other little juntoes are now at work in the same laudable fashion. One set is not quite certain that man was "developed" out of an ape. Well, and what was the ape "developed" out of? They do not know. Our comfort in all this is, that this influenza will wear itself out like the Tractarian, or like the infidel fashion of the days of Bolingbroke. Men have been striving to get rid of the Bible and its inconvenient morality for nearly these two thousand years; but they were never farther off from their end than they are at present.—Shaftesbury.

For the COMPANION.

Our Primary Existence.

Prior to the fall of man, obedience to the Divine law produced the same effect, that could have been produced in any age in which the sacred oracles have been accessible. The Supreme Being, through his infinite wisdom, created man in his own image, a little lower than the angels, though much inferior to him, intellectually. However he gave him a law, which, if obeyed, would make him no less intelligent than he was holy. Having, as our foreparents did, the vast universe before their eyes, and enjoying the sweet fellowship of God himself, there was nothing to hinder their happiness, nor molest their silent intercourse with each other, and with their Maker, so long as they remained in innocence. But, as there was a power that had germinated, and been brought into existence—a power that opposed all good—secondary only to that of the great I AM himself, it was necessary that they should be governed by a law that was calculated to keep them pure, and assimilated unto Him, in whose society it was impossible for them to discover the least taunt of sin. It was not until after the human family had violated the law of their Maker that they lost his favor and became the slaves of sin. But we don't deem it expedient, in this essay, to point out the misery, so clearly set before our eyes in every day life, wich was inherited through the fall. We want to impress upon the mind of the intelligent reader, at this time, the beautiful thought that there is yet vitality enough in the world of humanity, to restore more than its original happiness, if placed again into the element from which it has fallen, there to regain through obedience, what was lost by disobedience—a right to the tree of life.

We are only on probation now. This world is not our real home. None but infidels deny that there is life beyond the tomb. But, like the idle school boy, who would sooner play truant every day of his life than acquaint himself with books of the most primary significance, we may live and die in ignorance, little thinking that it is in this life that we secure either happiness or misery. "What we know not now, we shall know hereafter;" and if a man fails to discover how near he likens himself unto the devil, in this life, he will know how little he is an angel after he has left this world.

As we pass through life, we must necessarily enjoy a higher degree of happiness, or reap a part of that misery which will torment us in hell; for what is begun and finished this side of the tomb, will exist, in like manner, beyond it. Assuming the angelic appellation, "Christian," will avail us nothing while there is enough sin in our hearts to render it impossible to enjoy the peace of an approving conscience. Unless we are wholly submissive to the will of our Maker and let the fervent prayer: "Create within me a clean heart," ascend up before the throne, there is no such thing as entering upon a higher life, without which there can be no increase of holiness. Daniel Webster did not hear the inspiring voice, which said, "Join a higher class," until after he had mastered the lower branches of science. It was by making an effort and pursuing, regardless of the taunts and jeers of his school fellows, that he succeeded. And if there is a higher life, on which we wish to enter; a holier sphere in which we wish to dwell; a purer atmosphere, filled with the sweetness of heaven's floral domain, of which we love to breathe, we must cultivate a taste for the bliss that fadeth not away. Look seriously at your present life, and judge what your future may be. We are daily going through a process of training that will result in eternal happiness or misery.

Character is formed by that influence which bears heaviest upon it. Hence the importance of holy living. That we can reject, all through life, that sacred influence, emanating from Infinite Purity himself, and accept an influence that will make us the slaves of sin, and then, after time knows us no more, take up that form of character that will assimilate us unto angels, is an error that must be attributed to ignorance. Death does not destroy the character that is formed in this life, allowing us to take up in heaven, a character that we were too obstinate to acquire on earth. The reader may take exceptions here; but, if you please, I have no reference here to that death which represents us as dying unto sin. However, we do not wish you to infer that we are going to extremes in this matter, as do those who hold to the theory of entire sanctification: but we do believe that their is an end to our perfection, though at present it may not more than begun.

The work that God assigns us now begins our perfection in this life. Nothing that he has created, is impure of itself. However, the functions of the brain and body, may be so improperly used as to make ship-wreck of the best profession. And this useless and soul-destroying work, to which the powers of the mind and body are so frequently applied, is never begun and completed at one and the same time. It takes years to mature or destroy the human organism.

Character is not formed in one day. There is no such thing as teaching a child to read before it knows the alphabet. No student would ever have finished his collegiate studies, had he discarded a single letter of the twenty-six. And to discard any of the holy mandates, omit the performance of any known duty, will make us slaves to the devil, having death, the wages of sin, as a compensation.

There is a design in all the duties of life. We fare all the better, financially, for the abundance of commerce with which our land is supplied. Honest tradesmen are doing a work which, perhaps, an able minister or apt teacher could not do. Yet, he who supplies the body with aliment, or clothes it with raiment, should not despise him who cultivates the intellect, or him who educates the heart. Neither should any one look down on the more menial duties of life, as useless and dishonorable, while those little helps dare not be termed nonessential. While we are only on trial we should remember that God only exacts of us that which we are able to perform. However, we must give him an account of the manner in which we employ our time. He has no reward for idlers.

Careless teachers and parents, indifferent guardians, and inactive ministers, should tremble before him whose pleasure is in the good that none save the diligent can accomplish for him. There is work for all. If the coming generation is to have any advantage over the present or past, the important change should begin now. If Christianity is to do the work, much will be gained by redoubling our zeal now. What can be best done to-day, cannot be accomplished so well to-morrow. The husbandman may find it easier to turn the sod in the Spring than in Autumn; but scarcely has the seed been sown, when grevious worms crawl forth, ready to destroy the tender stalk while in its infancy; a copious harvest is then dispaired of. And if those little ones that people our land to-day are to enjoy in this life, the advantages of a thorough religious, moral, intellectual and physical training, it is dangerous to defer the work for a single day.

Mourners' Bench Religion.

Our young friend, Carrie Roelky, asks for information in regard to the above subject. In order to answer her queries, we must first discuss the subject itself. What is mourners' bench religion? It is a system of worship, as it is claimed by its adherents, instituted by some one, to meet the approbation of God; that is, in conformity with God's will. Now, whether this is true, we must first learn to know, and then we can decide.

We all must admit that God wants his people to worship—to serve him. Then in order to know what is pleasing to God, his people are to study his will, and from that learn what is required by Him. Let me here make this ascertain that God's children will only admit that to be Christian religion which is in conformity with God's will. It is admitted by all, that we must be Christians here, in this world, in order to be acknowledged as such in eternity. So when people consider this well, they at once are forced to this conclusion. "If I am no Christian here, I am a sinner; if a sinner, an enemy to God; if an enemy to God and I die in this condition, I certainly will be lost forever." With this idea, which is a good one, before their eyes, they are made willing at once to embrace religion. The danger by which they are surrounded is not manifest to all, and whenever something looks like religion, they make use of the opportunity, and go to work blindly, although, in many cases seriously, and partake of what is offered to them as the religion which will take away sins: in short, make Christians by the shortest route; for in nine cases out of ten, it is not considered by the landmarks of Jesus in his word and Gospel.

With all known to the writer of these religions, which are preached to the world in our day and generation, it is certainly very necessary to examine our ground by the word of God carefully. We may easily be led astray. Mourners' bench religion, as a religion we have nothing to say against, for we know it exists; but when we are asked, is it the Christian religion? we emphatically say, No. God only has use of the means to save his children, which he himself has appointed in his word. If he had thought it necessary to make use of the mourners' bench, he in his wisdom would have mentioned it in his will. Look at the plan of salvation laid down by Jesus himself—faith, repentance, and a general compliance to God's word. This will constitute the Christian religion. Then look at what is called mourners' bench religion, and what do you see? Instead of faith that God will pardon the sins of the penitent by the means appointed in his own prescription, the penitent is told to believe that God will pardon his sins at the mourners' bench, an institution of poor, mortal, erring man. To this end he is told to pray. Who ever read of such a thing in God's word? Then, when the poor, ignorant, although, perhaps, sincere sinner is in a praying position, his brethren put all their forces together to create a good noise. Who ever read of all this in God's word? It will serve the purpose for which it was intended—to keep the poor, precious soul from Christ. Next, when the animal feeling is changed from sorrow to joy, he is promised to be through; which is all correct. As I have said from the begining, it is a religion, but not the religion of Jesus; therefore it is highly dangerous for Christians to go to such meetings.

But what is next? Talk to these mourners' bench religionists about the duties enjoined upon Christ's followers, and then you will see their religion in its true light, not as the Christian religion, but as some counterfeit substitute, which is brought into existence to deprive poor, sin-sick souls from enjoying that which will benefit in this world and more yet in the world to come. When you talk to the defenders of mourners' bench religion, about the commandments, which are binding upon the child of God, what do they say? "These Dunkards have all their religion in forms." Yes, brethren, they claim they have the kernel. On one occasion I was told, that we had the form and shell, but they claimed to have the kernel. Well, let them have the kernel of their religion, we have the form of Christ's religion. It is true, we, as a church, can only have the form of christianity; the church itself is nothing more than the form in which the kernel must exist, if it at all exists; and I here ask the question, if the church is not the form, how can there be a kernel? They admit that we have the form; then, as they by their own admission say that they have not the form, I ask, how can they have the kernel? So, after discussing the matter, we answer our young friend, that there is such a thing as getting religion at the mourners' bench, but in nine cases out of ten, it is only a mourners' bench, not the Christian religion, and we would advise her to read her Bible carefully. She will never find mourners' bench religion contained therein; but she will find a religion which, if she will follow it, will make a Christian of her. No doubt, these mourners' bench religionists will call her a formalist, and, per consequence Dunkard; but if we gain Jesus, no matter what the world will call us; and I would admonish all my brethren and sisters carefully, to stand firm, preach the saving doctrine, without hesitation.

Satan, with his angels, is doing his uttermost to rob the children of men of the glory which awaits the true Christian. Will we with folded hands stand by and let him gain the victory? Will we allow him to persuade people to follow his counterfeit religion, instead of turning for counsel and advice to Jesus and his Gospel? or will we, by the grace of God, offer an opportunity for all to embrace the religion of a holy christianity, instead of a spurious article? Let Satan tempt us, his angels fight us, and his followers scorn and mock, but let us then remember, with Jesus at our helm we shall win. Let us stand fast; let us come up to our profession; let us go neither to the right or left. If friends, yea, as it is sometimes, our own household, be turned against us, all obstacles will we overcome; but to get to heaven by rebelling against God and his word, we cannot, we dare not, we will not; for we know this, that in order to come where God is, we must be obedient to his will. This the church invites us to do. Christ's ministers warn us to take refuge in the church of God. Christians encourage us, and we can be happy here and more abundantly in the kingdom to come.

Will We know our Friends in Heaven?

This subject seems to have a divided opinion amongst our brethren, as well as amongst other denominations and people. I believe the majority of our brethren believe that we will know our friends in heaven. I always had my doubts about it for the following reasons:

How could we feel happy, if we are so fortunate as to get to heaven, and not find some of our friends there, that we expected to see there; perhaps a father or mother, or sister or brother, or some of our children, that have long since died and their spirits left the shores of mortality. We would then know that if we cannot see them in heaven they must be in hell to be in torment with devils for ever. And it seems to me that such a state of things would not give to us that joy that the apostle speaks about, which he says "No eye hath seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things that God has laid up for them that love him." So then, if we know our friends in heaven, we surely know when they are not there. I know not how we could have that bliss and joy in heaven, and at the same time know that some of our friends are in hell to live with devils?

In Mark 12: 20, 25 verses we read the following: Now there were seven brethren and the first took a wife, and dying, left no seed. And the second took her and died, neither left he any seed, and the third likewise. And the seven had her and left no seed. Last of all the woman died also." In the resurrection therefore; when they shall rise, whose wife shall she be, of them, for the seven had her to wife? * * * "Ye do err, not knowing the Scriptures, or the power of God. For when they shall rise from the dead, they neither marry nor are given in marriage, but are as the angels which are in heaven." This is what Christ told the Sadducees. This language does not, to my mind favor recognition of friends in heaven.

In first Corinthians, we read thus: "There is a natural body, and there is a spiritual body." We also read that flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God. So we can clearly see there is no resemblance of our natural bodies, to that of the soul. God breathed into man's nostrils the breath of life and man became a living soul, and that soul is capable of living from the body, in another world.

And as Christ told the Sadducees that we should be like the angels of heaven, so I believe, since we are all of the breath of God, and in that way received our souls. We have tried to show in this essay that since we are all of the same breath of God our souls look alike, and that angels look alike and that we shall all be like the angels, if we get there. I have written these few lines only to give my views, as others have done, and have written what I believe to be true, not for the sake of argument but for the truth.

Do look at from this stand point. Suppose some of your dear, and loving friends would die and after awhile you would die and get to heaven, could you not immediately look for those that had gone before? and if you find them not, where is happiness in heaven?

TRUTH IN BRIEF.—Anybody can soil the reputation of an individual, however pure and chaste, by uttering a suspicion that his enemies will believe and his friends never hear of. A puff of the idle wind will take a million of the seeds of a thistle and do the work of mischief which the husbandman must labor long to undo, the floating particles being too fine to be seen and too light to be stopped. Such are the seeds of slander, so easily sown, so difficult to gather up, and yet so pernicious in the fruits. The slanderer knows that many a mind will catch up the plange and become poisoned by his insinuation, without ever seeking the antidote. No reputation can refute a sneer, nor any human skill prevent mischief.

If life to you is not all you will have it, seek to make it better and more enjoyable yourself.

Serenity of Mind.

The mind may be too serene. To be calm and unconcerned while sin reigns in the soul is to say "peace, peace!" when there should be no peace. It is a serenity of mind not to be commended. It is contentment without godliness, which is as devoid of promise as a clear sky in an August drouth. Those who never labor, cannot appreciate rest; so, those who never become weary and heavy laden because of sin, cannot appreciate that rest of soul and tranquillity of mind which Christ has promised, and which he alone can give. A storm must precede the calm. The still small voice is not heard until the tempest, the fire, and the earthquake have passed by. We sometimes read of a culprit hearing the sentence of death read without evincing any nervousness. He may even ascend the scaffold with a grim tread, and utter blasphemous words without faltering. But do we admire such calmness? No, indeed! Better far would the guilty wretch lose his tranquillity of mind and imitate the penitent thief upon the cross.

Do not thousands of culprits hear their doom pronounced from the pulpit, Sabbath after Sabbath, without manifesting any uneasiness? It is even so. This, too, is a serenity of mind as little to be desired or applauded as that of the condemned, but hardened criminal. Let us not say "peace and safety" when destruction may so suddenly come upon us. "No rest for the wicked," are the words of inspiration. The sinner should find no serenity of mind until Christ speaks to the warring elements in his sin-tossed soul those precious words: "Peace, be still!" Then there should be a great calm, akin to that enjoyed in the celestial climes above.

The Christians mind should be serene in season and out of season. "Let not your heart be troubled," says the blessed Master. "Rejoice evermore." Of all men the Christian should be the most happy and cheerful. His is a life of trust and hope. How beautiful the words of the Psalmist: "The Lord is my shepherd; I shall not want. He maketh me to lie down in green pastures: he leadeth me beside the still waters." Again: "They that trust in the Lord shall be as Mount Zion, which cannot be removed, but abideth forever. As the mountains are round about Jerusalem, so the Lord is round about his people from henceforth even forever."

The Christian may be serene even in the hour of keenest sorrow. What sorrow so keen as that of bereavement? But even here the Christian is comforted. His faith bids him weep not as those who have no hope. Oh! that cheering word, "Hope,"—than it, there is no sweeter in the language:

Her precious pearl in sorrow's cup,
Unmelted at the bottom lay,
To shine again, when, all drunk up,
The bitterness should pass away.
Moore.

Whose mind should be so serene in the dying hour as that of the disciple of Jesus? As his soul is about entering out upon the troubled waters, he will hear the Master say, "It is I, be not afraid." Neither will he be. As David expresses it: "Though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil: for thou art with me; thy rod and thy staff they comfort me." A dying general once heard the cry, "They flee, they flee!" "Who flee?" he inquired. Upon being informed that it was the enemy, he said, "Then I die happy," and soon after expired. We may doubt the propriety of these words being uttered by one whose business it was to destroy his fellow-men, and whose highest ambition was to gain a temporal crown as victor in a bloody battle. But when a good old soldier of the cross says, "I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith; henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness," who calls in question the propriety of the grand and serenely solemn declaration? Truly may the dying saint, in all the serenity of the evening hour of a well-spent life, say, "I die happy!" Happy, not merely in the dying hour, but throughout eternity,—happy, not in the possession of earthly fame, but of a crown of glory that will never, never, fade. May our lives, dear reader, be such that we too can at least say, "I die happy," and then be crowned as more than conquerors through him who is the Captain of our salvation, and who has promised never to forsake us, but to go with us to the end.

Lending Tools.

One of the greatest annoyances of farm life comes from lending tools and machines. A neighbor wants a shovel, a hoe, a horse-rake or cultivator, horse-pitch-fork, a mowing machine, or what not, for there are some men who seem to have nothing of their own to farm with. You can't deny them, though they ought to be denied; but they generally get the tool, and when you want it you know pretty nearly where to find it. If not injured, or does not need repairs before it can be used it is a fortunate circumstance. * * * * The habit of borrowing is not only an expensive one to both borrower and lender, but it bars the harmony of neighborhoods. It destroys the manhood of the borrower and the equanimity of the lender. * * * * No man can afford to buy tools for others to wear out, merely for the sake of being called an "obliging neighbor" when he comes to die.—Detroit Tribune.

Thurman on the Passover Reviewed:—Error Exposed.

In the writings of William C. Thurman, which were offered to the brethren a few years ago, there is considerable space devoted to the supper Christ ate with his apostles the night before he was crucified, to show that this was the old Jewish passover. He would have it, that it was at the legal time of eating the passover, as it was first instituted, which he says was to be slain and eaten in the beginning of the fourteenth day of the first month, Nisan; but that the Jews at that time had changed from the original time of eating the passover, and, instead of eating it in the fore part of the night, they had changed to the latter part of that night, a little before daylight. In this way he would reconcile with his theory the circumstance of the Jews not going "into the judgment hall, lest they should be defiled, but that they might eat the passover." John 18: 28.

To sustain his wild theory upon this point, he calls up Josephus as a witness, to prove that the Jews had made this change in the time of eating the passover in his day. He says, "We learn from Josephus, that the Jews were accustomed at that day to eat the passover from the ninth hour to the eleventh," (Sacred Calendar, page 34, sec. 23) which, according to our mode of reckoning time would be from three till five o'clock. But, as it happens, Josephus does not say this; but he does say, "Upon the coming of their feast, which is called the passover, when they slay their sacrifice, from the ninth hour till the eleventh." (Wars of the Jews, book 6, chapter 9, Sec. 3). Now, the slaying of the passover and the eating of the passover were two very different things; and why Thurman would resort to misrepresenting Josephus, substituting eat for slay, we will let the reader judge.

We agree with Thurman as to the time Christ ate his supper with his apostles, that it was in the night of the beginning of the fourteenth day of the first month, Nisan; and as there is no difference of opinion on this point, we will let that fact stand as uncontroverted, and will not occupy space to prove an admitted fact. But the Jews were not to eat their passover until the following night, which would be the beginning of the fifteenth day. This, we think, we can prove to the satisfaction of every intelligent person, who is not too prejudiced to receive the truth.

The paschal lamb was to be a male, without blemish, of the first year, either from the sheep or the goats (Ex. 12: 5); it was to be taken from the flock on the tenth day of the month(Ex. 12: 3); it was to be kept up until the fourteenth day of the same month (Ex. 12: 6); and it was to be killed on the fourteenth day (Chron. 35: 1), at the going down of the sun, at the season that they came forth out of Egypt,(Deut. 16: 6). Now, let it be remembered that, with the Jews, the day commenced at sunset, and ended at the next sunset, and there could be but one going down of the sun in each day. The sun having gone down on the thirteenth day, before the fourteenth began, as the passover was to be killed "on the fourteenth day at the going down of the sun," and was to be eaten in the following night, the eating of the passover would be in the beginning of the fifteenth day; for, as soon as the sun had gone down on the fourteenth day, the fifteenth began; and as the sun was going down on the fourteenth day, "in the evening," or, according to the Hebrew reading "between the two evenings," the passover was to be slain. The Jews reckoned two evenings. The first began at the ninth hour of the natural day, or three o'clock in the afternoon; and the second, at the eleventh hour, or five o'clock. The paschal lamb was required to be sacrificed between the evenings (Ex. 12: 6, Lev. 23: 6), which Josephus tells us the Jews in his time did, "from the ninth hour until the eleventh;" hence the law requiring the paschal lamb to be sacrificed "at even, at the going down of the sun," expressed both evenings, and it is truly remarkable that "Christ our passover," the antitype of the paschal lamb expired at the very time of the slaying of the sacrifice.

They could not slay the sacrifice, according to the law, before all leaven had been removed; for they were not to offer the blood of the sacrifice with leaven (Ex. 34: 25); and all leaven had to be put away before the evening or latter part of the fourteenth day of the first month (Ex. 12: 18). They were to eat the paschal supper, with their loins girded, their shoes on their feet, their staff in their hand, and in haste (Ex. 12: 12;) because they were suddenly to take their departure. The destroying angel was at hand; their enemies were coming against them, and they had not a moment's time to lose; "and the Egyptians were urgent upon the people, that they might send them out of the land in haste; for they said, We be all dead men. And the people took their dough before it was leavened, their kneading troughs being bound up in their clothes upon their shoulders," (Ex. 12: 33, 34.) "and they departed from Rameses in the first month, on the fifteenth day of the first month, on the morrow after the passover, the children of Israel went out with a high hand in the sight of all the Egyptians. (Num. 33: 3) "And they baked unleavened cakes of the dough which they brought forth out of Egypt; for it was not leavened, because they were thrust out of Egypt, and could not tarry, neither, had they prepared for themselves any victuals," (Ex. 12: 39.)

Now is it not evident, from those circumstances, that the Israelites ate the passover the same night in which they began their march on the following morning, which was "on the fifteenth day of the month?" (Num. 33—3). Pharaoh and his people were urgent that the Israelites should start immediately, and they readily bestowed on them such things as they desired, and in such haste did they begin their march that they had no time to prepare for themselves any victuals for their journey. Further testimony to show that the night of the fifteenth day of the first month was the time upon which the Jews were to eat the passover would seem to be superfluous.

The time Christ instituted his supper was on the night of the fourteenth, which Thurman and company admit, which was one whole day before the legal time to eat the passover; hence it could not be the passover; for this ordinance could not lawfully be observed at a different time from that upon which it was first instituted, (Ex. 13: 10), and the blessed Lord certainly would not have proven himself unfaithful to the law by keeping it at a different time, had he intended to keep the passover.

If the apostles called it the passover, when properly considered, it is no evidence that it was the Jewish passover. They were at that time only disciples, or learners of Christ; and the time for keeping this sacred ordinance being close at hand, they were looking forward to it with deep concern, and they no doubt thought they were going to keep the passover this year with their Lord and Master, as we believe they had been accustomed to keeping it with him. But after they were endued with power from on high, and had received the comforter which was to teach them all things, and bring to their remembrance all things which Christ had taught them, that which was before mysterious to them is now made plain and easy to comprehend, and they can readily understand all about this supper. They see there was no passover about it; and from this time they never once call it the passover, but a supper. Is not this sufficient evidence alone to prove that this was a new institution, which Christ so earnestly desired to keep with them before he was to be offered up as the great antitype of the paschal lamb, when he said, "With desire I have desired to eat this passover with you before I suffer." This alone shows that it was not the ordinary passover he was then eating.

The time the Jews refused to go into the judgment hall was not at the eight hour of the night,or two o'clock, as Thurman tries so hard to show, but it was the next morning, after daylight. We find that, when Christ was arrested,he was first taken before Annas, and he sent him bound to Caiaphas, who was high priest that year. After a preliminary hearing before Caiphas, it appears that the council adjourned until the morning; for it was contrary to all forms of law to proceed against a person's life by night; but when the morning was come, all the chief priests and elders of the people took council against Jesus to put him to death. And when they had bound him they led him away and delivered him to Pontius Pilate, the governor, (Matt. 27 : 1, 2); or, as Luke gives it, "As soon as it was day, the elders of the people and the chief priests and the Scribes came together, and led him into their council, and the whole multitude of them arose and led him unto Pilate," (Luke 22 : 66, 23 : 1). When they arrived there, "it was early, and they themselves went not into the judgment hall, lest they should be defiled,but that they might eat the passover," (John 18 : 28). What clearer evidence could be asked for to show that the Jews' passover was not until the following night? The day had then commenced, and they had not yet eaten their passover.

But Thurman says, "If they had not intended to eat the passover before the following night, this, their reason for not going into the judgment hall, was no reason at all; for one thus defiled had only to be unclean until evening, for he could wash his flesh with water, and when the sun is down he shall be clean, and shall afterwards eat of the holy things." Now we admit the correctness of this law; but we object to his mode of reasoning from it. The Jews were unavoidably liable to become unclean, no difference how careful they might be. To touch a dead body, or even to touch anything that was unclean, caused uncleanness; and for this reason there was a provision in the law, whereby persons thus defiled might become clean again. But had the Jews gone into the judgment hall in the case referred to, their uncleanness would have been willful and without excuse, and not through weakness or accident, and consequently we do not believe their uncleanness could have been removed by the conditions of this law. He also says, "If our Lord came not to destroy the law, but to fulfil, he must have necessarily ate of that passover as enjoined by the law; and if the Son can do nothing of himself, but what he seeth the Father do, he could have instituted no new passover of his own." Now did he not institute feet-washing and the communion at the same time he instituted this supper? They certainly were something new; and if he had power to institute these ordinances, why, with the same power, could he not also institute the Lord's supper? As to Christ's fulfilling the law, we believe he had fulfilled this part of the law three times since his baptism; and if three times fulfilling the law was not sufficient we would like to know how many more times would have been sufficient. Concerning the day of the week on which Christ was crucified, and the time he was to remain in the grave, he says, "We are then compelled either to admit that the crucifixion was on Thursday or deny the word of Christ–'So shall the Son of Man be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth?'" The seeming difference between our Lord's prediction of the time he was to be in the grave, and the time during which his body was interred, is very easily obviated, by considering, that it was the custom of the orientals to reckon any part of a day of twenty-four hours for a whole day; and to say a thing happened after three days and three nights, was the same as to say that it happened after three days, or on the third day. (Compare Esther 4 : 16 with 5: 1). Christ being entombed in the closing of Friday, this was counted a day and a night; and Saturday was another day and night; and he rose from the grave on Sunday morning, which was counted another day and night, which, according to the oriental mode of reckoning time, would be three days and three nights. In this, our ex-brother betrays a very limited knowledge of the oriental customs, for the great pretentions he has made to science and literature; but, according to his own words, he is not one of the wise prophets. Speaking concerning the time of Christ's second coming, to judge the world in righteousness, he says, "The wise shall understand;" and we all know he did not understand; for Christ failed to come when he said he would; therefore, with his own words he condemns himself as a foolish prophet.

He also says, in speaking concerning the time when the Lord's supper should be kept, "Those who observe it at any other time than that upon which the passover was to be kept, do appear to charge the apostles with having been remiss in their duty, and then assume the authority to supply their omission." Now, if Christ the great head of the church did not keep this supper on the night the Jews were to eat the passover, as we have clearly shown, why should his followers be restricted to that night in keeping this ordinance? He does not say, "Thou shalt therefore keep this ordinance in his season from year to year, like the passover was to be kept;" but he says, "As oft as ye eat this bread, and drink this cup, ye do show the Lord's death till he come," (1 Cor. 11: 26). Hence there is no restriction concerning the time of keeping this supper; but as often as it is done in order, it certainly will be acceptable.

With a few words to those brethren who have been giving ear to this false prophet, and have ceased to celebrate the death and sufferings of their adorable Redeemer, I will bring my article to a close. Under the law of Moses any person that was clean, and was not on a journey, and forbare to keep the passover, was to be cut off from among his people, (Num. 9 : 13);and Christ said, "Verily, verily, I say unto you, except ye eat the flesh of the Son of Man and drink his blood, ye have no life in you," (John 6 : 23). Now "if every transgression and disobedience," under the law, "received a just recompense of reward, how shall we escape," says Paul, "if we neglect so great salvation?" (Heb. 2 : 2, 3). Therefore we would say with Paul, "Brethren, mark them which cause divisions and offences, contrary to the doctrine which ye have received, and avoid them." Some may think this is taking advantage of Thurman, since he has been excluded from the Brethren: but remember his works have not been excluded, and it is to them we are replying.

Early Training.

We believe there are no children whose early training has been religious, but become at an early period in life, the subjects of the Spirit's awakening influence. The promise is to us and to our children; and if we devote them to God, and labor to bring them up in his nurture and admonition, we may conclude with certainty that the gems of truth planted in their young hearts, and dedicated by our prayers and tears, will receive the additional watering of the Holy Spirit, without whose genial and operative influence all human agencies must prove unavailing.

Habits Make the Man.

Be Ready.

"Therefore be ye also ready."

These words of our Savior, were uttered as a kindly warning. He had used for illustration a person who had been attacked by a thief. If he would have had a premonition of the approach of the thief, he would have set a watch, and not have suffered his house to be broken up. And then he says: "Therefore, be ye also ready, for in such an hour as ye think not, the Son of Man cometh."

We take it that this admonition of Jesus, had reference to our spiritual preparation, or readiness. In the affairs of this life we have our preparations to make. Almost every occasion in life has its necessary preparations, in order that we may be ready for it. Marriages—weddings as we would say—are frequently used for illustrations. And they very profitably lead the mind to contemplate the subject. There is no other occasion in life, upon which people are more sensative in their state or condition of readiness. How could a bride endure to meet her bridegroom, unprepared, or unadorned? Or, vice versa. There is one occasion in this life, that we all meet with. Not one of us expects or hopes to evade it. All other circumstances or relations, or conditions, blessings or misfortunes, are doubtful and uncertain. All do not marry: we may or we may not. All do not fall into the hands of thieves. The ills of life may befall us, or we may escape them. In the affirmation of a child: "As sure as you are born," so surely will you meet the occasion of death. It is only a matter of time, and that time the most uncertain of of all uncertainties.

"Leaves have their time to fall,
And flowers to wither at the north wind's breath,
And stars to set—but all,
Thou hast all seasons for thine own, oh death!"

Be ye also ready. Now dear reader, if, in all the contingencies of life, we desire a state of readiness, before they come upon us, and since there is no emergency more sure to befall us, than that of death, and the time of none other so uncertain, are we not acting very strangely, very thoughtlessly, or very inconsistantly, if we make no preparation for that greatest of all events?

Be ye also ready. Reader, are you ready for death? Are you ready for the coming of the Son of man? Solemn event; and yet it will surely come, to every one of us. Meditate upon it, until you can lay your hand upon your heart and say: "Even so, come, Lord Jesus," come quickly.

Are the apostles to be blamed for not baptizing "in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost," as it stands in Matthew 28: 19? Or did the Lord Jesus give this command in a parable or mystery to his apostles, and then give Peter the keys to reveal his mysteries first at Jerusalem and then to Samaria and to all nations.

Notes of Travel.

BROTHER HENRY: By request I send you these few lines for publication. Brethren John S. Newcomer and John B. Gibble, from Lancaster county, Pa., paid us a visit, preaching the word. They came by railroad, on the Wrightsville Railroad, to Hiestand's station. They were met by brother Thomas Gray. The first appointment was at the Union Methodist house, Longstown, Friday evening Jan. 31st. Text, Acts 8: 35, Home with brother Thomas Gray. Next day to sister Meyers's. Evening, meeting at Meyer's. Text, 2 Cor. 6: 1, 2. Lodged at same place. Here we met with a great many brethren and sisters. Next morning, Sunday, had meeting at the Brethren's new meeting-house, lately erected, 70x40, called East Codorus meeting-house. The brethren preached from Romans 4: 1—12, to a very large and attentive audience. Brethren Newcomer and Gibble dined at sister Keeney's, widow of Elder John Keeney dec'd. Evening meeting at the same meeting-house. Text, Rev. 22: 10—14. Lodged at sister Meyer's, widow of Elder Isaac Meyers dec'd. This was the last meeting in this (Codorus) congregation.

Thence, on Monday morning, Feb. 3rd, they went to brother Abraham Bankert's a distance of about 13 miles, called the Upper Codorus congregation. Public preaching at 2 P. M., at brother Bankert's in the second story of a large factory, from 2 Cor. 3: 1—3. In the evening at early candle light in the house of brother Henry Hohf. Text, Luke 13: 23, 24. Lodged at brother Hohf's. Next morning went to brother Benjamin Trimmer's. Preaching at 10 A. M., from John 10: 1–16.

Thence they were conveyed by brother D. N. Bucher and the writer to Beaver Creek meeting. house. Evening meeting, text, 1 Peter 3: 10—12. Brother Newcomer lodged at Bucher's, and brother Gibble went home with the writer. Here we met Elder Andrew Miller and Elder Adam Brown. Next morning, Feb. 5th, we went to Upper Canawago, called Mummert's meeting-house. Filled four appointments there. Texts, 1 Cor. 1: 30; Matth. 22: 1—14; Matth. 11: 28—30; Heb. 13: 9—17.

Next, to Lower Canawago. First appointment at Bermudian meeting-house. Two meetings there: first text, John 3: 14—17; second text, John 3: 1—3.

Thence to Holt's Swamp meeting-house. Here they filled, I believe, three appointments: Saturday evening Sunday and Sunday evening. On Sunday forenoon, Feb. 9th, Elder Andrew Miller brought brother Newcomer back again to our meeting-house at Beaver Creek. This was our regular appointment. Brother Peter S. Kauffman also was present. Brother Newcomer spoke in German, and brother Kauffman, in English. The word was preached with power, the churches edified, and many made to feel the need of a Savior; and we hope that the good seed sown may bring forth fruit. Brethren Newcomer and Gibble, started for their homes on Monday, having filled seventeen appointments. God will reward them. I hope we will meet to part no more.

DEAR COMPANION: As there is no meeting in bounds to-day, I feel like dropping you a few lines, and asking a few questions, in regard to the missionary matter. You know very well what action was taken at the District Meeting last spring. Now there seemed to be quite an interest taken, and a good many tears shed when we talked about the want of ministerial labor in our section. Now I have waited with all patience to hear something from the community, and from the Treasurer, but I have waited in vain. Why is it that the community does not report? And why is it that the call that I sent in was not taken any notice of? I wrote to brother C. G. Lint, what I thought was a call; maybe it was not, but I never heard anything from him yet. There is a great want in our section, and we have been giving and filling appointments in different places, traveling on foot as a general thing, some times 15 or 20 miles. But that is over with me now. I can't stand it any more, and will have to give it up. I don't want you to think that I want money for preaching. This is not my object in writing; but I feel like putting you in remembrance of the souls that are perishing for the Bread of Life around us. And I know that the Western District of Pennsylvania has men and means to send it to them, if they only had the will. Now it seems pretty hard, brethren, to think there is so much talent and means in our possession, and all lying dormant! What think ye the Master will say, when he comes? We would like to see something done before our next District Meeting, so that we will know how it will work. Now if my letter that I wrote to brother Lint didn't contain a call, then he is clear; but if it did then he is responsible for the neglect of duty.

So now, hoping to hear from you soon, dear COMPANION, and from our committee, we will leave the matter for the present. Yours truly in hope of heaven. Brethren pray for us.

MARK MINSER.

Decker's Point, Pa.

Brother H.: I will give you a bit of church news. On Monday 10th inst., the church of Waterloo, Iowa, held an election for two speakers, but which resulted in the choice of three; viz., Lewis Peiffer, John Snyder, and Martin Beachly, Yours in the bonds of brotherly love.

D. J. SPEICHER.

Brother Henry: Joseph Holder wishes some brother or sister to explain what the least commandments are, Matt. 5: 19. Those least commandments are Christ's commandments. But some did say, and do yet, that Christ's commandments were no commandments, but sayings. "Whosoever therefore shall break one of Christ's commandments, and shall teach men so, he shall be called the least in the kingdom of heaven, but whosoever shall do and teach them, the same shall be called great in in the kingdom of heaven." To be called least, is to be neglected, and be nothing. To be called great, is to be great and esteemed.

DANIEL KAGARICE.

Brother Henry: I, in company with Daniel Wolf, Jeremiah Brown and Daniel Gibbon attended a few meetings at Brownsville, Washington county, Md., from the 2nd to 7th of February. The brethren were encouraged to press onward; and some gave evidence that they were tired of the service of Satan and intended to serve the Lord. The Lord bless his people, prosper his cause, and stir up his servants, that they be about the Master's business; for the night is coming, and so much work yet undone. Brethren come and help us; for I am persuaded that a change, once in a while, works well from your brother and fellow servant.

EPH. W. STONER.

From Our Philadelphia Correspondent.

For the first time I received your religious paper, regularly. Though not a former subscriber to your worthy medium, its columns, and the pure doctrines set forth therein, are not new to me. I have long since been well acquainted with the C. F. C., and not unfrequently read its contents with delight and relish. I would have been a subscriber to it had it not been for an unsettled state and condition financially. Therefore it is not the cash value of the periodical that I envy. Oh no. God forbid that I should be so extremely covetous. I am only too happy, that we are enabled to receive the news, from everywhere, throughout the entire civilized world, so easily and so liberally.

Indeed, dear Editor, the world cannot be too thoughtful for the invaluable benefit which she constantly reaps by the great minds, who with their unrelinquished efforts made the way of communication between mind and matter, and thus also between mind and mind, so clear.

What would the world be? What could it do, without the pen, the press, the wire, and myriad other time and labor-saving institutions? Ah! who can tell? And with all this, is it not remarkably strange, that, at this great age, mind has almost godlike control over matter, when it has comparatively saying, annihilated time, distance and worth, there are so many among us who do, very thoughtlessly, discount the benefits of these God-given blessings, greatly refuse to enjoy the usefulness of their warm influence, and look upon them with a great deal of mistrust, as though the physical productions of man were not inferior to his mental productions? Not uncommonly they, for the mere insignificant expense of a worthy paper, hasty dispatch or trip, deprive others and themselves of the value of these good things. How often, agents for some good cause, are scoffed at, denounced, called lazy, good-for-nothings, &c., when applying for a subscription. I have seen men consume an entire hour in walking a distance of three miles to save ten cents, while they could have made the trip in one third of the time and even more than double the amount in the remaining two-thirds hour. I have seen men take up a whole half day in walking ten miles on the railroad track, to save thirty cents, while they could have made the same distance in forty minutes and earn five times the amount during the remaining part of the half day. I have seen parents deprive their own children of a common school education, to help, what they call, at home. and after their children had arrived to maturity the parents paid ten-fold more, to have brain work done by others, than a good education for their worthy children would have cost them. And what made the cases still worse, the tyrannical parents, then had the high-fluent impudence and unkindness to call their children, "Ignorant blockheads." I have seen people, rich people, instead of sending a telegraphic dispatch, write a long and bungling letter, and then forget to send it by first mail, for friends, living far away, to hurry and come to see a dear relative who was about dying, and thus save, by the operation, the full and clear sum of one dollar, and thus also deprive the friends of the pleasure of yet seeing the dear relative alive. Oh, how soulless!

The case with those heartless, covetous, and close-featured creatures, is very evident indeed. They are, what we may call, "The one-idead persons, whose one idea can be enclosed altogether in one single iron safe, and can be fully expressed with one single, small word, "Cash." They can easily be distinguished. They are those who are physical; they have strong muscles, have large appropriativeness, large alfmentiveness, large cautiousness, large combativeness, small ideality, humanity, conscientiousness, approbativeness, veneration, benevolence and small hope. They eat well and much, sleep, on purpose, little. They have a small brain, don't read, they move, but they don't think, save for one purpose, viz., Cash. For such persons it becomes extremely extravagant and lavish to subscribe for a paper, or book, or buy a sewing-machine, or send a telegram. Who ever heard of buying a farm and not to cultivate it? Buying clothing and not to wear them? Preparing a meal and not to eat it? Have a railroad and not ride? Have a telegraph and not talk? Have a school, and not to learn? Have a book or paper and not read? I never yet received either a daily, weekly, monthly or any other periodical, out of which I did not realize ten-fold its value in the way of knowledge. Perhaps only one half the length of a column, doubly repaid me for the time consumed in reading it, and for the cost of the periodical for the entire term.

The mind is the world's master, and not the hand. "For the mind, the world was made; for the soul, the mind was made." The mind controls the body, and not the body the mind. God has made it so. The mind invents. God has made it so. The mind discovers. God has made it so. The mind discovered the use of the lever, the wheel, the spring, the weight, the force of steam, the speed of electricity, the convenience of language, &c., &c. They are all God-given beauties and benefits, and he who deprives himself and others, purposely or carelessly, of them, sins, I believe, against high heaven. I believe so, because all such wisdom tends to bring man nearer to God, and cause him to feel thankful towards his Maker for allowing him the faculty to discover and use advantageously these holy things that God made.

The pen, the press and the wire, are several of the most useful and beneficial, sacred ,and wonderful agencies ever thrown in the path of human inventions, to bring mind and mind to think and act together quickly One may write his thoughts today, and by to-morrow at the same hour, every intelligent mind throughout the entire length and breadth of the land, is within reach of that thought. Thoughts and words go, in our land, now, as if carried by messengers from the world of gods. Indeed, my dear Editor, they are messengers from God. Man only learnt how to use and control them. When we see a book, a telegraph, railroad, &c., we behold God's noble works. True, man has given peculiar shapes and fashions to material, but after all, the great bulk and mass, yea wonder, in the machineries are God's works and not man's. Oh, how good God is, to give us these good things along with his good book!

The pen, the press, the wire, means of communication, for mind to reach mind, for thought to reach thought; for thought from here, and thought from there to accumulate and live forever in the soul of man, good or bad.

Nothing is so elevating to man as the interchange of the thoughts of one mind with those of another, on truth.

Says Dr. Franklin, "I never yet communicated with any without learning." Says Solomon the wise: "Get wisdom and forget it not."

We should, then, all learn thoughts of one another and not only read each others thoughts, but also criticise them. Criticism is another great thing. It is one of the proudest refiners living. It is to society what the smut-machine is to the miller and his customers. It is a powerful impetus to progress. There is no greater civilizer.

Work and correct; read and criticise. No man or woman has a right to drudge and idle time away, and not think and talk. But should think, talk, listen, read and write. The COMPANION is a good medium. Reason one with another. Even, though, we may at times see an article published, in papers received in our homes, which does not meet our approval, we should by no means on such account unphilosophically and indignantly drop the paper; but at once make an attempt to criticise, and if our criticism is lacking reality, then we should be thankful for some one to give us a pitch higher in the scale of thought, and in doing that which is right, good and true.

Yours ardently,

J. P. MILLER.

Philadelphia, Pa.

From Saunders Co., Neb., Feb. 7th, 1873.

Dear brethren, sisters, and friends, who read the C. F. C., I will introduce myself by telling you that I came here March 16th, 1871, from Sandusky county, Ohio. Having suffered extremely with asthma there for over ten years, I came here with the hope of breathing easier; which I have fully realized, insomuch as my breathing is perfectly easy nearly all the time. The breezes, that pass over these beautiful prairies, are so bracing, that many, who came here with asthma and other lung diseases, are enjoying comfortable health. But we have been quite lonesome for want the society of the Brethren. We have seen but three brethren since we came here. Brother John Brown, of Williams county, Ohio, preached for us twice in September 1871; and two days ago brother John Ikenberry, of Dodge county, and brother D. O. Brumbaugh, of Washington county, Nebraska, came to us, intending to stay with us three nights. But wishing to cross the Platte River on the ice, into Sarpy county, and as the ice was thawing very fast, they only preached for us once and pursued their journey.

Now, brethren, you who are farming on the hillsides, and rolling the stones in Pennsylvania, or wading the mud of Ohio and Indiana, rolling logs, pulling stumps, and waiting for weeks for the ground to dry off that you can commence your Spring farming, just come over and take a look at these beautiful, dry, rolling prairies, the most beautiful, healthful, and productive region I ever saw, having traveled more or less in eight different states. We can plow all summer and not catch the plow on stump, stick, or stone. The land is rolling enough to drain well, and level enough to work any kind of machinery with pleasure. A man or a boy with a yoke of oxen, worth from $150 to $175, can commence the 1st of May in the wild prairie, and break from sixty to seventy-five acres till harvest, and stir the same after harvest, ready for wheat or other crop, in the spring. Our roads are the admiration of newcomers. They are smooth and solid; even when the frost comes out, they cut very little with heavy loads. We seldom have rain in the cold season; so when the snow goes off, and the frost comes out of the ground, we are ready to go to farming, nice and dry.

Now I wish my brethren, and, especially, ministers, to give us a call, and find a hearty welcome. Stop off at Ashland on the B. & M. R. R., and you will find us seven miles west, on the old freight road, in section thirty-four, town thirteen north, range eight east. If any minister is coming this way, let me know what train you will be on. I will meet you at Ashland, and have an appointment for preaching after you have time for a good night's rest.

When I came here I brought my family with me, and have never regretted it. However I would not advise others to do so, for you may look at it differently from what I do; for since I am so far relieved from the horrible disease, I rejoice as a bird escaped from ten years confinement in a cage.

I wrote an article for the COMPANION last Summer, but somehow it failed to appear. Now, brother Henry, we will wait for the appearance of this to let the brethren and friends know where to find us; for doubtless there have brethren passed our house, that would gladly have stopped, if they had known we were here. Hoping to hear from and see some of the brethren ere long. I close.

NATHANIEL WILSON.

Ashland, Neb.

Dear Brother: I now take my pen with a heavy heart, believing that I have the love of the brethren at heart, and that God is a loving God, and that his word is not yea and nay, but yea and amen.

I am a Virginian by birth, I was born and raised in Franklin county. I left that State in the year 1833, and after being absent forty years, I thought I would take a visit back to see my dear old brethren, that I was acquainted with. The first house that I entered into, after I got into the settlement of my expected happy visit, was the house of brethren that I was raised with. It was just before dinner, and to my hurt and astonishment, the old sister and the family went out and ate their dinner, and then came back and asked me to go into the dining room and eat. If that is the fruits of the Spirit of truth, then I do not understand the word of truth. The Savior says to the Father, "Sanctify them through thy truth, thy word is truth." John 17: 27. Now I ask such professors where they get the authority to make that difference, on the account of the color of the skin? Jesus says, "And for their sake I sanctify myself, that they also might be sanctified through the truth. Neither pray I for these alone, but for them also which shall believe on me through their word, that they all may be one, as thou Father art in me and I in thee; that they also may be one in me, that the world may believe that thou hast sent me." John 17: 27. By the which will we are sanctified through the offering of the Lord Jesus Christ once for all.

Heb 10: 70. Peter says, "Now I perceive of a truth that God is no respecter of persons." James says, "But if ye have respect of persons ye commit sin and are convinced of the law as transgressors, for whosoever shall keep the whole law and yet offend in one point he is guilty of all." James 2: 10. And again "For all the law is fulfilled in one word, even in this, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." "Beloved if God so loved us, as we ought to love one another." John 4: 11. Now, dear brethren, it is to the guilty that I am speaking, and not to the innocent. Now I will ask you, is it true, that you believe the scripture, where it says, "God is no respector of persons?" I have come to the conclusion that such conduct is the manifestation of unbelief. Remember the words of the apostle John, where he says, "If a man say I love God and hateth his brother, he is a liar, for he that loveth not his brother whom he hath seen, how can he love God whom he hath not seen?" And this commandment have we from him, that he who loveth God love his brother also. 1st John 4: 20.

Now, dear readers, I wish to say to you, that I have visited in the State of Virginia, those that profess to belong to the true church of Christ, and yet will say by their actions, that they do not believe the Savior or the apostle Peter. Remember the words of God where he says to Moses, that he should not be able to enter the promised land because he did not believe. My dear brethren, let us be careful, let us not tamper with God to our condemnation.

Now a few words to you my dear colored brethren. Be faithful, and bear with your white brothers in love. Remember that we are all fallible creatures.

S. S. MARRS.

In the Coventry congregation, Chester county, Pa., February 8th, our aged brother OWEN REINHART. He was afflicted with Rheumatism, and went with crutches; he was also very hard of hearing, so that he was deprived of the privilege of the Lord's house. But he rejoiced much to have the brethren visit him at his son Elkanan's, who paid him every attention. We had two little communion seasons with him. His delight was in the ordinances of the Lord's house, and he was patiently waiting for the change to come, which came speedily without suffering long. He passed away in the hope of the crown of life, full of years. Age 82 years, 2 month and 5 days. Funeral services by the brethren Elder John R Price and David Keim from 25th Psalm, 6th and 7th verses, selected by himself. Buried in Stover's burying grounds, North Coventry, Chester county, Pa. JACOB CONNER.

Also in the same church, January 9th, sister ALLA KEFFER, daughter of brother William and sister Susan; in the 21st year of her age. She united with the church when quite young. Died of consumption; was buried at Limerick church, Montgomery county. Funeral services by the brethren, John Price and David Younce, from Germantown, from John 11th chapter.

The Christian Family Companion. Is published every Tuesday, at $1.50 a year, by Henry R. Holsinger, who is a member of the Church of the Brethren, sometimes known by the name of "German Baptists," and vulgarly or maliciously called "Dunkards."

The design of the work is to advocate truth, expose error, and encourage the true Christian on his way to Zion.

It assumes that the New Testament is the Will of God, and that no one can have the promise of salvation without observing all its requirements, that among these are Faith, Repentance, Prayer, Baptism by trine immersion, Feet Washing, the Lord's Supper, the Holy Communion, Charity, Nonconformity to the world, and a full resignation to the whole will of God, as he has revealed it through his Son Jesus Christ.

So much of the affairs of this world as may be thought necessary to the proper observance of the signs of the times, or such as may tend to the moral, mental, or physical benefit of the Christian will be published, thus removing all occasion for coming into contact with the so-called Literary or Political journals.

Subscriptions may begin at any time.

Papa, Come Help Me Across the Dark River.

INCIDENT.—A little girl lay dying; her father had already gone to the better land; and, as her breath grew fainter and fainter, she murmured, "Papa, come help me across the dark river."

Papa, come help me across the dark river.
Voices are calling my spirit to-night;
The shadows around me are fading forever,
And the angels, dear papa, are close to my sight;
One clasp of your hand, the way seems so lonely,
A sweet loving word from your poor dying child,
For I'll be here with mother a few moments only,
And then who will comfort her anguish so wild?
CHORUS—
Papa, come help me across the dark river,
Fold me in arms that are loving and true;
Oh the shadows around me are fading forever,
And I shall be home soon, dear papa, with you.

Papa, come help me across the dark river,
Lead me the way that my footsteps must go;
I'll wander beside you and leave you, ah, never,
For the angels, dear papa, will love me I know;
There mother will come, where days are all gladness,
And there in the light of yon heaven we shall stray;
Though it's long since you left us in weeping and sadness,
I'll know the kind face of dear papa straightway.

CHORUS—Papa, &c.

Papa, come help me across the dark river,
Faint is my breath, and the angels have come;
O weep not, my mother, that now we must sever,
For I go to dear papa, in yonder bright home;
I see his bright smile, so tender and loving,
And calmly my spirit is taking its flight,
And my footsteps are done with all sadness and roving,
For I shall be with dear papa to-night.

CHORUS—Papa, &c.

Answer to Queries.

In number 6, present volume of the COMPANION, brother Hoke of Indiana, gives an admirable answer to a query concerning the penny a day. It encouraged me to attempt an answer to another, viz., "How did the Scribes and Pharisees make a proselyte two-fold more the child of hell than themselves?

In answer, I would simply ask, was it ever known that any corrupt party or set of men became better by their own action? Evil is a growth, as well as good. It is a law in nature, that anything in action multiplies itself. There are certainly degrees in wickedness. Paul declares that "evil men and seducers shall wax worse and WORSE deceiving, and being deceived." One sinner may be reclaimed by gospel means; another may be steeped in sin beyond redemption. Those who with blind zeal exert themselves to make proselytes to a wrong faith, are the children of hell, and they cause their proselytes to use double diligence in the work of deception, thus making twofold more the children of hell.

In regard to the query concerning the meaning of 2 John 8: 11, I would say, that the apostle exhorts to diligence, lest our works be in vain. A man in business that saves all he makes, becomes wealthy. So he would have us to be rich in good works, that we may receive a full reward. This is attained only by abiding in the doctrine of Christ. He then warns us of the danger of heeding anything but the Bible. If any one claims to be a teacher of Christianity and brings not the doctrine of the Bible, comes to us, we must not receive him into our house, as a teacher, neither bid him God-speed, or success. It would be well for us all to use diligence in guarding every avenue to the soul against seducing spirits, and those who transgress and abide not in the doctrine of Christ.

Witness for Jesus.

BY S. M. MINNICH.

At a protracted meeting held by the Methodists in our village a short time ago, it was the custom after preaching to have a short season of prayer, or an "experience meeting," in which all professors were invited to participate. At the close of each one's remarks, the pastor would say, "Now another witness for Jesus."

I do not refer to these meetings to criticise or condemn them. It is great folly for any one to stop fighting any of the many, gross sins that are now cursing the world and turn his guns on those who also profess to fight for the Master. I believe much exhortation and prayer are needed, and that all good men, and all good women might advance the kingdom of Jesus by exhortation and prayer in public. But I do think that witnesses should not be called whose evidence is impeached. When a number of good and true men testify that a witness is untruthful, his evidence is thrown out of court. Likewise if a man says he loves the Savior, and it is known that he tattles, lies, and swears, and never manifests love for Jesus outside of the church, his evidence is not only lost, but it is as rubbish upon the testimony of the faithful witnesses.

No, my brother, it is not witnesses that the church needs, but it is soldiers. It is an easy matter to be a witness for Jesus when in the midst of our brethren; but it takes a different character to confess Jesus in the high-ways and by-ways of life. Yes, it takes soldiers to overcome the trials and temptations we meet daily.

Peter drew his sword in defense of his Master, when his brethren were around him; but when left alone, the powerless maid affrights him and he says, "I know not the man." But in time Peter grew strong and did confess Jesus, not only among his brethren, but was willing to die for the faith he had in the Savior.

Oh! that our Father may help each one of us who have named the name of Jesus, to put on the whole armour, that we may fight as soldiers in the camps of the wicked, as well as confess him in the congregation of the saints.

Time Is Short.

Time is short, considered abstractly. It has been computed that a generation of human beings is limited to about thirty-four or thirty-five years. Suppose, however, we reckon on the data given by the Psalmist, that is, three-score years and ten, or even four-score years. What is this? especially when the necessary deductions are made. Childhood and youth will diminish it at least ten years; sleep, one-third, or, twenty years, making an aggregate of forty years. And how much must we reckon as being uselessly spent in sin and folly, which, if possible, had better be blotted out? It will be seen, in this way, that the man of seventy years, really and truly lives only about that period.

The truth that our time is short is especially evident, when we consider the great amount of business that has to be crowded within its narrow limits. Here are the natural, relative, and civil duties of life, besides all the momentous concerns of religion and eternity. On the present, fleeting moment are suspended all the great concerns of an unending existence.

"A moment's time, an instant's space,
Removes us to the heavenly place
Or shuts us up in hell."

Explanation on Matth. 23: 15.

It is to be observed first, that Chist was speaking to the Jews at Jerusalem. Secondly, that the valley of Hinnom was immediately south of the city, where wickedness and idolatry were carried on, and the locality was noted as a place of all manner of corruption and abomination. Thirdly, that all heathens are idolators, and as the Scribes and Pharisees did not teach the doctrine of being born again, there was danger that their converts would become greater idolators than they were themselves.

The name of the valley of Hinom, in the Greek language, is Gehenna, and this is the word which our English translators in Matthew 23: 15, have translated hell. It is sometimes interesting where a particular word is found in a passage of scripture, the meaning of which appears to be distant and hidden, to read over the English and retain the particular word in the Greek. To do so on this occasion would give us the following translation, "Ye make him two fold more the child of Gehenna than yourselves." Ge, in the Greek, earth, land, place, region: the opposite to sea, lake, water; hence; Gehenna, the valley of Hinnom.

The Secret of Happiness.

Kind reader, I do not wish to annoy you with a subject that meets your notice almost every day; and, perhaps, it is necessary to assert that one reason why there is so much said and written on this subject, is the diversity of opinion in regard to what constitutes real happiness. Some people have an idea that riches will make one happy, and inevitably they will, if you adhere to the Savior's admonition in Matt. 9 : 20.

Again, there are many who look to the pleasures of the world for all their happiness. But here, perhaps we had better stop. The angels are weeping. But we feel strengthened by remembering the inspired words, "My grace is sufficient for thee," and, peradventure we may rescue one soul that has fallen from virtue, and then the white-robed inhabitants of heaven will rejoice. Are you, whose eyes trace those lines, aware of how much misery is weighing upon those who even profess to enjoy the benefits of Christianity? Believing that you do know, that "the lust of the eye, the lust of the flesh, and the pride of life," are held dearer by them than the religion of the blessed Jesus, we appeal to you to lend us your influence in staying those evils with which our land is flooded, and in restoring the bliss for which so many sigh.

There are two things that we would require all our readers to do, and then we shall be able to tell you the secret of happiness:

1. Enter into a careful examination of your own hearts, meanwhile laying aside those sins with which it is burdened. No one can be happy while annoyed with sin. Therefore, be sure that you "lay aside every weight, and the sin that doth so easily beset you," so that you may enjoy the sweet fellowship of the sinless One. You are needed to make others happy; for herein true happiness consists. To do this you need to be cleansed from sin. I need not tell you how to go about it. You know what it is to sin. You know what it is to have it in your hearts. You should know, too, what it is to be freed from sin. Then you can approach God as a friend indeed. You will then learn to love him; and never be so happy as when sitting at his feet, with the assurance that your prayers are heard, and answered in saving those whom you wish to see freed from sin.

2. Let the sorrows of others be your own. Then you will be nearer like him who has "born our griefs; and carried our sorrows," Oh! if your hearts were only filled with the love of Jesus. Then you would never be so happy as when winning souls for him. Go to those whom you know to be unhappy. Learn the cause of their sorrow. Is there some bitter sorrow sinking them into the lowest depths of misery? Speak to them of the happiness that results from the purer and higher life, as being the gateway to bliss beyond the tomb. Be sure you do not leave them until you have ascertained the cause of their misery. Then with utmost caution, awaken them to a sense of duty, that they, too, may enter into the work of reformation, without which it is impossible to discover the only secret of happiness.

You might as well try to still the tempest with a single word, as to ask God to make you happy, without seeking the happiness of others. That kind of happiness which will make you happy in prosperity, and miserable in the hour of affliction, is not worth having. And, yet, all the happiness you obtain, outside of Christ and the duties he assigns you, will not be worth a farthing, in the hour of death. If you want to be happier in the last moments of this life, than at any period over which you have passed, delay not a single day to enter the field of Christian duty, and pray God to make you willing to do with thy might whatsoever thy hand findeth to do.

The Old Man in the Model Church.

In No. 5 you published what the popular poet, John H. Yates, had to say about "The Old Man in the Stylish Church;" and now I will send you what I have copied from the Lebanon Courier, what he has to say about the "Old Man in the Model Church."

Well, wife, I've found the model church: I worshipped there to-day:
It made me think of good old times before my hair was gray.
The meetin' house was fixed up more than they were years ago;
But, then, I felt when I went in, it wasn't built for show.

The sexton didn't seat me away back by the door;
He knew that I was old and deaf, as well as old and poor.
He must have been a Christian, for he led me through
The long aisle of that crowded church to find a place and pew.

I wish you'd heard that singin', it had the old time ring;
The preacher said, with trumpet voice, "Let all the people sing!"
The tune was Coronation, and the music upward rolled,
'Till I thought I heard the angels striking all their harps of gold.

My deafness seemed to melt away; my spirit caught the fire;
I joined my feeble, trembling voice, with that melodious choir,
And sang as in my youthful days, "Let angels prostrate fall;
Bring forth the royal diadem, and crown him Lord of all."

I tell you, wife, it did me good to sing that hymn once more:
I felt like some wrecked mariner who gets a glimpse of shore;
I almost wanted to lay down this weather beaten form,
And anchor in the blessed port forever from the storm.

The preachin'—Well, I can't just tell all what the preacher said;
I know it wasn't written, I know it wasn't read.
He hadn't time to read it, for the lightning of his eye
Went flashin' round from pew to pew, nor passed a sinner by.

The sermon wasn't flowery, 'twas simple Gospel truth;
It fitted poor old men like me; it fitted hopeful youth.
'Twas full of consolation for weary hearts that bleed;
'Twas full of invitations to Christ and not to creed.

The preacher made sin hideous in Gentiles and in Jews:
He shot the golden sentences down in the finest pews.
And though I cannot see very well—I saw the falling tear
That told me hell was someways off, and Heaven very near.

How swift the golden moments fled within that holy place!
How brightly beamed the light of heaven from every happy face.
I doubt not I'll remember, beyond life's evening gray,
The happy hour of worship in that model church to-day.

Dear wife, the fight will soon be fought, the victory be won;
The shining goal is just ahead: the race is nearly run.
O'er the river we are nearin' they are throngin' to the shore
To shout our safe arrival where the weary weep no more.

Preaching and Doing.

We are bitterly opposed to, we are disgusted at, those ministers who have said too plainly by word and action, "Do as I say, not as I do." Such a failure have some of their lives been, that many have been forced to doubt that there is such a thing as ministerial usefulness. And unless many of those who are set apart to preach a saving gospel, become more zealous, the cause—the already suffering cause—must perish. Although our thoughts are open to that eye that discovers the secrets of the heart, we feel somewhat reluctant to even hint at those crimes that have been committed by thoughtless and unholy ministers. To some of our readers it may seem a little strange that we speak thus of the minister. But truth is truth, and it is useless to attempt to make anything else out of it. Believing it is high time to "cry aloud and spare not," we shall look boldly into the face of error, and expose it wherever we may chance to notice it, without respect of persons. This wicked and adulterous age admits of no delicacy. We are in earnest. We cannot feel otherwise. With good old David who has said, "As the Lord liveth I shall not hold my peace," we will speak the truth, let it result in what it may.

For my part, I can see but one way to enter into future usefulness; if you please, but one way to become Christ-like, and that is, to possess him, and him alone. Let this be the case, and selfishness will become extinct. Let every minister of the blessed Gospel put his foot upon self, and he will be astonished to see what he has trampled into the dust. He will find himself standing upon a disgusting beast, so exceedingly strong that nothing save the grace of God alone will aid him to keep it in subjection. This beast is the beast of sin, a beast that is found in every human heart where Christ is not. This beast is full of sin. He is frequently termed a devil; sometimes, "an angel of light." What a pity that he is honored with the same title that distinguishes the purest of the spiritual host! But, perhaps, there is wisdom in it. We trust that we are writing for the wise.

If there is anything more dear to you than the precious Jesus, we want you to become tired of it; though it should assume the lovely appearance of an angel. If any other motive prompts you to preach Christ and him crucified than that which prompted Christ to preach, you had better not preach at all.

Once when Christ saw a great many sinners in one vast assembly, he was moved with compassion towards them. Why? Because they were as sheep without a shepherd. Sheep need care, and you know what their condition would have been without a shepherd in that mountainous country. Hence Christ likened those sinners to sheep that have no shepherd. "And he was moved with compassion towards them:" he pities them; he is ready to weep at their unhappy condition. To show his love and compassion for them, he teaches them. He teaches them because he wants them to become like him. Do you teach the people when you find that they are in error? Are you moved with compassion towards them? Do you desire them to become like Christ, or like yourself? or, like both? Some of these questions you may easily answer; others, you may not be able to answer at all. Be careful that you answer the latter correctly. If you say you want your audience to become Christ-like, and not like yourself, something is wrong. To say this is saying too plainly that you have no confidence in yourself as being Christ-like, a Christian indeed. But here, perhaps, we had better stop. Will you charge us with bigotry? Then do it, we can bear it. Truth crushed to earth will rise again. If what we here pen is not appreciated to-day, it may be some other day.

Recently, while talking with a gentleman on ministerial usefulness, I affirmed that no one could be a useful minister, unless he believed that he could do nothing and that God must do all, and that he was willing to give the direct influence of the Holy Spirit. He did not quite understand. He thought we had more confidence in man; but upon further explanation, he found I placed more confidence in the right kind of a man than he could approve of. After telling him that, when a man has once given himself wholly up to God, he will be used as effectually in converting sinners as some of the earlier Christians were in performing miracles, he could no longer coincide with my views. I attributed the work wholly to God; believing that he will work mightily in us to the pulling down of the strong holds of Satan, when—yes, when? while the heart is full of deceit and sin? Brethren, forgive me for asking a question of this kind. I have (if you will allow an apology) asked it with a blush; but the degraded sins that fallen ministers have committed are its cause. They have left a stain that time cannot erase, or memory discard. Can you, aye, dare you think for a moment, that their sermons issued forth from clear hearts? Can sweet water flow from a foul spring? The fact is no man can stand up in defence of God's word and discharge his solemn duty aright while his own conscience is telling him that he is making the least reserve only that he may gratify his selfishness.

Nothing in my estimation, is meaner than selfishness. Away with your selfish ministers. They are worse than useless. They are the ones who have fallen so low. Instead of being so zealous in the cause that the very thought of sin would make them weep, they have harbored the most impure thoughts, gratified their evil passions and lusts, until they have fallen so low that it is a shame for a respectable sinner to be annoyed with thoughts of them.

O ye chosen of God! ye ministers of the sacred oracles of Divine truth! consider well your high calling. Are you pure enough to officiate in it? Or are you still conscious of being so contaminated with sin, that you fear and tremble at the thought of your unfitness? If so, prepare for your solemn duties at once. No one is more unfit to preach Christ than those whose hearts are destitute of his love and purity, let them be learned or unlearned. Are you struggling to get rid of some indwelling sin that is so annoying that it will neither liberate or enslave you? Seek a throne of grace and do not leave it until you have gained the confidence of an approving God. Determine that you will give yourself entirely up into the hands of Him who is able to make you a Christian worthy of the admiration of angels. Determine that whatsoever thy hand findeth to do shall be done with thy might, and in the fear of none save God. Do not think anything bad. Cherish a licentious thought for one moment, and the day may come when you will violate Matt. 5 : 18, and how soon the devil will get you then, God only knows.

We Love Each Other.

Often have I to think of this motto. A pretty thought indeed. If all the people, or even two-thirds of them, could use this motto with propriety, I think the world would be quite different from what it is. Saying alone will not suffice; there should be some fruits, to show that we do love each other. Scripture teaches us that we are to love our enemies. Luke says, 'Do good to them which hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you." 6 : 27, 28.

How did God manifest his love towards us? He sent his only begotten Son into the world, that we might live through him. "Herein is love; not that we loved God, but that he loved us, and sent his Son to be the propitiation for our sins." Brethren, sisters and friends, "if God so loved us, we ought also to love one another" "How good, and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity." Christians have a work to do—a great work.

Union is strength in religious warfare. "United we stand, divided we fall." The great head of the church has provided a principle which binds, nourishes, and consolidates the various members of the body together; for we are all members one of another. If this principle is neglected, the army of the cross becomes easily dispersed. The principle is LOVE.

I remember reading of an aged father, who, when dying, called his sons around his death bed; and to show them the necessity of union among themselves, he commanded a bundle of sticks, which he had provided, to be brought before him. Beginning with the eldest, he requested him to break the bundle of sticks; he could not. The next was called; and so on, down to the youngest; all failed: upon which, the old father cut the cord which bound the sticks together, and they were easily broken one by one. Love is the cord that binds us together. Without love, there can be no good works; and without works, faith is dead.

We read, "By grace are ye saved, through faith." May the Lord add his blessings to what I have written. And my prayer is, and ever shall be, that we keep ourselves in the love of God, looking for the mercy of our Lord Jesus unto eternal life. Yours in love.

The Bottle of Oil.

Once upon a time there lived an old gentleman in a large house. He had servants and everything he wanted, yet he was not happy; and when things did not go as he wished, he was cross. At last his servants left him. Quite out of temper he went to a neighbor with the story of his distresses

"It seems to me," says the neighbor, "it would be well for you to oil yourself a little."

"To oil myself!"

"Yes; I will explain. Sometime ago one of the doors of my house creaked. Nobody, therefore, liked to go in or out by it. One day I oiled its hinges, and it has been constantly used by everybody since."

"Then you think I am like your creaking door," cried the old gentleman. "How do you want me to oil myself?"

"That's an easy matter," said the neighbor, 'Go home and engage a servent, and when he does right praise him. If, on the contrary, he does something amiss, do not be cross; soften your voice and words with the oil of love."

The old gentleman went home, and no harsh or unkind word was heard in his house afterwards.

Every family should have a little bottle of this precious oil, for every family is liable to a creaking hinge in the shape of a fretful and peevish spirit, or an angry temper, or a sullen, sulky disposition, or a stubborn perverse will. Sometimes these are found in the young, the children of the family. Let this oil be always at hand, and it will be found of great service in promoting the comfort and peace of the whole household.

Sinners Invited.

Look unto me and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth for I am God and there is none else. Isaiah 45 . 22.

There is only one God whom we must serve. This God invites the human family very strongly to come to him. "Come ye to the waters, and he that hath no money, come, buy wine and milk without money and without price" We know that there are many gods, but our Father, has taught us that there is but one true God. And so John says, "There are four births, that a man may be born of; but there is but one true birth, that is agreeable with the will of God. Now as there is but one God, let us serve him, and he will grant us a seat at the right hand of glory, and happiness, forever and forever. See what a price he has paid for us! He gave his Son for a redemption for us. Why, if we were to live four score years and ten, we could not pay the half we cost. Yet he gives us all this, and not only this, but life and health, and all the things that we have in this world. And all he wants us to do, is to be obedient to his will, and he will suffer the loss he has sustained in redeeming us.

God has said: "If you are willing and obedient, you shall eat the good of the land; but if you refuse and rebel, you shall be devoured by the Lord, for the mouth of the Lord has spoken it." The spirit and the bride says, come, and whosoever will may come and take of the water of life freely. Yours in love.

Voting for No License.

A few days ago, when the COMPANION No. 7 was handed to me, I found an article under the above heading. I commenced reading it, and before I got through I turned the leaf, and, to my surprise, I saw that it was signed by my beloved brother and especial old friend, J. E. Pfoutz. He says he had read two articles, written by brother Moses Miller and C. G Lint; and then says, "What my dear brethren have written appears to be very plausible and right." But he thinks there is some danger connected with this going to the polls to take an active part in voting with the world.

Is it possible that, if the world undertakes to do a thing which every honest man, woman, and child must, and will confess, would be one of the greatest blessings to our land and country, my dear brother can see danger in giving our aid and comfort to the same, because it is an arrangement of the world. He seems to doubt whether the Spirit of God and Christ will accompany us in so doing, and calls it "strange ground," and cites us to some scripture passages where it is said that we are led by the Spirit of God, and that we are the children of God. He also thinks it would give an opportunity to "throw in an idle word;" and doubts whether a brother can come away as he goes there.

Now I will give my opinion about this matter. Little did I think that I would ever write upon this subject, until I saw the aforesaid article. I was so well pleased with what the afore named brother, as well as some others had said against license, that I did not think it necessary to say more in that direction. They all came out in strong terms against license, and in favor of taking hold of the golden opportunity which is placed in our hands to put down the greatest curse that ever befell any country, and are ready to lay that old prejudice against voting aside when they see that they can do at least some good to their fellow creatures. My dear brother was the first one, and, as far as I know, the only one, that came out in public print to discourage the undertaking. I, for my part, think I can see more danger in letting such an opportunity slip without showing the world that we are in earnest to do all the good to a fallen humanity we can.

Now, about the Spirit of God going to the polls. If we have that Spirit which Christ promised to send to his disciples—the Spirit of truth—which will guide us into all truth, then we will have the glory of God and the welfare of our fellow men at heart; and if such is the case, and we go to the polls in a pure motive, why should not that Spirit go with us? In regard to that idle word we are in danger of throwing in, I would say, if we would avoid every opportunity to speak an idle word, we would have to do as the apostle Paul says, "needs go out of the world." There are many places more dangerous to speak an idle word which are not forbidden to go to; such as, weddings and the market-places. This Christ and his apostles did not forbid, but went there themselves. And there are many other places of business, such as public sales, &c., where there is an opportunity to speak an idle word; so that can be no sufficient excuse for us to stay away from the polls.

The brother says something of praying for those that are in authority. That is right; and I have no doubt that the prayers and groans of hundreds and thousands of poor beaten and worn down mothers, and starving children, as well as every sincere Christian all over the land, have reached the ears of Jehovah, who has now answered them on earth, and put it into the hearts of our legislative body to hand the question right back to the people to say which they will have, the legalized, and, by law, protected hot beds, called drinking saloons, where gamblers, drunkards, thieves, robbers, murderers, and almost every other vice that can be named is manufactured, or whether they will have peace, temperance, virtue, and morality. I think we all, as one man, ought to thank God from the bottom of our hearts, that our prayers are heard, and that the means are put in our own hands to choose for ourselves. Praying for those in authority, and not making use of the means they put into our hands, reminds one of what the apostle James says: "If a brother or sister be naked, and destitute of daily food, and one of you say unto them depart in peace, be warmed and filled; notwithstanding ye give them not those things which are needful to the body, what doth it profit? Even so faith, if it hath not works, is dead, being alone." Just so in praying and not doing. My beloved brother advises those that will go to consider well what they are doing. I would say to those that will not go, consider well what you are neglecting, by refusing to use the means put in your hands to choose a blessing or a curse, life or death, which is now set before you—when you see you sons, or your son's sons, or your neighbor's sons, or your brethren's sons, go down on the broad road to hell and destruction, and your daughters married to such characters, who might be ornaments in society and pillars in the Christian church were it not for these nurseries of vice and misery. In conclusion I would say to the brethren of Pennsylvania, think of this subject, and think again, then act prudently—wisely—in the fear of God, and for the welfare of humanity.

Man a Three-fold Being.

Of all the creatures created by the Almighty power of God, man alone is in possession of a three-fold life: he lives at once in the past, the present, and the future. Man came from the hands of his Creator, a perfect being; upright in all his dealings. God himself declares, that man was created in his own image and likeness, and but little lower than the angels. Hence, I say, he was created a perfect being; but through the transgression, a wilful act on his part, he fell from his primeval, perfect and happy state, and became of all creatures the most wretched and miserable; because he was endowed with a faculty whereby he was permitted to live in the past, and to recall the past and happy state from which he fell. But I fear I am getting off of my subject. I started out by saying, "Man is a three-fold being."

Man lives in the past, through the faculty of memory; in the present, by means of the five senses bestowed upon him by his Creator; viz, hearing, seeing, feeling, tasting and smelling; and in the future, by hope. Thus I have named the three intervals of time in which it appears every rational person lives. I will now endeavor to define these different periods of man's existence; but will, in a measure, treat memory and hope in connection. The former looks backward on what is past; the latter, forward on what is expected and longed for; the former lives in yesterday, while the latter lives in to-morrow; the former watches the setting sun of the past, while the latter salutes the dawning morn of the future; in short, memory wanders, thoughtful and sad, amid the mouldering ruins and withered leaves of the past; while hope, sanguine and light-hearted, builds airy castles in the sky of the future.

Brethren and sisters, and all God-fearing friends, we all have a great deal to do with memory and hope. We have, in fact, as much to do with our memory as the workman has to do with his tools. Therefore we should be anxious to know all about this secret power within our breasts.

However, by the daily use of anything, we get so accustomed to it, that we hardly ever think of stopping to inquire what it is. I fear, therefore, we do not think enough of this wondrous gift of God, its uses, its nature, its blessings, and responsibilities to inquire what it is.

In the first place, then, memory is a historian.

It is a known fact, that every nation has its history. The great and wise men of the nation write these histories. In these histories are recorded every great and notable event that has transpired in the nation of which the history is a record. These writers are called historians. I said, memory is a historian; and so it is. Every human being has a history written of his life; and it is memory that writes our history. Memory sits alone and silent within your bosom; and, with quick, observant eye, watches all that is passing; hears every word; marks every deed; and, with busy hand, transfers it to its secret register. It is not like conscience, telling us everything; but, to the contrary, it says nothing about what it sees or hears; it gives us no sign, either of approval or of disproval; but simply writes everything down.

My dear brethren, who among us is so pure and holy, that he would not shrink, sometimes, if he saw a silent stranger always watching him, a glistening eye always upon him, a quick hand writing all about him? This is what our memory is doing every hour. Day by day it pursues this task. Page after page is filled with the mystic writing; and the great volume grows slowly, but steadily. Each day completes a page; each year, a chapter; and each successive stage in life, a volume of this awful scroll. Sometimes this history is written in faint, dim, lines; sometimes, in broad, glaring, characters; sometimes, in letters of light; and sometimes, of midnight darkness. There are days bright with blessings, and days dark with woe and sin. Just as in our real life, so in this, its faithful register. This, then, must be an interesting history. What tale would be so instructive to us as that which is all about ourselves.

In the second place, memory is a painter.

It does not only make notes of the past, but it also makes pictures of the past. It writes a history illustrated with a great many pictures. It photographs the events and scenes of the passing hour, and preserves them in its faithful volume for evermore. Therefore we have not only the printed words, but the living faces and forms of the men and things we read about. This is the kind of a history our memory is daily writing of us.

Or, might I not say, that our minds are chambers, hung all around with pictures—that memory drew those pictures, and is all the time standing by to explain them, and to tell us all about them? Every one has a great many of these pictures in his heart. Here is your mother's face, which memory has painted on your heart, and which you can still look upon and see her smiling on you. Here is a brother or a sister, although far away in some distant land, and which you may never again see, save in the heart's living pictures. Here too is the grave of your father, and his own fair form, as he lay silent in his coffin before the lid was closed forever. Yes, you can see him yet, by means of this wonderful gift that God has bestowed upon all mankind, namely, memory.

A great many of us have our family albums, containing the faces and forms of those whom we once knew and loved. Let us not, then, forget that each of us has his own, personal album, laid up in the secret chamber of his heart—an album which no hand can unclasp, no eye look upon but his own. Oh! how pleasant it is, sometimes to close our eyes, and in the calm, bright, holy light of the heart, look upon those pictures, one by one!

In the third place, memory is a treasurer.

It is the soul's wise and careful store-keeper, gathering together, from day to day, all manner of precious and useful things, and safely keeping them. Useful facts, wise maxims and rules, precious and holy truths, improving examples, sacred memories of home and friends, and kind, loving looks and words—all these this wonderful faculty catches up and stores away, that they may minister to the blessings of future days.

Thus, by the aid of this wonderful gift, bestowed upon us by the giver of every good and perfect gift, we become truly rich—rich in the treasures and hived stores of the memory; and truly there is no kind of riches like this, except one, and that is better still—to be rich in grace—the treasures of the heart—the treasures of holy feelings and affection. Brethren, are we all rapidly gathering such a treasure? If so, we shall be truly rich.

Lastly, memory is a comforter and a reprover.

It is a most sweet comforter, and a most sharp and terrible reprover. "And how," you would ask, "does it comfort and reprove. „By opening the history which it has written, and reading what is therein written, when one page of the book is finished, it is turned over and another is begun; but the folded page may be turned up again, and laid before our eyes. I have said there are bright pages and dark pages in memory's book. It comforts us by turning up the former; and it rebukes us by turning up the latter.

In view of all these facts, then, I would admonish all my brethren and sisters, to strive so to live that they may have as few of those dark pages to be turned against them as possible. Let us be careful never to do anything which we would like to forget. Let us remember that these dark and frightful pictures, which we would gladly cover up and hide from our sight forever, will not be covered up, but will keep forever turning up fresh before our eyes. The things we would gladly forget are the very things we are most sure to remember. And even though it were possible for us to forget them in this life, there is a day coming when all "the books shall be opened," and when "God shall bring every work into judgment, with every secret thing, whether it be good or whether it be evil."

I started out with memory and hope before me. I have said but little about hope, and my article is already very lengthy; therefore I would merely add the apostle's definition of hope. He says, "Hope is an anchor to the soul." May the grace of the Lord be shed abroad in every heart is my sincere prayer.

Parables.

Parables are figures used to represent truths. Our Lord, in his parables, has taken similitudes from natural things to represent spiritual things. It was anciently common for philosophers to utter their sentiments in parables; and that the prophets made use of parables is very evident from the following passages of scripture: Judges 9: 7, 8, "The trees went forth on a time to annoint a king over them. But the Olive tree said unto them," &c. "Then said the trees unto the vine, Come thou and reign thou over us." 2 Sam. 12: 3 "There were two men in one city, the one rich the other poor; but the poor man had nothing save one little ewe lamb," &c. 2 Kings 15: 9 "The thistle that was in Lebanon sent to the cedars that were in Lebanon, saying, Give thy daughters to my sons for wives."

The mode of instructions by parables was very common in our Savior's time, and he carried it to the hight of excellency and usefulness. In order to understand a parable, observe,

1. It is not necessary that the representation be strictly true, nor that all the actions spoken of be strictly just; because the design of the parable is, not to give information concerning these, but to teach some important truth.

2. We must carefully gather the scope of the parable from what preceded or immediately follows it.

3. Several circumstances may be added in a parable for the sake of decorum, or propriety of speach, that can not be illustrated in the explanation of the parable. We must therefore chiefly attend to the design of the parable itself.

Our Savior spake many parables during his ministry, and most of them are very plain and easily understood. The last few parables are not so easily compreheuded; so I will try to explain them. The first one is the prodigal son.

"A certain man had two sons." Luke 15: 11. This parable may apply to individuals, but it was spoken to the Jews and had more direct reference to them. The father represents God; the son who stayed with the father, represents the Jewish nation; while the prodigal son represents the Gentiles. The Gentiles wandered far from God and were without hope and without God in the world. When Paul turned to the Gentiles and preached the Gospel unto them, and they gladly received the good news, and received the Holy Spirit as well as the Jews, then the Jewish converts were angry and refused to receive them as brethren, or to come into the synagogues or churches and worship with them. Even Peter had to be convinced by a miracle before he would believe that the Gentiles had equal gospel privileges with the Jews. See Acts 10: 34–45.

I will next notice the rich man and Lazarus, Luke 16. The poor beggar lived in the deepest of poverty. Too helpless to walk or even to stand, he was laid at the rich man's gate. He had no other food than the crumbs, perhaps grudgingly bestowed, from the table of the rich man; and no other nurses than dogs which licked his sores. In process of time, death came to his relief; and, perhaps, he was burried with as little ceremony as possible, as is usually the case with very poor persons. The rich man lived in luxury, faring sumptuously every day. To the eye of all beholders his lot was to be envied and that of the beggar to be de pised. But he dies also; and of him it is recorded that he was burried. All that wealth could purchase, all that pride could exhibit of earthly pomp and grandeur, were no doubt displayed at his funeral.

This also represent the Jews and Gentiles. The tribes of Juda and Benjamin remained faithful until Shiloh came; and the two are spoken of as one man. They were indeed rich: to them pertained the priesthood; and their priests were dressed in fine linen, and all that God could lavish upon them was done. They worshipped in the temple, and God was under obligations to them for Abraham's sake. But the Gentiles were very poor. They did not come into the temple to worship, but their place was outside the gate; and when a Gentile woman asked mercy of the Savior, he said, "It is not meet to give the children's bread to the dogs." The woman then only begged for the crumbs which fell under the rich man's table. Then her wish was granted.

The gulf between the two nations is circumcision. "Beloved, I, Paul, say unto you, that if you be circumcised Christ shall profit you nothing." Gal. 5: 2. Here was the great trouble with the two nations.

To be in Abraham's bosom is simply to be in favor with him, or to share the blessings with him; for, if we are Christ's then we are "Abraham's seed, and heir according to the promise."

The five brethren represent the ten lost tribes, who were carried to Babylon by the Assyrian kings, and were never again organized. The two tribes represent one man, and the ten tribes represent five brethren. They had the law and the prophets, which were sufficient to make them wise unto salvation; but they refused to hear them, and Christ said, "If they hear not Moses and the prophets they would not hear though one rose from the dead;" because they testify of him, and when Christ rose from the dead, they did not believe.

The Savior did not wish to convey the idea of immediate punishment after death, or an intermediate punishment between death and the resurrection; but the dead are personified, and made to speak and act in reference to the facts of their respective cases as though they were alive.

Such cases have frequently occurred. The trees held an election and made speeches, Judges 9: 7–11; the thistles propose a matrimonial alliance with the cedars, 2 Kings 14: 9; all the trees sing out at the presence of God. 1 Chron. 16: 33; the hire of the laborers cries to God, James 5 chap.; and the apostle Paul says, God quickeneth the dead, and calleth those things which be not as though they were. Rom. 4: 17.

By this parable the Lord illustates several great truths: 1. the folly and vanity of riches; 2. the worth of true piety, though attended by the deepest of poverty; 3 the certainty of future punishment; 4. the great contrast it will make with the present state of things; 5. the sufficiency of the scriptures to instruct and warn mankind.

My article is already longer than I had intended; but if I can throw a little light on this wonderful parable, then my object is accomplished.

Pious Youth Department.

Dear Companion: The New Year has opened to us—let us begin with its beginning. And here let me say, I can conceive of no better way than in our endeavor to prepare the mind of our youth, through our "Sabbath Schools," for that high estate which awaits the faithful. Had the brethren appreciated fully the beneficial influence of the Sabbath-school, and worked accordingly, they, to-day, doubtless, would number tens of thousands more than they now do. The good work has commenced, many churches have adopted the innovation, and much good has resulted. Let the church stimulate herself to farther action, and with such means as we possess, we shall find our children growing up with strong, vigorous minds, being educated in the most holy faith, when we shall doubtless be blest by seeing them engrafted into the church militant, and with the redeemed, received into the church triumphant, there to praise God forever.

To-day five millions of people on both hemispheres have united in one general plan for the spread of the gospel, through a grand international Sabbath-school medium. The plan is to prepare a series of lessons running through a term of seven years. The object to build up a class of teachers equal to the age in which we live. The lesson for to-day by the "International Bible Society," is on the Creation. Gen. 1: 26 to 31. A most beautiful and instructive one. Why may not the brethren engage in this movement, and march shoulder to shoulder with these five millions, who are endeavoring to build up Zion's kingdom?

Here let me say, that I have seen many efforts to build up a Sabbath-school fail, for want of a proper leader, few having been educated in our church for the calling. The teachers, too, are rarely qualified for this important duty. By this movement, a Bible lesson, suitable for all Christians, will be given out, with the proper method of presenting questions, with proper answers printed. The teachers and scholars study and digest the lesson through the week, and on Sunday they are prepared. These lessons are prepared by persons well qualified for the task, and with a view to suit all Christians, who are zealous in the good work.

Now my dear Companion, can't you engage to promote this good work, by publishing in the Youth Youth department, weekly this series of Bible lessons. Always of course publishing the lesson one week before it is to be used.

Some may cry: another innovation in the church. Well if it is for good, so much the better. I have in my mind one case, in which the parents of a family, the father a minister, was so strongly opposed to the introduction of the Sabbath school into the brotherhood, (a very zealous and good man all believed who knew him) that they would not allow their children to attend the Sabbath-school. The children grew up to man's estate, spending Sundays in hunting and fishing, and some said in amusing themselves at card playing. Evidently the Sabbath-school was the better place for that family. I will try to send you a copy of first lessons for your inspection and opinion.

LESSON 1.

THE CREATION.—Gen. 1, 1, 26–31.

Commit to memory, verses 26, 27.

1. In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth.

26. And God said, Let us make man in our image, after our likeness: and let them have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over the cattle, and over all the earth, and over every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth.

27. So God created man in his own image, in the image of God created he him; male and female created he them.

28 And God blessed them, and God said unto them, Be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth, and subdue it: and have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over every living thing that moveth upon the earth.

29 And God said, Behold, I have given you every herb bearing seed, which is upon the face of all the earth, and every tree, in the which is the fruit of a tree yielding seed; to you it shall be for meat.

30 And to every beast of the earth, and to every fowl of the air, and to everything that creepeth upon the earth, wherein there is life, I have given every green herb for meat: and it was so.

31 And God saw everything that he had made, and, behold, it was very good. And the evening and the morning were the sixth day.

Glance at the earth—this chapter tells how God fitted it for man—at first all was a waste. III. Look at our race—God purposed to make man—"us" indicates three persons in the Godhead. (1) Man's nature—like God—power of choosing; (2) his place—head of creation; (3) provision for him—fruits and herbs; (4) his happiness—innocent, pure.

Precious treasure thou art mine,"

"I sing the mighty power of God,
That made the mountains rise."

1. What is the meaning of Genesis? of Pentateuch?

2. What is the Bible chiefly designed to teach?

Unquietness is the greatest evil that can come to the soul excepting sin. For as seditions and civil discords of a commonwealth ruin it entirely, and disable it to resist a stranger, so our heart, being troubled and disquieted in itself, loseth strength to maintain the virtues which it had gained, and with it the means to resist the temptations of the enemy, who at that time useth all kinds of endeavors to fish (as they say) in troubled waters.—De Sales.

For the COMPANION.

Are We Brethren?

We, as a church, to some extent are known to the world by the title, "Church of the Brethren." Jesus, our Master, said to his disciples "Ye are brethren." We call each other brethren. There is no doubt that Christ's followers should be brethren, in the true sense of the word. As the true sense of the word. As brethren in Christ, we must stand on an equal platform; we must all work together for the advancement of the Lord's kingdom We must not think that, perhaps, as God has favored us more in some respects, than others of his children, therefore, we are set to rule over them. Again we must not think that, just because others are more favored than we are, they must do the work, and still we expect to reap with them in common the wages of their labor. No, brethren, we, who claim to be the body of Christ, should remember that each of us has his or her share of work to do in order to win the day. Let us consider this matter carefully. We all expect to inherit eternal salvation. This we can only obtain through Jesus our Lord. He offers it to us on certain conditions; viz, obey God's will as revealed by him. This will insure salvation in eternity.

To make it possible for all to obey God, Christ has established a church, by which the teachings as well as the practice of the gospel may be continued. This, the church of Christ, it is claimed by some, is composed of all Christian organizations. Well, let this be as it may, we know that Jesus said to his followers, "Ye are brethren;" and as brethren of the one family, children of the same parent, members of the same household, we must work; not work blindly, but work carefully, or we might get astray and work for the destruction rather than the building up of that church, organized for the good of all men.

Brethren, let us be careful. Do not try to hurt each other's feelings. God wants us to be in unity with himself and among ourselves. If we are born of God, surely we will do our utmost to live in peace. It is Satan who sows discord among the children of God. Let difficulties rise like mountains; let Satan tempt us; let his angels fight the church of God; but for our own good, and for the sake of the precious blood spilt on the cross, let us stand united; let us show to the world that we are at peace among ourselves. Look at a family living in peace. Look at the child whose feelings seem to be hurt. If a good child, will it retaliate? Oh, no. It may tell the parents of the sorrow it has been caused, the tears it has shed; and, if not able to bear all alone, it will ask the interference of the good father or mother. If this is the way in which children will settle their troubles, why will we not do like they do in this respect? If we have troubles to settle, which we are not able to settle among ourselves, then let us ask our heavenly Father to interfere and settle them for us. Let us remember we are brethren. We all know it creates sorrow, when parents must see that their children are a war among themselves. On the other side, you may behold joy and happiness, when there is peace in the family. Do you not think, then, that God will rejoice when his children are at peace among themselves? God is love, and where he rules there is happiness all around.

Again, the poet says:

"If Christians can't agree below,
What will they do above?"

Let us remember this. We certainly do not expect, that in eternity, God will keep us in separate apartments from those whom we do not like to have in our company. He will not, like the high and rich in this world, favor only a part of the true children of God. Look, for a moment, with an eye of faith, into eternity. Behold there the Lord's people. Do you see disunion, strife in short, the workings of the evil spirit? Oh, no, dear brethren and sisters, we behold love, union, peace, joy, and all what is pleasing to God. Think, for a moment, for the sake of gaining a certain point in this world, will we barter our souls? is a question, which concerns us all. Then, if we are sincere in our religion, as we all should be, let factions arise; let waves of trouble roll high; let Satan employ all his skill, and what will it all amount to? Will it divide us? will it create disunion in the church of him who has said, "The gates of hell shall not prevail against it"? No certainly not. But what is the duty of those who are the followers of God, when these tribulations come? Is it not our duty to be careful in all our actions, in all our talk, in all that we undertake, that we, by all, show that Christ's spirit dwells within us? We dare not flinch to the right nor to the left; but keep on straight ahead—keep Jesus for our eye-mark, the gospel for our guide; and if we then miss our aim, if we then go astray, brethren, the religion of Jesus is not what it was intended to be. But let us be careful that we are right, and God will accomplish much for us.

To live in peace, as brethren should live, will strengthen us; it will give us employment; it will give food, nourishment, and all that is necessary for the inner man. O brethren, how strong we feel; when we live in peace with those around us; when we can greet our brethren, with a clear conscience! How we prosper when we work together, and God works through us! Look, for instance, at the family where union and love exist. The father commands, the mother explains, the children obey, and all prospers. So in our case, let God command, the church explain, and we, the children of God, brethren of Christ, members of his church, let us be obedient in all things, and surely God will accomplish all which he designed to be accomplished through his church.

Again, the house of the family where love reigns, is very attractive. I have often thought about this. I do not believe, that it was through the enticing speeches of our old brethren that the church increased as it did; but, by showing to the world that they were in love, the attention of outsiders was attracted and the church made to increase as it did. Well may it be said, "United we stand; divided we fall." This is certain, if we are united as a church, follow closely our dear Lord, we will gain the victory; otherwise, we may fail. May God help us to do our duty in all things, is my sincere prayer.

A SMILING FACE AND A KIND HEART.—Which will you do—smile and make your household happy, or be crabbed and make all those young ones gloomy and the elder ones miserable? The amount of happiness you can produce is incalculable, if you show a smiling face, a kind heart, and speak pleasant words. Wear a pleasant countenance; let joy beam in your eyes, and love glow on your forehead. There is no joy like that which springs from a kind act or a pleasant deed; and you will feel it at night when you rest, at morning when you rise, and through the day when about your business.

If life to you is not all you will have it, seek to make it better and more enjoyable yourself.

Duty of the Hour.

"Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might, for there is no work, nor device, no knowledge, nor wisdom, in the grave, whither thou goest."—Eccl. 9 : 10.

The writer of the above also tells us that there is a time to every purpose. And it is the design of this article to admonish us to discharge every duty, in such a manner, time, and place, as will best serve its purpose. For there are duties, which, when discharged at their proper time, will result in an abundant reward; but which, if neglected, or performed out of season, will be irretrievably lost. Seed may be sown in harvest, but a crop cannot be gathered from such sowing. Seed time and harvest each has its own season. Seed time is first; harvest follows. "Whatsoever a man sows that shall he also reap."

It is, however, not so much of the duties of the season of the year, or of attention to temporal labor, that we wish to speak. It does not appear to us to be so necessary. "The children of this world are, in their generation, wiser than the children of light." In temporal matters people act more wisely than they do in spiritual matters. And herein they manifest much weakness; for they are eager to possess that which is base, while they neglect that which is good and which abideth forever.

But not only are men negligent of that which belongs to their own interests and happiness; but those whose business it is to labor in the vineyard of the Lord, often neglect the opportune season to perform that labor. It may be that no one is more remiss in the matter herein alluded to, than ourself. These are duties that have burned in our heart, and frozen in our hands. Others were lost between the heart and the hand. Therefore we include ourself in the admonition.

We are to "pray for all men." There is therefore a time to pray, and persons to pray for. No class of persons, perhaps, are more frequently prayed for than the poor. This is all very right. We should remember the poor in our prayers. But there is also a time when praying for the poor will not be the duty of the hour. Upon this point James says, "If a brother or sister be naked, and destitute of daily food, and one of you say unto them, Depart in peace, be ye warmed and filled; notwithstanding ye give them not those things which are needful to the body, what doth it profit?" Prayer, and words of peace and encouragement are necessary, and have their appointed time, place, and order; but they may not be substituted for food or raiment. In the case of nakedness or want, then, it is the duty of the hour to supply clothing and food. That our hands would find to do, and we should do it with our hearts and wills. "Whoso hath this world's good, and seeth his brother have need, and shutteth up his bowels of compassion from him, how dwelleth the love of God in him?"

Dear reader, this is an important quotation of Scripture. It is equivalent to saying the love of God cannot dwell in a brother who would see his brother suffer from want, when he had the means of relieving him, if he would not do it. We have often been reminded of this passage during the long and severe winter, that, we hope is just coming to a close. Let us always bear it in mind when we make our prayers for the poor, that our hearts may be prepared to direct our hands—liberally—to meet the duties of the hour.

Weak Handed.

On Friday last, brother Beer and his family left their home, for a visit to their old home in Armstrong county, according to previous announcement. They will likely remain absent for about a month or more. Brother Beer is needing this recreation, to regain his steadily declining health. We sincerely hope the brethren and sisters, among whom he may sojourn, will remember this fact, and not require anything of our brother that would in any way interfere with his personal safety, or the improvement of his health. We make these remarks knowing how eager the many of his friends will be to have him labor for them. Hope they will give him every assistance to recuperate, so that he may speedily return, for he is a necessity to this office.

For the past ten days, we have also been deprived of the services of sister Buechley, another of our editorial assistants. She has been quite severely afflicted, so that we had almost despaired of her life. But we are happy to announce that she is convalescent, and we have hopes that in a week she may be able to join us again in our labors. In the meantime will not our contributors remember us, and all our patrons resolve to bear with our shortcomings?

SCHUYLKILL, PA., February 17th, 1873.

Brother Henry: Yesterday was very unfavorable for meeting, and I remained at home. At first I felt a little sad at the disappointment, but I soon fell to reading the C. F. C., reading over the last two numbers; and it is wonderful how much they improved upon a second reading, on a leisure day. I then remembered that on a similar occasion, I did likewise, and then, as now, found deeper interest and higher appreciation on the second reading. This reflection followed, that the C. F. C. is not a paper to be read as a common newspaper, and then thrown by, but ought to be read, as we read the Bible, prayerfully, and at seasons set apart to that purpose. And where there is a family, or part of a family, who will listen attentively, selections should be marked to be read to them. I fondly hope all will attentively read those pieces in number 4, urging brethren to vote No License; especially all non-voting brethren. And that poetry selected by brother Silas Thomas, will well bear re-reading. It is a picture fearfully true.

And that lesson for young men, I would call special attention to. How valueless are parts, education, or wealth without moral culture. Valueless did I say? yea, a very curse. Those three individuals had better grown up in extremest poverty, and ignorant as Hottentots. Natural parts, education and wealth, are looked to as blessings. And, indeed, they are to be desired, when sanctified by true morality. But oh! how fearfully they augment the misery of the morally corrupt. Under the patronage of Fisk, Stokes recovers his lost fortune. Each has a family. Their pecuniary prosperity becomes the curse of their families. Stokes finds in Mansfield a paramour, who however thinks Fisk's great wealth an object, and hopes to divide her favors with such skill and secrecy as to avoid detection. But the legitimate sequence of such conduct follows. Fisk sunk into eternity—Stokes to the gallows, and Mansfield now suffering the torments of hell, already on earth. The richest gifts of this life are health, physical strength, parts, education, and wealth; and may we add beauty as a blessing (too often it is a curse), all combining to produce degradation, misery, death, eternal death. Oh, young men and young women, may I appeal to you, early to seek that moral culture which is in itself of inestimable value, and which enhances every blessing of life; and even converts afflictions of life into blessings?

Perhaps some of your readers, brother Henry, have read of the Philosopher's stone, the vain dream of the Alchymist. Could they have turned the baser metals to gold, what profit! Iron is worth more than gold to humanity. But in the religion of Jesus we truly find what enhances every blessing of this life, and turns the sorrows of life into everlasting joys. Oh, that all would come and seek the pearl of great price.

That beautifully expressed piece of Adrian to the "Heralds of the Gospel," headed, "The Gospel" you failed to mark with the proper credit. And therefore leave the many to believe it thy production. Only thy express word for it, could convince me, if that is the authorship. It is the nearest perfection in its truthful advice, and sententious composition of any thing I now remember reading. A very gem of literature, as well as concentrated truthful advice. To his we however, I would, at the cost of the brevity and beauty of expression, make it read, "A present salvation, which is salvation, by living faith, working by love, purifying the heart unto obedience, as the condition of justification.

Brother Parker's "Why is it," and "Following afar off," by brother Kob, did richly pay a re-perusal. "The Scriptures" by brother Schrock, I am not qualified to judge of, but would remark that the translation I prefer, was published in Philadelphia, in 1842, for David Bernard, by J. B Lippincott. The word immersion prejudiced the mind of the people so much, and worried Mr. Lippincott I suppose, for he told me that he had melted down the plates. I was sorry; Many sentences are simplified, untranslated words translated into plain English, without in the least changing the meaning from the text in the King James' translation; such as, "prevent"—go before, "do you to wit"—inform you; "Bishop"—overseer; &c. I am sorry that the plates are destroyed, and not a copy can be found. I wanted a copy for our meeting-house, a few years ago, and failed to find it, except that I was offered a chance to get a second-hand one, in Calf, for 15 00, the original cost having been $4.50.

But I am making my piece too long, or I had intended to say to brother Blouch, better let that subject alone, it has long been a mooted question. I do not see that our faith either way affects our salvation, whichever side be the error, I do not see that it is a dangerous error.

And one more line I feel to add. That beautiful piece, clear and truthful, of brother Flory's, spoiled by the last sentence. Oh, how that sentence grated on my feelings. I felt to bear a testimony against the manner of expression. It might have done for the apostle Paul—not for one of us.

I. PRICE.

An Exhortation.

"Therefore my beloved brethren, be ye steadfast, unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, for asmuch as ye know that your labor is not in vain in the Lord." 1 Cor. 15: 56.

This was Paul's letter to the Corinthian brethren, exhorting them to be steadfast in the hope that was set before them, of eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord. But it not only applies to the Corinthians; it also reaches us at this present time. Let us therefore be engaged in the work of the Lord. There is a great work for us to do. Let us then be up, and a doing, while it is called to-day, for the night cometh, when no man can work. Some may inquire what the great work is, that we must do. I would say: the great work of the Lord is to keep his commandments, walk in his precepts, deny the world, and the flesh, have your thoughts fixed on heavenly things, pray daily, and hourly to him that is able to deliver you from the snare of the wicked one. Run the Christian race as it is laid down in the holy Book, the Bible. Let the world know by your walk and conversation, and your conduct, that you are a Christian indeed and in truth. Let your light so shine before man that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven. Also love your enemies, do good to them that hate you. Follow not after the fashions of this world, and worldly lusts. Flee the wrath to come. Stand unmovable in the work of the Lord. Flinch not at the trials and temptations of the world, but fix your eyes heavenward, and ask the grace of God to overcome the temptations, trials and difficulties of this life and to guide and direct you to that mansion of eternal felicity—to that house not made with hands eternally in the heavens.

My Christian friends, I would exhort you as Paul did; stand steadfast in the hope set before you, and finally you will reach that happy shore where sorrow, pain, and death, never can come; where all the final faithful shall find a home prepared for them from the foundation of the world. There you can sing praises to the Lamb which has gone to prepare that place for you. Finally be faithful unto the end, is my prayer.

"Who will Answer?" (See No. P. 62)

1. Matt. 11:11.

We read of four different births in the Bible, and Christ refers to two of them in his verse. The one is the fleshly birth, the other the spiritual. Christ's kingdom is a spiritual one, and the weakest and most ignorant (if it is expedient to use the term) of those who are born of water and of the spirit knows more of the righteousness and peace of God, and joy in the Holy Ghost, and of the fullness of the blessing of the gospel of Christ, than the greatest or most enlightened of those that were merely born of flesh. John the Baptist could say more than all other prophets, in that they prophesied that Christ would come, but John that he was then among them; but as he that eats an apple would receive more benefit from it than one who merely sees it, so the new born child of God, or he that is least in the kingdom of heaven, is greater than John the Baptist. The kingdom of heaven has its various stages. Here there is no reference to its consummation in the future world. Now we know in part, but then the prophets, as well as we, shall know even as they are known. It is true the prophets prophesied much of Christ, &c., but according to Peter they understood not all of them. Read 1 Peter 1: 10-12. The pronoun referred to in the query has an assumed antecedent—the name of one born of God.

2. The Jews put a wrong construction on Malichi 4: 5. They know that Elijah had ascended to heaven; and according to their tradition, they expected that same prophet, Elijah, to come again before the coming of Christ. And it is said that even now some of the Jews open their windows during a thunder storm, expecting that Elijah would come. But according to Luke 1: 14, such never was and never will be the case. Elijah and Elias have both the same meaning, namely, God the Lord, the strong Lord; and as John was to go forth "in the spirit and power of Elias," the prophet spoke of him by using the title in his prophecy. John knowing that the Jews had such an erroneous view of the prophecy, was right when he told the Jews that he was not that Elias whom they expected. John did not say that he was not the Elias referred to by the prophet, but that he was not the prophet Elias whom they expected to come. When Christ said, "This is Elias which was to come," he meant that John was the Elias referred to in Malachi 4: 5, and not the one whom the Jews expected would come, that is, Elijah who ascended to heaven.

3. "Why durst they not ask him any more questions?" They feared that Christ would again confound them as he had so completely done. Christ did not forbid them, but their bitter judgment did.

4. John answers this query in full in 1st John 2: 19: "They went out from us, but they were not of us; for if they had been of us, they would no doubt have continued with us; but they went out, that they might be made manifest that they were not all of us." We read that "when the sons of God came to present themselves before the Lord, Satan also came among them;" but thanks to God, that while Satan has attacked the church from many positions, the gates of hell have not yet, and never will prevail against the church.

5. We do salute all but do it as the Bible instructs us. The brethren with a holy kiss, and the friends by name. Read 1 Thess 5: 26, and 3 John 14 &c. There is more than one way of saluting; but when we know whom we salute, we are not left in the dark how to salute them. If these reflections are not satisfactory, I hope there is no harm done. After having examined them, hold fast only to that which is good.

DEAR COMPANION: I wish to say to our friends in different localities, that my dear wife is sorely afflicted with cancer. She has two running sores now, and five tumors more that are likely to open, if she lives long enough; but from the indications now, she can not live long any more. She is so weak that we must lift her up, when she lies down; and she can not rest any more. So, brethren and friends, remember us at a throne of grace, is the prayer of your unworthy brother and friend.

NOAH B. BLOUGH.

St. Clairsville, Pa.

From Beaver Creek, Md., Feb. 22nd, 1873.

Brother Henry: For your satisfaction, and that of the church at large, I will give you a little news from the Beaver Creek congregation, Md. We had from twenty-five to thirty additions since harvest. In the early part of the winter, there was a move made by persons outside of the church, to get brother Grabill Meyers to come and preach at Fahrney's meeting-house. After some time I told them that the brethren were not likely to come, unless invited by the church. So we named it at the next appointment, asking the entire congregation whether they would wish a meeting of a week or ten days, with the understanding that the expenses and time of brother Meyers, and some other brother, whom he might choose, be defrayed. In a few minutes all agreed, and the arrangements were made.

Brother Meyers made the appointment for his arrival to be on the 14th of Feb; but missing connections, they did not arrive until the 15th. This was a day of great sorrow to many of us, on account of two funerals taking place at one time and in our graveyard; and just two hours before we left the house of mourning, another one of the same family was laid in the cold embraces of death; and in four hours after one of our neighbors children died. This made two more funerals, at one time, at Fahrney's meeting-house. By consent of the friends, brother Myers addressed the congregation with much interest. Brother James A Sell, his companion, followed by making some very appropriate remarks. The brethren labored day and night while with us.

Now our meetings are closed. Four young sisters were baptized on last Sunday. Notwithstanding the day was very cold, they followed their Captain through the flood. The word of God was sown broadcast among us, and the day may not be far distant when we shall see the fruit of it.

On last Tuesday, the 25th, I had a message to attend another funeral in Funkstown; but when we arrived at the appointed hour, word came that the funeral would have to be deferred until next day; stating that another boy of seven years had died between the hours of nine and ten o'clock in the morning. These two brothers, one 4 years and eleven months, the other 7 years and 3 months, were sons of brother Simon and Catharine Miller. Disease, measles. They were both laid in one coffin. The sight was truly solemn. Brother Sell addressed the congregation with much interest; and by way of comfort pointed the parents to him who can support them in all their affliction. The services were concluded by a brother.

Our meetings were largely attended. The last night was one that many of us will never forget. Brethren, sisters, and friends all crowded around the table, shedding tears; and with trembling hands bade our brethren farewell. Our love has become stronger and our union dearer. May God lead us all safely through the journey of this troublesome life, and at last permit us again to meet each other around His throne. Our prayer to God is, that the brethren may have a safe journey, and find all their loved ones in good health; and we still ask them to remember us in their prayers. Amen.

ANDREW COST.

EARLHAM COLLEGE, IND.

BROTHER HOLSINGER: Being deprived of the society of the brethren, I feel like taking at least one of our periodicals, and the COMPANION especially proving such an interesting, as well as instructive companion, while at home, when I was, as it were, continually under the dropping of the eaves of the sanctuary, I feel assured that it will be much more highly appreciated when I have not the advantages of obtaining information I then had. Truly we know not how dear our brethren and sisters are to us, or how much we enjoy their society, until we are separated from them.

I thank God that we can approach one common mercy-seat, with one mind and one heart, and pray for and receive the blessing of the Holy Spirit, as a comforter in distress, and a directer in the path of truth and holiness.

The Lord help and direct you in the good work, is the prayer of your humble sister.

SARAH G. KELLER.

To Brother J. H. Moore.

Brother, we have all the volumes of the Gospel Visitor on hand, from 1853 to 1871; but some of the volumes are not full. I have been giving some of them away; and I wish to keep a few, the rest you can have. I charge nothing for them. Just come and get them; you are very welcome to them.—Last year and this year I have been taking no paper but the COMPANION. I like the Visitor very well, but it came only every month, and that is too long; and to have so much reading on hand we might forget the Book of all books, "The dear, blessed Bible, which lay on the stand." Yours in the Lord, Funeral occassion improved by brother Henry Gephart, from the words, "Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not; for of such is the kingdom of heaven." Mark 10: 14. The occasion was impressive; and though one of their children is gone, four yet remain to mourn the loss of her that has taken her leave.

It was on Sunday between 12 and 2 o'clock, when she and two of her sisters started to walk over to brother George Hestand's, the distance of about one mile, and when nearly half a mile from home, walking on the railroad, being a little ahead of the other two, she turned around and said, "I can't go any farther; I am sinking down;" and thus she sank away and never spoke another word. By the help of Samuel Yoder and his family, she was carried home, and in about five minutes died. Sister Polly was the companion of brother Samuel Leer, who departed this life some twenty two years ago. They came from Montgomery Co., Ohio, in the year 1830, in the early settling of this part of the country. Two of her sons remained with her, during her widowhood, who, with their wives, spared no pains to make mother comfortable. During her sickness, her many kind neighbors assisted them day and night. Her sufferings were intense for over six weeks. On the 7th of Jan. she stepped on an outdoor stoop, slipped and fell, breaking a limb near the hip joint, which prostrated her. Afterward Typhoid Pneumonia set in, all of which she bore with great patience. She was, for about 50 years, a worthy member of the church, and was truly a mother in Israel.

The Christian Family Companion. Is published every Tuesday, at $1.50 a year, by Henry R. Holsinger, who is a member of the Church of the Brethren, sometimes known by the name of "German Baptists," and vulgarly or maliciously called "Dunkards."

The design of the work is to advocate truth, expose error, and encourage the true Christian on his way to Zion.

It assumes that the New Testament is the Will of God, and that no one can have the promise of salvation without observing all its requirements, that among these are Faith, Repentance, Prayer, Baptism by trine immersion, Feet Washing, the Lord's Supper, the Holy Communion, Charity, Nonconformity to the world, and a full resignation to the whole will of God, as he has revealed it through his Son Jesus Christ.

So much of the affairs of this world as may be thought necessary to the proper observance of the signs of the times, or such as may tend to the moral, mental, or physical benefit of the Christian will be published, thus removing all occasion for coming into contact with the so-called Literary or Political journals.

Subscriptions may begin at any time.

The Friend of the Bridegroom.

The customs in regard to marriage, among the Jews, were very different from that with which we are familiar. "In the first place, the choice of the bride devolved not on the bridegroom himself, but on his relations or on a friend deputed by the bridegroom, for this purpose. Occasionally the business of selecting the wife was kept in the hands of a friend. The selection of the bride was followed by the espousal. In the interval between the betrothal and the marriage, the bride lived with her friends, and all communication between herself and her future husband was carried on through the medium of a friend deputed for the purpose, called the friend of the bridegroom. After the marriage the bridegroom enters into direct communication with the bride, and the joy of the friend was fulfiled at hearing the voice of the bridegroom conversing with her, which he regarded as a satisfactory testimony of the success of his share in the work."

Considering these preparations and ceremonies, previous to a marriage among the Jews, how touching and beautiful appears that comparison of John the Baptist in which he compares himself to the friend of a bridegroom. When he hears that many are coming to the baptism of Jesus, he rejoices to know that the bridegroom is in full communication with his bride—the Church. Though he knows that his own glory is passing away, and his influence with the bride decreasing, yet he rejoices to know that he had done his work faithfully and well, and that Jesus is increasing.

The account we have, in Scripture, of John the Baptist, is not very full, but now and then we catch such glimpses of the life and preaching of this more than prophet, that our desire is increased to know more concerning him. How often in reading the Scriptures, we feel a desire to know more than the writers have told us. Shall we ever know? Perhaps they will tell us more when we meet them in the world to come. Sometimes by close study we can find more, than we at first think, is revealed. Perhaps it would not be unprofitable to study the life of John the Baptist, even though we should find out nothing new. We are told that his parents both belonged to the family of priests, and both were righteous before God. Zacharias, his father, was ministering in the temple, about holy things, at the time the angel made the announcement that he should have a son. His lot was to burn incense while the people prayed without. He seems to have been praying himself, and his prayers, with that of the people, ascended up before God, at the same time with the smoke of the incense. Zacharias received an immediate answer to his prayer. The angel said to him: "Thy prayer is heard, thy wife Elizabeth shall bear thee a child." The angel named the promised son, and informed Zacharias what his son's mission should be—"to make ready a people prepared for the Lord."

From the fact that Hebron was in the "hill country of Judea, and a city belonging to the Levites, we conclude that John was born there. The circumstances attending his birth, some of them being miraculous, were much talked of—"noised abroad throughout all the hill country of Judea, and fear came on all that dwelt about there." They wondered what manner of child this should be. We are told "the child grew and waxed strong in spirit;" then there is a long interval in which he seems to pass from our view; but surely not entirely from the view of those that know the circumstances attending his birth. At that time all men were in expectation of the appearance of the Messiah, and they would naturally watch the career of the son of Zacharias with much interest. He dwelt in that thinly peopled portion of country called the wilderness of Judea. We do not suppose he mingled much or freely with his fellows, neither was his life entirely that of a recluse. Perhaps a description of his character, at this time, would have been that he was an eminently pious Levite, much in communion with himself and his God, dwelling in retirement, and only going up to Jerusalem at the stated periods to worship. One whom many supposed would be a great prophet, or perhaps the Deliverer himself. By virtue of his priestly descent, he would have been entitled to an office in the service of the temple. We have no idea he ever claimed that right. He had a higher office to fill—to prepare the bride for the reception of the bridegroom. He was not like Samuel, prepared for his mission in the house of God. Not in the presence of the high priest, amid burning sacrifices and smoking incense, was he sanctified to do the work as friend of the bridegroom? but in the solitude of the desert, in communion with God and nature, he was made meet to be the harbinger of Christ. He seems to have had revelations direct from God. We infer this from what he said when telling his disciples that he knew not that Jesus was the Christ. He says: "I knew him not; but he that sent me to baptize with water, the same said unto me: Upon whom thou shalt see the Spirit descending and remaining on him, the same is he which baptizeth with the Holy Ghost."

He first began to preach in the wilderness, where he was raised; from there he passed north to Bethabara on the other side of the Jordan, where he first baptized. He preached "the baptism of repentance for the remission of sins." Soon it was noised abroad that the son of Zacharias was preaching, and crowds flocked to hear him, insomuch that it is said, all Judea and Jerusalem went out and were baptized of him in the Jordan. His preaching, to those multitudes that came to hear him, evinces his boldness for truth and righteousness, as well as humbleness of mind. He claims nothing for himself, but everything for the One that is to come. He himself is simply "the voice of one crying in the wilderness," and baptizing with water; "but he that cometh, shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost and fire: Whose fan is in his hand, and he will thoroughly purge his floor, and gather the wheat into the garner; but he will burn up the chaff with unquenchable fire."

He boldly cries out to them: "O generation of vipers who hath warned you to flee from the wrath to come?" Such preaching, evidently with authority, had a startling effect, causing men to repent, and to muse in their hearts whether this was the Christ or not. We have reason to believe that king Herod was among those that came out to hear him. He boldly reproved Herod of sin, and his preaching had such an effect on him that "he did many things" toward a reformation of life. John had been preaching and baptizing sometime before the great event of his life occurred—the baptism of the Messiah. Jesus comes from Galilee to the Jordan, passing over as the rest had, finds John at Bethabara, and applies to him for baptism. John at first refuses. His words would indicate that he felt himself unworthy. "I have need to be baptized of thee, and comest thou to me?" Here again we have evidence of John's humility. He freely baptized all that came to him, but when Jesus, his own cousin, comes, he feels unworthy. Jesus being the most righteous person he knew, and probably having heard of the circumstances of his birth. John may have suspected that he was the One to come; but he had not yet received the sign, and before that was given he had no authority to receive any one as such. Jesus answers his objections: 'Suffer it to be so now: for thus it becometh us to fulfil all righteousness. Then he suffered him." And Jesus coming up out of the water, John now received the promised sign, and he knows the person standing by his side, is the one he had been preaching, the one whose shoes he was not worthy to bear, and yet he had just baptized him, as he had every one else. How John's soul must have been filled with awe and wonder, to see the heavens open and the Spirit, in a bodily shape, descending on the head of the person he had just immersed under the water, and hear a voice saying, "This is my beloved Son." We have no account that one word passed between them after the baptism, or that any one else was present. Jesus passed immediately out of John's sight into the wilderness, remaining forty days. After the temptation he returns to John who is still in Bethabara. The day previous to his return, messengers came from the Jews at Jerusalem unto John to ask who he was. He answered, "I am not the Christ," but he could not point out the Messiah to them, he had gone away, perhaps he knew not where; but tells them he was among them and they knew him not. The next day John seeth Jesus coming unto him, and saith: "Behold the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world!" This is he of whom I said: "After me cometh a man which is prefered before me." Again the next day being with two of his disciples, and looking on Jesus as he walked, he said: "Behold the Lamb of God." Here, for the first time, the bride is introduced, by the friend, to the bridegroom. She, in in the person of the two disciples, immediately leaves John and follows Jesus. The record says, the next day Jesus went into Galilee, and the third day he worked his first miracle. We have no account that the bridegroom and his friend ever met again. John leaves Bethabara and goes to Enon, on the west of the Jordan where he still baptizes. Sometime after, having offended Herodias, the wife of Herod, he is thrown into prison where his disciples visit him, and report the works of Jesus. His gloomy prison life seems to have worked on his faith, and black doubt broods over his soul. Perhaps John, in common with his countrymen, supposed the Messiah would be a temporal conqueror and would take possession of the throne of his father David; instead of which he hears of him traveling around, followed by twelve obscure men, doing the work of a great physician, rather than that of a mighty prince: or he may have wondered that the bridegroom would suffer his friend to languish in prison, and this may have caused him to doubt. He probably feared his own judgment had deceived him, not that Jesus was a deceiver. At a time when Jesus was working many miracles, he sends two of his disciples to ask: "Art thou he that should come? or look we for another?" Jesus directs them to again report his works to John. He gives him no other proof than what he had given all the Jews, namely his miracles; but sends him this message: "Blessed is he, whosoever shall not be offended in me." Blessed were they who could lay aside all pre-conception of the Messiah, and accept him as he was in his humiliation. We are not told what effect the message had on John; but of course his faith was renewed. When the two disciples had departed, Jesus speaks to the people concerning John, and draws a comparison between his humble life and that of those who wear soft raiment and dwell in king's courts. But notwithstanding his humble life, he tells them that "among those that are born of woman there is not a greater than John; but he that is least in the kingdom of heaven is greater than he." How are we to understand these contradictory words? The angel that made the announcement to Zacharias that he should have a son, declared "he should be great in the sight of God." Not a greater among men, great in the sight of God, and yet the least in the kingdom. How strange! Perhaps the best solution of this problem is that John in his own estimation was the least in the kingdom. Just as Paul was less than the least of all saints. We call Paul the great apostle, but he considered himself not worthy the name of an apostle. The humblest are the greatest in the sight of God.

Herodias' vindictive spirit not being satisfied with the imprisonment of John, laid an artful plan to procure his death. When Herod was having his birth day feast, Herodias' daughter danced before the company, and so amused and pleased the king that he made an oath to give her anything she might ask, even to the half of of his kingdom. She, being instigated by her mother, requested him to give her the head of John the Baptist. Though Herod was exceeding sorry, yet for his oath's sake he would not refuse her, but sent and had John beheaded in prison, and his head was brought in a dish and given to her, and she carried it to her mother. Because John had reproved Herod for marrying her, Herodias had a deadly hatred against him. When she had his head before her, all gory with his life's blood, she surely had her revenge. Thus ignominiously perished the "friend of the bridegroom."

How mysterious to us sometimes appear God's ways in dealing with his most righteous servants. We would have thought John deserved to be carried bodily into heaven by a whirlwind, as Elijah was, in whose power and spirit he had come. But God tells us he sees not as we do. John's disciples having heard of his death, came and took up his headless body and buried it, "and went and told Jesus." How dark and tragical were the closing scenes of John's life! But the very last scene seems like a gleam in a dark cloud. "They went and told Jesus." Some of John's disciples clung to him while he lived, even though he was in prison; but when they had buried him they turn to Jesus for guidance and comfort. Wonder what words of consolation he offered them. Perhaps the same he offered Mary and Martha: "Thy Master shall rise again." What a beautiful example do these disciples of John furnish every christian, to carry their troubles to Jesus, and ask for guidance and comfort.

"Charge It."

A simple little sentence is this, to be sure, and yet it may be considered as one of the most insidious enemies with which people have to deal. It is very pleasant to have all the little commodities offered for sale in the market, and it is sometimes hard to deny one's self of the same, when they can be obtained by just ordering them and saying "Charge it." But this habit of getting articles, however small the expense may be, without paying for them, keeps one's funds in a low state most of the time. "I have not the money to-day, but I should like the article very much," says a young man who, happening into a store, sees something which strikes his fancy. "Never mind," says the gentlemanly clerk, "you are good for it." 'Well, I will take it and you may charge it." And so it is that small accounts are opened at one place and another, till the young man is surprised at his liabilities; which, though small in detail, are sufficiently large in the aggregate to reduce his cash materially when settling day comes. In many instances, if the cash was required, the purchase would not be made, even had the person the money by him; but, to some, getting an article charged does not seem like parting with an equivalent. Still, when pay-day comes, as it always does, this illusion vanishes, and a feeling is experienced of parting with money and receiving nothing in return.

A Perfect Law.

There is a perfect law, to which to resort in settling difficulties and offenses. There is but one perfect law, while there are many to the contrary. And how strange, yet how grand, that, no difference how small the offense, it cannot be perfectly settled, and the parties really satisfied, unless this perfect law is applied. And no difference how great the offense, or of what nature, if the parties commence and continue with this right law, the wrong will soon all be made right, and peace and union again be restored, from the fact that they have done what was required of them. We believe there never was, and never will be a difficulty, or an offense, really and perfectly settled unless the parties come down to this perfect rule, or law that Christ gave us.

We all have to admire such a perfect law.

I have known parties to labor hard in trying to settle difficulties, in some other way than the right; but they could not accomplish a reconciliation until they came down to this perfect law of right, and then the trouble was over at once, and they could be true friends, instead of enemies. I have felt the wonderful force, as well as "balmy" touch, and soothing influence of the application of this perfect law of Christ. But imperfect, or mortal law has a contrary effect, for I have also felt the pangs of anger, and of a ruffled indisposition to yield one inch when an imperfect law was trying to be enforced No mortal could have gotten up such a perfect law, with such power and influence that can eradicate evil, and place love in its stead. But Christ knew of what kind of material we are composed, therefore he knew what kind of a law to give us. How grateful then, we should, be as offenses will come, that we have a perfect law to resort to, in order to cause a reconciliation. Let us try to live so that when done here on earth, we may be seated in the happy world where there are no difficulties, consequently no use for laws, is the wish of your unworthy sister,

From Father to Son.

One day a young man entered a merchant's office in Boston, and, with a pale and careworn face, said, "Sir, I am in need of help. I have been unable to meet certain payments, because certain parties have not done as they agreed by me, and would like to have $10 000. I came to you because you were a friend to my father and might be a friend to me."

"Come in," said the old merchant, "come in and have a glass of wine."

"No," said the young man, "I don't drink"

"Have a cigar, then?"

"No, I never smoke"

"Well," said the old gentleman, "I would like to accommodate you, but I don't think I can."

"Very well," said the young man, as he was about to leave the room — I thought perhaps you might. Good day, sir."

"Hold on, said the merchant, "you don't drink?"

"No."

"Nor smoke?"

"No."

"Nor gamble, or anything of that kind?"

"No, sir, I am superintendent of ——Sunday School."

"Well," said the merchant, "you shall have it, and three times the amount if you wish. Your father let me have $5,000 once, and asked me the same questions. He trusted me, and I will trust you No thanks—I owe it to you for your father's trust."

"Raise the Fallen, Cheer the Faint."

Much is in our power to raise the fallen, to cheer the faint, and broken hearted, if we would put forth our hand. Many, very many would accept our proffered aid, and would make every effort of their own to extricate themselves from the depths they have almost unconsciously fallen into, however deep. Our help, with their own, would make the task much lighter. There is hope for the fallen, as long as we do our part.

It is thought to be following the rules of etiquette, to shun and despise, to trample under foot and slander, those who have unfortunately fallen into disgrace and shame: but it is not. We may abhor the deeds that are evil; yet, at the same time, we should love that soul—that immortal soul—that must live through an endless eternity.

We must "speak gently to erring ones;" smile upon them in tenderness and pity; let them see and know that our sympathy is aroused in their behalf. If those means will not restore them, their case is indeed hopeless. But if we would keep them in the miry pond of despair, it can also be accomplished, by treating them as we have described in above, in following the rules of etiquette.

How often could we dissipate gloom, and, in its stead cause a radiant sunbeam to shine, by a soft pressure of the hand, a pleasant smile, a kind word, or a small gift as a token of affection. How many that are pining away beneath the damp shade of disgrace and ruin, could we easily cause to rejoice in the sunshine of happiness, and weep with joy in the light of restoration. A soothing, whispering voice, zephyr-like, can softly push its way through to the dark and lonely cells of the heart, and cause sweet refreshment there. Those who are in the possession of light, should not prohibit that light from shining forth to lighten the way for others, who may be lost and wandering far from home and God. By seeing the light and hearing an inviting voice, they may be constrained to return. We all have opportunities to raise the fallen, to cheer the faint. Let us work while it is day: for the night cometh when no man can work.

"Speak gently to the erring ones:
Ye know not all the power
With which the dark temptation comes,
In some unguarded hour."

TOBACCO.

BY SILAS THOMAS.

The earth was cursed for Adam's deed,
And briar, thistle, poison-weed
Are part of her production;
Hence man from bad must cull the good,
And thus secure a wholesome food,
Or eat to life's destruction.

And as the devil sows his tares,
Among the wheat all unawares;
So he is ever watching
To make God's gifts and blessings vain,
By planting in their midst some bane,
Both hurtful and debauching.

Infatuation deep and strong,
Which no inducement has but wrong,
Involves a sad condition;
It proves St. Paul's assertion true, (2 Tim. 2 : 26.)
Of men led captive to pursue
The enemy's volition.

This plant, of such enormous use,
The touch of which is an abuse,
'Tis thought by very many,
At first grew in the Southern soil,
Without much culture, skill or toil;
Its worth was scarcely any.

The primal use of this foul herb,
Does perfect, robust health disturb,
In nausea nomanclature,
No word describes the sore distress,
Or can the urgent "go" express
Of outraged, madam nature.

Should her stern protest be o'ercome,
And nicotine thus steal a home,
Inside the human portal;
Its work seductive oft is slow,
But in the end may strike a blow,
To haste the death of mortal.

Come blush, oh man, and hide thy face,
Whilst we the shameful history trace,
Of this vile, bane production;
It gives not health, but shattered nerves;
It drains thy purse and never serves
For welfare or instruction.

Perhaps, to stop musquitos' raid,
While seated in his wigwam's shade,
The "red man" fell to smoking:
And thus at first he used "the weed,"
In soft-stone pipe, or cob and reed,
The "pests" thereto provoking.

Long years gone by, the "pale face" bore
Tobacco to the old world's shore;
At first the people snuffed it, *
But soon the savage custom aped,
And for themselves the pipe they shaped;
So then in smoke they puffed it.

When doctors, kings, and priests had seen
The bad effects of nicotine,
They published their researches:
Pope Urban VIII proclaimed a bull,*
To excommunicate in full
Those snuffing in the churches.

King James the first, in high bombast, *
Did send abroad his "counterblast"
Against tobacco smoking;
Compares it to the stygian fumes,
And the position strong assumes,
It is God's wrath provoking.

When he the direful fuming saw,
The Russian Czar proclaimed his law, *
"Cut off the smokers' noses."
The sultan, most indignant grew,*
So all the puffing Turks he slew,
And thus their "pipes" he closes.

But the result is very plain,
That all these stringent means were vain,
To stay the dire delusion:
The flood-gates now are open wide;
The poison, dark, narcotic tide,
Flows on with scant intrusions.

Increasing tons o'er all the world,
Are raised, and on the market hurled;
Consuming dolts demand it:
Why thing in taste and smell so vile,
Should many millions' mouths defile!
Oh, who can understand it?

Who walks our paves, beholds the trace
Of fouling stain on lips and face,
Of hundreds that are "chewing."
Around the heads of hundreds more,
The smoky jets curl o'er and o'er,
Caused by incessant chewing.

With "quids" and "stumps" our streets are strewn,
But with the sight familiar grown,
We cease to be astonished:
By playful youth, by "wrinkled eld,"
The black and foul refuse is swelled;
Yet few appear admonished.

The virgin snow, the marble white,
Display to all the loathsome sight,
Of blotching, poison juices.
O sick'ning thought! such beauty stained
By filched supplies from nature drained!
Through her own chary sluices.

In land or town, where'er you go,
You see the same salival flow;
Caused by tabacco's uses:
Upon our public, iron ways,
You meet the like unchanging phase,
Of vile, uncouth abuses.

A "smoking car" to ev'ry train!
This fixture makes exceeding plain,
That habit is despotic:
There drunken boor, and dandy "sweet,"
Upon one common level meet,
And use their loved narcotic.

The fumes combined of smoke and rum,
Make this a car, like horrid slum,
In stench the most ungrateful:
Your lungs expand for purer air;
You rush upon the platform bare,
To quit a place so, hateful.

If lady sometimes chance to seek,
A seat inside this car of reek;
Unknown its dedication;

* Historical facts—see Zell's Encyclopedia.

And comes within, its loathsome smells,
She cries out "filth" and near in "spells,"
Leaves with precipitation.

And does the Christian smoke and chew?
Alas! professing hundreds do!
A truthful accusation:
This fact is plain where'er you go,
Or we would gladly answer no,
To make a vindication.

E'en some of puritanic creed
Do snuff, or smoke, or chew the weed,
The Dunker and the Quaker,
All sects and churches, gay or plain,
Must own the foul tobacco stain:
Except perhaps the Shaker.

One fact is evident and sure,
The teachings of our faith are pure,
And lead to holy doing:
The sequence then is very plain,
That all who would faith's end attain,
Must shun great wrongs pursuing.

Then every one should learn to know,
From whence the inspirations flow.
Of traffic in, and using,
The herb that never can be food:
Which causes evil, but no good:
Hence are God's grace abusing.

Along our streets you pass by scores,
Nay hundreds, of tobacco stores:
In windows and show cases,
The half nude nymph and naiad queen,
With other doubtful prints are seen,
With smiling am'rous faces.

The Christian's faith does not demand,
That he cut of his own right hand,
To check this crying evil:
But use that hand to cast away,
And never to his mouth convey,
The tempt plant of the devil.

No License.

The intelligence from all parts or the State, showing the interest the citizens are taking, and the preparation they are making to secure the vote of the people, is encouraging, and we of Lebanon county should not be idle in this good work. The question, Will you vote? is one far more important than at any political meeting. We pray you to consider the question well, whether the drink trade of this State shall be continued or suppressed. We see the effects every day. It involves the temporal and eternal welfare of men, women, and children. Can we be guiltless if this opportunity passes unused by us, in behalf of morality, peace, and common good, for by acting in support of the license system, the flood-gates of iniquity are kept open, and the streams of liquid death are still poured out upon the community. Consider what good we have ever known to come to the user of strong drink. Have such become wiser men, more devoted Christians or better citizens? Have they thereby become better husbands or fathers better farmers or mechanics? Would we employ such in our business in preference to the entire sober? Has any good, in our recollection, come in our neighborhood from the sale of drink? Consider on the other hand the lives you know that have been sacrificed by drink. How many men within the circle of our acquaintance have become impoverished? How many families, who in starting in life had good prospects, have become blighted and broken up? How many separations and divorces of husbands and wives? How many children bound out at a tender age? stores closed, farms and homes sold by the sheriff or assignee; children not fit clothed, prisons and poor houses crowded with victims of strong drink! In short, how much of human misery and distress have we known caused by the drink trade?

How will we escape the responsibility except by voting against license.

D. Hostetter.

Drunkenness.—Oh how many homes are made wretched by vile liquors, and happines and love destroyed forever. Oh ye husbands who are given to intoxicating liquors, you know not how many tears fall from the eyes of your broken hearted wives. In vain the gentle wife pleads with the reckless husbanp. She goes unheeded. Many precious souls are going to destruction by the destroying cup. Many men who were once pure and noble, with a true companion at their side, have gone downward, and are hurled to ruin. Oh think of the homes you have blighted, oh husbands, and give up the maddening cup.

The drunkard with tottering pace,
Comes reeling home at night;
His weeping wife stands trembling by,
How grieved at such a sight.

Voting License.

Since I wrote the article under the heading, License or No License, published in No 3, a number of brethren have made use of my name in their articles for publication, to which I have no objections whatever. I approve very much of what brother D. Keller said in No. 6, on the subject of voting. I would by no means have any one to understand that I have changed from non-voting to voting, in a general sense. But I do hold as truth and right, generally lie between the two extremes. So it does in the case of voting. Brother Pfautz, in No. 7, says, "yet I shall not dictate whether brethren shall go and vote or not." Then he advises to consider 1 Cor. 3: 16; Rom. 8: 14–16.— Well, brother Pfautz, I have done so, and I find in the context of the former, that Paul found the Corinthians divided, and not much spirit there; and charges them of being "carnal," and hence the question. Know ye not that ye are the temple of God,and that the Spirit of God dwelleth in you?" In the next verse Paul says, "If any man defile the temple of God, him shall God destroy." This might have been more bearing than the other, if there is anything to defile us. That will depend upon how we behave when we are at the polls. Webster gives defile: "To make unclean; to render foul or dirty; to be foul; to pollute; to corrupt." I cannot see more danger at the polls, of becoming unclean, or foul, or dirty, or polluted, or corrupted, than at many other places, where brethren go.

Brother P. says, "It is an arrangement of the world." I say the many public sales, the brethren have, and attend, and the markets which many brethren like to attend, are also arrangements of the world, as much as the elections are. Paul tells us that the "powers that be are of God." So if the latter is for a good purpose,God may have a hand in it.

And as to Rom. 8: 14, 10, and where brother P. asks: "Will the Spirit of God and Christ go with us to the polls?" I answer where ever duty leads us, there the Spirit of God will go with us, and if I am not mistaken the very thought of doing good unto our neighbor comes from God.

Some years ago there was an arrangement made, brother P. might call it of the world, but we believe it to be of God. And in the late war, when the first draft was to come off in Pennsylvania, the brethren generally made use of it. There were days set for the different districts, and all who had conscientious scruples could meet the proper officers, and thus become exempt from the draft. I went for one, had my name erased as a minister of the gospel. By an urgent request of the commissioner I stayed nearly all day, and helped,not only my dear brethren to get exempt, but others who professed to have scruples, and although it was not done by putting two or three words in at a window, or some other place, but by a strict investigation and then an affirmation, yet I have to hear the first brother say: "you were on forbidden or strange ground," or to inquire: "did the the Spirit go with you?" But I think I hear a voice say: "Self-interest had something to do in that, therefore the brethren suffered it." I saw no wrong in it.

Again, our brethren in annual council, have granted the privilege, where members suffer loss by a railroad, or turnpike, passing through their property, to petition for damages. Here we must also come before an arrangement of the world. No wrong in it, if we are not already wrong.

Brother P. is also afraid, if a brother goes to the polls, "he might throw in an idle word, and some neighbor might persuade him to vote for township officers." To this I must say, if a brother has not a mind of his own, and knows for what purpose he goes he had better stay at home. But as I have had some slight acquaintance with brother P., for 45 years, I think we should be old enough to be able to let our light shine wherever duty bids us go. And when I said, "This is no political question," I did so because there are drunkards among, Republicans and Democrats,and even break line and get into the church sometimes. And if you will refer to the journal of Legislature of 72', you will find that men of different parties have voted for the "Local option."

Our annual councils have generally advised: "Better take no part in political elections," which counsel I respect as much as any one. But the brethren have never made voting a test of fellowship, that I know of. The first query which I have in possession on the subject, was in 1813. when our Nation had war with Great Britian, and as a non-resistant christian people, could not advise to vote men in office to carry on the war. Yet in time of peace many of our dear old brethren thought, under a republican form of government, it was not wrong to vote. And I do know that 25 and 30 years ago, in some districts, all the officers of the church did occasionally vote, and although I have not voted, either at general or township elections, and with my brethren sometimes advised better not, yet in this case I think it a duty, if I am spared, to cast my vote with what I, with many others advised to use our influence in favor of.

Some of my private correspondents with brother Pfautz, say: "Pray for it." Have we not prayed for many years, for wise legislation, and for good laws? And what do our legislatures do? They throw the responsibility on the people. And I would have to say with Paul: "I am a citizen of no mean city." He claimed to be a Roman, so I claim I am a Pennsylvanian, in the relation I stand to the government or "Powers that be," though I profess to belong to the kingdom of Christ. So now there are two laws on the statute, the one is: the people shall say whether license is to be granted, and if the majority say "against license," then the court shall grant none. How will we be neutral? As we often say: "Silence gives consent."

Whilst thinking on this subject I am often made to think, that our legislators acted in this matter, a little like Pilate, in the case of Jesus and Barabbas. Pilate knew very well that Jesus was innocent and Barabbas guilty, so he throws it on the people: "Whom will ye, that I shall release, Barabbas or Jesus who is called Christ?" I have never learned of any that were neutral in this case. We all know what the cry of the wicked Jews was. And we have an account of Joseph, in Luke 23: 51: "The same consented not the counsel and deed of them." He must have raised his voice in some way or another, and there is no fault found with him. So our legislators throw it on the people to decide whether they will now have what your brother Miller, with many others have prayed for, namely to bring about a plan or law to stop this great evil. Or will we still have it, to go on? I have lived for 40 years, not over one mile from the tavern and had a chance to see a little, and hence I would much rather find my dear brethren to write or speak to us and warn us of taking too much part in encouraging or aiding the drunkard, by taking a glass of ale, or wine, or something stronger. Tell them "you cannot drink the cup of the Lord and the cup of devil's." And although I have said to no one, go and vote, yet I would like to have liberty for myself and others, as their conscience may dictate. If I go, I ask only with a few words to give us the law which is made, and I help to make no law or place any one in power. And by so doing help to take the temptation out of the way of many who can not govern themselves. A number of drinkers say: "If it was only put out of the way we could quit it.

And to the law being perfect, this we cannot expect all at once. Every reform must have a beginning. Half a loaf is better than none. If there is not something done soon what will become of our people? "If thou forbear to deliver them that are drawn unto death, and those that are ready to be slain; if thou sayest, Behold we know it not, doth not he that pondereth the heart consider it?" See Prov 24: 11, 12. "Let us do good unto all men." Gal. 6: 10. "Be ready to every good work."

"Intemperance, like a raging flood,
Is sweeping o'er the land;
It's dire effects, in tears and blood,
Are traced on every hand.

It still flows on and bears away,
Ten thousands to their doom;
Who shall the mighty torrent stay,
And disappoint the tomb?

Almighty God, no hand but thine,
Can check this flowing tide;
Stretch out thine arm of power divine,
And bid the flood subside.

Dry up the source from which it flows,
Destroy its fountain head;
That dire intemp'rance and it's woes,
No more the earth o'erspread.

MOSES MILLER.

When Joseph's brethren were leaving him to return home, he kindly and wisely said to them: "See that ye fall not by the way." How comfortably and pleasantly would brothers and sisters, friends and neighbors, live together if they were to remember and follow this excellent advice.

Winter will not Last Forever.

Winter will not last forever,
Spring will soon come forth again,
And with flowers of every color,
Seek the hillside and the plain;
Lambs again in fields be sporting,
Birds re-echo from each tree,
Winter's gone; its days are ended,
We are happy—we are free.
Hedge and tree again be budding,
Again with leaves be covered o'er,
Winter will not last forever,
Brighter days are yet in store.

Sorrow will not last forever,
Brighter times will come again,
Joy our every grief succeeding,
As the sunshine after rain;
As the snow and ice in winter,
Melt at the approach o' Spring,
So will all our cares and trials,
Joy and peace and comfort bring,
When the heart is sad and drooping
Think though you be vexed and sore,
Sorrow cannot last forever,
Brighter days are yet in store.

To Sinners.

Come, careless sinner, come to-day,
The Lord our Savior still invites;
Come, careless sinner, come in time,
The Lord awaits you, and is kind.

Come, careless sinner, to your God,
Ere you must sleep beneath the sod,
He stands inside the portal door,
Where all things are in ready store.

There golden chains, and living ties,
That never rust and never die,
There waters flow, that never dry,
In yonder heavens, above the sky.

There Jesus dwells, and angels sing,
The praise of Christ, the Lord, their king,
Their seraphs play, on harps of gold,
That never fade and ne'er grow old.

There shining ones, that you have seen,
Who infants on this earth have been,
Now sitting by the throne of God,
Proclaiming Jesus Christ their Lord.

Justification—Sanctification.

In the 4th No., present volume, Brother Bosserman wishes to know what we are to understand by certain words found in the New Testament, such as just, justice, justify, justifyer justification. And sanctify, sanctified, sanctification. I understand the words justice, just, justly, to mean the same thing, and every one has it in his own power, to fill the definition of those words. That is to act honest, deal fairly, and squarly, between man and man. In a theological sense, to be honest and upright, with ourselves and our God. The words justify, justified, and justification also mean, the same thing the first two words, are used in the past, present, and future tense. In a moral point of view; to be justified by law, in any legal course of pursuit; to become compensated, for our time and labor. In a theological point of view, to become justified by the law of God. It will justify the sinner, at all times to forsake his evil persuits, and seek after God's grace and holiness. "For God is the justifier, of the ungodly," not in his ungodly deeds, but in forsaking them. The word justification, meaning the same as those above but always referring to time of the act, or the process of becoming justified. The words, sanctify, sanctified, sanctification, are synonomous terms with the above.

Brother Bosserman wishes to know the difference between justification and sanctification. I claim that sanctification is a higer state of perfection, than justification. The sinner may pass through a state of justification, so much so that he feels that God has accepted of him, and that his heart is purified from sin, and that he now is a fit character, to receive the holy sacraments, namely: Baptism, the Lord's supper, and the holy communion. But ah; here he stops; he concludes, he is justified by faith, no need of water baptism. The baptism of the Holy Spirit, is all that is necessary. Here the poor penitent tries to flatter himself, with his justification, that God has blessed his soul with good, and thus he does not go forward in those good works, which God hath before ordained that we should walk in them, and consequently he does not become sanctified, not being fully set apart by the order, or command of high heaven, for the service of God.

We are to be sanctified through the Spirit, which Spirit is to lead us into all truth, and bring all things to our remembrance whatsoever the Lord Jesus hath said. As long as the penitent is not initiated into the fold of Christ, by baptism he is not fully lead by that Spirit by which we are to become sanctified.

"Who Shall be Able to Stand?"

Since the creation of the world, there have been great and mighty changes. When man was placed in the garden, the world then was pure. All animated creatures were peaceful and lived in subjection to man. The earth yielded her increase to the benefit of man and beast. Soon that eventful time, the fall of man took place, sin, with all its lusts had dominion over the once happy twain in the garden. They now have to leave their happy state, must live by the sweat of the brow. The world becomes populous, the good and the bad grew up together; sin grows and finally predominates, but in due time the Lord instructs his servant to construct an ark to save the faithful few, from an impending, awful flood. The people were timely warned of their impending danger, but the deaf ear was turned against all the earnest exhortations from his servant Noah. "Times are as they used to be and we see no danger. Noah is regarded as a foolish man, building an ark on dry land. What foolishness they thought; but the Lord remembered the few faithful children who endured the sneers and scoffs of a wicked and gainsaying people, and in due time he poured out his wrath in a deluge of water, and the whole human family perished, save the eight souls whom the Lord secured in the ark. Notwithstanding the curse upon the earth by Adam's transgression, it now is measurably pure. God is now honored and adored for the miraculous provisions made for the escape from the deluge. The beasts and fowls are now permitted to leave the ark. Noah and family came forth and go abroad in the land. Generation after generation is born, and the world soon becomes populated, and wickedness begins to abound, though the truth is propagated and upheld by the christian people. The venerable patriarchs teach strict obedience to God, yet the great Ruler of the universe sees, in order to redeem fallen man, a second great change must be brought about. Seers have predicted a change; a Savior of mankind is to appear. The angels from heaven descend and cry "The Savior is come, glory to God in the highest, peace and good will to men." The mighty change is now effected, a new law is now given. The law and the prophets were until John, but now Christ is preached. Christ was here upon earth, lived, bled and died, ascended up into heaven, and is now sitting upon his mediatorial throne, pleading for dying sinners. By his own word he will return again to earth; but not as before, a gentle lamb in the humble manger, but mighty in power, taking vengeance upon them who know not God. The heavens shall be divided as a scroll. Christ and his innummerable company shall appear; then will the sinner and ungodly cry unto the "rocks and mountains to fall on them and hide them from the face of him that sitteth upon the throne and from the wrath of the Lamb, for the great day of his wrath is to come;" and in the language of our text: "who shall be able to stand?"

A third great change is now looked for by the humble followers of Christ. A change has been effected about every two thousand years, and the nineteenth century is fast approaching, and the coming century may usher us in the advent of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ. "As it was in the days of Noah, so shall it be in the day of the coming of the Son of man," and who, when reading the Scriptures, and comparing the present with the time of Noah, can deny but that they are parallel. The great day of his wrath may soon come, and then "who shall be able to stand?" Some of the scientific men of the day claim the world has underwent great changes, and will in the future. Generations will be born and pass away, and so on to all eternity, thus encouraging the sinner in his idea that the "Lord delayeth his coming." So they claimed in Noah's time. They scorned the idea of a deluge, yet in spite of all opposition it came and destroyed them. So it shall be when Christ comes "without sin unto salvation." The sinners will say "I don't believe any such doctrine," and will go on in this mad career until it will be forever too late. Then the question of our text will be answered. Those who have been faithful to God and have obeyed him in all his commandments will be able to stand. We must not only be hearers of the word, but doers of the word. Faith alone is the order of the day, by a great many. Recently we heard a minister in the pulpit say, that "works would not avail us, but have faith in the Lord Jesus and he would cleanse us from sin;" thus leaving the work for Christ to do himself. Oh my dying friends, faith and works are inseparable. We must have faith in God and put into practice what he teaches us. Had Noah exercised faith only in God that he would save him and his family, and would not have went to work to prepare the ark, would he have been saved? If we have faith only in God and not act, work in his cause, and do what he commands us, will he save us? O no. Not the hearers only but the doers will be justified. The Revelator says, "Blessed are they that do his commandments, that they may have a right to the tree of life, and may enter in through the gates into the city." Showing forth unto us, in positive terms, that we have to work and put into practice what we hear from God out of his word, and observe all his holy commandments, that we may have all done, and be able to stand, when that great and notable day of the Lord shall come.

Brethren and sisters, let us all do just what the Lord tells us. Let us have faith in all his commandments, let them be never so small. Do just what Jesus says, and then we will never be misguided, but will be led in paths of pleasantness, because in the path of duty. Let us all live up to our christian duties and privileges, that we will not in that great day, be of that number that will have to call upon the rocks and mountains to fall upon us to hide us from the Lord; but that we may be able to stand, and hear that blessed voice of our loving Savior: "Come ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world."

A generous man can use sarcasm,—it is the scorn felt by a true nature for what is base; but a sneer has always a vein of the ignoble in it, and a sneer at a fallen accomplice belongs to natures of the lowest grade. Some find it hard to face the serpent's hiss of hatred, but here is something worse to endure,—its hiss of scorn. Better by infinite meet the ridicule of sinners for not joining them while we have a good conscience, than end by being subjected to their taunts when we feel they are deserved.

For the Companion.

Different Degrees of Glory.

There is an article in Companion number eight, with the above heading, written by sister Sophia Wissinger. It always makes me feel glad to see the name of sisters in our periodicals. It shows that they, too have the cause of Christ at heart. I perfectly agree with our sister, that there are different degrees of glory in heaven; but I do not believe that those who are in a less degree of glory will know that there are others that are in a higher degree of glory. I believe that each one will be as happy in his own sphere as if he were the happiest. There will be no room given to envy the position of those who are in a happier degree of happiness. Envy was once in heaven, but will never get there again.

But I think the first passage of Scripture sister Wissinger calls our attention to, is quite a wrong one to prove that there are different degrees of glory. Matthew 5: 19, certainly does not prove it. Those who break one of the least of the commandments, and teach men so, will never get to heaven. Such will be called and regarded, by those who are in the kingdom, as the least deserving of glory; but those who do them and teach them, shall be called or regarded, as deserving the greatest degree of glory. To break one of the commandments is bad enough; but to teach men so, is a great sin. The next verse makes it plain. The Scribes and Pharisees were continually breaking the commandments and teaching men so; therefore, the Savior says, "Except your righteousness shall exceed the righteousness of the Scribes and Pharisees, ye shall in no case enter into the kingdom of heaven."

I would not have undertaken to correct our sister, if there were no good, moral people, that take this for a post to lean upon. They say, "It matters little whether we keep these little commandments or not: we will get to heaven at any rate; and we will be satisfied with our situation, even if we shall be called the least in the kingdom of heaven." I do hope our sister will receive this in the same love in which it is written.

Motherhood.

My neighbor's house is not so high
Nor half so nice as mine;
I often see the blind ajar,
And though the curtain's fine
'Tis only muslin, and the steps
Are not of stone at all;
And yet I long for her small home
To give mine, all in all.

Her lawn is never left to grow—
The children tread it down;
And when the father comes at night,
I hear them clatter down
The gravel walk—and such a noise
Comes to my listening ears
As my sad heart's been waiting for
So many silent years.

Sometimes I peep to see them
Seize his coat, and hand, and knees,
All three so eager to be first,
And hear her call, 'Don't tease
Papa.' The baby springs;
And then the low brown door
Shuts out their happiness, and I
Sit wishing as before:

That my neighbor's little cottage
And the jewels of her crown
Had been my own. My mansion,
With its front of freestone brown
Its damask and its Honiton,
Its lawn so green and bright,
How gladly would I give them
For her motherhood to-night.

The Teaching of Languages.

The teaching of modern languages in our colleges is too elaborate, simply because there is not time. The teachers are often like a man who walks backward half a mile, in order to get a start for a leap over a ditch which is directly before him. Students are kept drilling away on the grammar and on elementary principles until the time is up and the train is starting. It may be said that a contrary course is superficial. Of course it is! But what would you have? It is this or nothing. Besides, it is not superficial in an odious sense. It is simply devoting the little time students have to the language, instead of the key to the language. This kind of teaching has been tried, and tried advantageously. Probably no teacher of modern language has been more successful than the poet, Professor Longfellow, of Cambridge. Thoroughly educated himself, and having spent years with the best masters and in the best society abroad, he condescended to be useful as a professor, and we have heard from those who know, that this method was extremely simple and practical, and entirely different from that of teachers who think more of themselves than of their pupils. When he took up French, for instance, with the class, he made a few statements as to pronunciation, and then read a sentence which the students read after him. The progress, after several weeks of this practice, would be considerable. Accent was acquired as the child acquires it by the ear. As to translation, he did another shocking thing, and that was to advise his pupils to have a good translation and to use the dictionary and grammar as they needed them; that is, the language was to be studied, and not the keys to it. These latter were to be used, as they were needed, in unlocking the former. The memory was not to be cumbered and loaded with rules, and exceptions, and definitions, but the latter were to be sought for as they were required, and when the student could appreciate them. All this was perhaps superficial, and even absurd, but it was eminently successful, as all aver who know his method of teaching.

Intemperance.

In a late number of the Contemporary Review, Herbert Spencer combats the idea that inebreity is on the increase. He describes the time when men took drugs to increase their desire for wine; when glasses were so shaped that they had to be held until emptied: when a man was reckoned as a "three-bottle man," etc.; and when (Mr. Spencer might have added) one of the first of Scottish nobles employed a domestic whose sole duty it was to sit under the table and loosen the neckcloths of the guests as they fell from their chairs, in order that they might not suffocate in their drunken sleep. Intoxication used to be a mark of honor. It is now a disgrace. Education has driven the evil from one class after another. It is now almost exclusively confined to the lowest. As Mr. Spencer says, the remedy for it in England is not a "Maine-law," but the introduction of the education that has banned it elsewhere.

"Remember that every person, however low, has rights and feelings. In all contentions, let peace be rather your object than triumph. Value triumph only as the means of peace."

"Let every man be occupied and occupied in the highest employment of which his nature is capable, and die with the consciousness that he has done his best."

Christian Family Companion.

DALE CITY, Pa., March 18, 1873.

We give this week quite a variety of reading matter, and we hope that will excuse us from writing editorial. We feel as though everybody will be pleased with this number, that is as nearly as everybody can be pleased with the same thing, which our readers know does not frequently occur. What pleases one, sometimes displeases another, and herein arise the difficulties and perplexities of editorial and ministerial life. For instance we are much pleased with our poem on Tobacco, and believe many of our readers will highly appreciate it. But there are some, who are very fond of their favorite weed, who will not enjoy it very much. We are sorry for them; but we hope if they cannot use it for food, they will take it as medicine. We give it for a good purpose, and recommend it to all.

Then we have several No License articles, which we have reason to believe—will also not be pleasantly received by all, for we have learned that some of our patrons at least would prefer that the liquor seller should be left alone. Others imagine themselves opposed to drinking, but feign to doubt whether taking away license would make the matter any better. We are made to wonder how any man can have any doubts of that kind, in the face of the effort the liquor men are making to defeat the prohibition measure. They are evidently much afraid of it. They seem to think they will not be able to sell so much, in the event of the passage of the No License measures. And well they may, when they know that all they do sell—as a beverage—must be carried on as a lawless traffic.

Others of our patrons are in sympathy with the measure, but doubt the propriety, or expediency, of Christians taking part in the decision of the question. With this class we heartily sympathize, believing that their wishes are to do right. But we still believe that we may cast our vote in favor of No License, without contaminating ourselves with the sinful things of this world. Suppose there were a great fire in the town where you lived, could you feel justified in staying at home, and withholding your aid in quenching the flames, for fear you might defile your Christian character? Would you not take up your buckets and rush to the conflagration, and cast upon it your tribute of opposition, at the risk of any denunciation? Would you study long whether or not the rules of your church would allow it? And yet here is the fire of alcohol, burning in every county in our State, and in almost every town. Its destruction is terrible, destroying not only the property of thousands, but burning their bodies, and hurling their souls into hell, for there the drunkard must go. Now will you stay at home, and see the firebrand carried from town to town, and from house to house, and be a witness to this wholsale destruction, without attempting to cast your influence against it? If you can, with your conscience and your God be it. We feel that we must take our bucket and run to the rescue of the perishing thousands. And we would like to see this fire get such a deluge, that the whole land might be flooded and soaked, that Satan would not have an ember left to kindle it again.

CORRESPONDENCE.

Correspondence of church news solicited from all parts of the Brotherhood. Writer's name and address required on every communication as guarantee of good faith. Rejected communications or manuscript used, not returned. All communications for publication should be written upon one side of the sheet only.

Dear brother Holsinger, I take the liberty to inform you that my family at present, is in moderate health, but with sorrow I have to inform you that dear father (ABRAHAM BALSBAUGH) died on the 3rd inst. He was eleven days sick in bed. In the start of his sickness he had two slight strokes of palsy; which parilized him. Then he took the breast fever, and was very delirius during his sickness. He knew most all the time all that came to see him, and could give them answers to anything asked him; but could not keep a conversation, as his mind was wondering and he could not keep his thoughts together. During all the time he spoke of heavenly things, and was full of love, contentedness, and died in good faith, and is no doubt now where all sorrow is over, and all is happiness. He was buried on the 6th Feb. Brother David Gallacher and Wm. Hertzler attended the funeral services. Brethren spoke well and effecting to a very large audience. The hearers gave them their best attention. His age was 70 years, and 25 days. Father was a Christian, and a good man but always had his hope in the grace of Jesus Christ, our Redeemer. We feel his loss very much, as he often gave us good counsel in the dark and tempting days. May the Lord keep us in his grace, while we live, so we can live right; then we can die right, and need have no fears. Remember us in your prayers.

J. H. BALSBAUGH.

BROTHER HENRY: I will give you a small sketch of our little church. We are scattered over a large scope of country; we have our church organized, known as the Bell Creek Church; although we are scattered over about four counties. Brother John Skenbey from Dodge county, and brother David Brumbaugh from Washington county, preached for us several days. Commenced on the 6th and remained with us until the morning of the 10th. Had quite interesting meetings; several expressed themselves almost persuaded to become Christians. On the 12th brother Isaac Pell from Iowa came and preached three sermons.

NAME LOST.

Brother Holsinger : Permit me to drop a few lines in the C. F. F. for the purpose of informing the brethren and sisters in the Lord, that we, according to previous arrangements, had brother H. D. Davy to come on the 8th of February and preach for us, which he did, according to promise, and delivered thirteen sermons with power and demonstration of the spirit to the satisfaction of those within and without, as was made manifest in a few days, by the surrendering of the carnal mind, by six precious souls who came forward and demanded baptism, who had their desires gratified, and many more had their affections taken from the earth, and placed them on things above, and are counting the cost. Oh, may they speedily get through counting the cost, and come for refuge into the kingdom that Christ set up while here in the world. Brethren and sisters, how long are we going to remember the good councils and admonitions given by our beloved brother? Let us ever remember them, and profit thereby. Let us not be hearers only, and thereby be deceived; "But be ye doers of the Word." Then the blessing. The impressions made I think, are deep and lasting, both in saint and sinner.

The meetings were well attended; good order and good attention given to the word spoken, so that there was no trouble for brother Davy to speak as the Spirit gave him utterance; so let God be praised for all the good done by mortal man; and we, his subjects, benefitted. The place of the meeting was in the brick meeting-house, near Hagerstown, Wayne Co., Ind. Yours fraternally,

JOSEPH HOLDER.

Brother Holsinger: In looking over the COMPANION I feel glad to see that our brethren show such a willingness to give their opinion on different subjects, and I would be pleased if some brother would give an explanation on the portion of Scripture that reads thus: "And the spirit shall return unto God who gave it." It seems to be a fact uncontradicted by any. But what I would like an explanation on, is this: whether the spirit of the righteous man rests with God in an unconscious state until the resurrection, or whether it is in a state in which it comprehends and enjoys a certain portion of happiness until the resurrection, and then enters in its full enjoyments. Will some brother be so kind as to give us his views on the subject?

LAMBERT G. HYDE.

Sand Brook, N. J.

The fact of it is, we do not care about having this question discussed in our columns, for the present at least. We do not see that there is much in it. If we are righteous we will share the part of the righteous, whatever that is. If we are unrighteous we must take our lot with the wicked, whatever that may be. We could do no more, and no less in either case, no matter how minutely we might have detailed the condition of the future world. We cannot see that our knowledge of those obscurely revealed things, can in any way effect our salvation. And having learned that such questions almost invariably engender strife, we seek to avoid them. Let us take up such questions and subjects as we know affect our present and eternal condition; such as will help to make us better and happier for time and eternity. Then we will receive some benefit from our investigations. We like something that pays in some way or other. These metaphysical speculations never pay. They are like novel reading: all hollow, hollow, hollow.

Queries.

Will some brother give an explanation on Matth. 8: 21, 22. Reading thus: "And another of his disciples said unto him, Lord suffer me first to go and bury my father? But Jesus said unto him, Follow me, and let the dead bury the dead."

JOHN DIEHL.

The Served Supper.

In the Gospel recorded by John 13: 2, "And supper being served, the devil having already put into the heart of Judas Iscariot, Simon's son to betray him, * * * * he rises from the supper, and lays aside his garments and taking a towel he girded himself [A. V. Translation.] The query is: Where do some brethren get their authority [Scriptural authority I mean] for arising from the table, or supper when there is none? Perhaps outside of the house, and not on the table? When the scripture above quoted expressly declares, "And supper being served;" "He rises from the supper."

Now dear brethren this has been a question in my mind for many years, and one that I cannot solve. In comparing scripture and consulting good reason, I conclude that the supper must be served, on the table, before we can consistently rise from the same, to wash one another's feet. I ask not for controversy, but for instruction. Will some kind brother or sister answer?

J. G. WINEY.

Announcements.

Brother Henry: Please announce through the COMPANION that the District Meeting, in Southern District of Indiana, will be held on the 10th and 11th of April, in the Brethrens' meeting-house, in the Fourmile congregation, Union county, ten miles southeast of Richmond. Brethren coming by the Chicago Great Eastern railway, will stop off at Richmond. Those coming on the Cincinnatti, Hamilton & Indianapolis railway, will stop at College corner. There will be conveyances at these places on the 9th, to take brethren to place of meeting. There will be no conveyance after the 9th.

JACOB RIFE.

A Home.

Dear Brother Holsinger:— As I sat at my window this Sabbath morning, looking upon the fair fields or farm of a neighbor, which lays in front of my house, and as the gentle rains were falling my mind was set to wondering and thinking of our homes in this world. How short is the time we can enjoy them: and humanity will labor and toil to get a nice home to live in, just as if they were going to live forever in it, when we all know that we must soon die and leave this home forever. How will it be then? Will the home we are all travelling to so fast, will it be a home of comfort and joy, or will it be a home of misery and woe? Oh think of this. Had we not better think of this glorious home, and try to obtain it; a home where we can live forever; a home of joy; a home of comfort; a home with Christ, and all good saints, who have labored for this home, and have obtained it. I am happy to say that I have quit being led by men, and now let the Gospel lead me. It led me to a home on earth, where I am happy and enjoy myself, and with that hope which reaches beyond the grave I can look at that home where I soon will go to, and live forever with Jesus, if I keep faithful. Oh! the joyful thought the Christian has of obtaining that home which he can keep forever.

One word to sister Kate, and then I will close. That great big plug I used to wear, is gone back to its home, and my little cap is laid aside, for I want to be a common man, for we learn the Savior was meek, and good examples he has left, that we might follow after, to our happy home above.

S. MUSSER.

Williamstown, Ohio.

Brother Henry: I have just returned from a visit to Beaver Creek, Md., whither I had gone as company for brother Grabill Myers. The brethren had made arrangements to have a meeting continued two weeks at one place. We tarried with them during that time and met for public worship twenty times. A very commendable spirit was manifest at all the meetings. There was no undue excitement nor sleepy dullness in any way to mar the peace, or destroy the devotion of the occasion. The weather was rather inclement the greater part of the time, but despite this the congregations were generally large. This was very encouraging. When people turn out on wet and muddy roads to hear the Gospel, it is an indirect evidence of sincerity. The meetings seemed to have a favorable effect upon the church, and also upon the people. There were some received into the fellowship of the faithful, and others are "counting the cost." The people endeared themselves to us by their christian deportment and appreciation of our labors, and many expressions of sorrow were shown in our farewell meeting. We enjoyed the society of the brethren very much; their kindness was far above what we deserved. The church at Beaver Creek has quite a number of young members, especially sisters. If they continue to live up to their christian profession and never lower the standard of christian purity to catch the breeze of popular favor, their influence will certainly have a salutary effect upon the surrounding community. One thing I would suggest for the consideration of the church. That is, make some provision for the young and old too, to meet together at stated times for reading the Scriptures. Have a Bible class. It should be under the supervision of the church. Appoint a brother with the requisite qualification and strong in the faith to superintend. After reading a suitable portion let all join freely and orderly in asking and answering questions. If such service is conducted in the true christian spirit, it will have a telling effect. The young people will have their minds drawn more from the light literature of the day, and centred on the unfading plant of Paradise, and by reading and investigating new sweets will be extracted, and they who "taste its excellencies once, will desire to taste them once again; and they who taste them oftenest will relish them the best." By this also many that cannot read themselves will get to hear the scriptures read in a way that will make it both interesting and profitable. This was my first visit to, and acquaintance with the brethren at Beaver Creek. But the endearing ties of christian fellowship soon made us feel at home. The characteristic plainness of the brethren is not lost sight of here, and this has much to do in causing us to feel that we are welcome. By it the feeling of superior and inferior is overcome and more freedom felt in conversation. May the brethren never lose sight of it. I formed many new acquaintances, and added new names to my list of friends. Their kindness and attention will not soon be forgotten. The ministering brethren here seem to be self-denying and zealous in the Master's cause, at peace with one another and in love with the church. Our enjoyment was great while on the visit and the remembrance of it pleasant. For the satisfaction of those whom we visited I would say that we landed safely at home on our appointed time and found all well. To God be all the thanks and honor given.

License or No License.

Brother Holsinger: Judging from the articles which have been written for the C. F. C., it seems that the question of voting License or No License is agitating the minds of some of the brethren a great deal. On page 109 of the present volume, I notice an article written by brother J. E. Pfautz. I feel very sorry to think brother P. takes such a view of the subject. When we take into consideration the enormous amount of two hundred millions of dollars being spent annually, in the United States alone, for intoxicating liquors, and that sixty thousand drunkards are made thereby, (according to Commissioner Well's report) it is enough to cause us to think over the matter. I do not propose to answer all the objections in the above named article, but toward its close, the brother refers to James 5, 16, which reads thus: "The effectual, fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much," which is very true; but O! how many prayers have been offered up to the "Most High" to banish the intoxicating cup from the land? How many wives and mother's hearts have been broken? How many children are made homeless? How many dark and bloody deeds have been committed? How many penitentiaries have been filled? How many noble intellects destroyed? how many precious souls cast into hell by the use of alcoholic drink? These are questions that are painful to consider, and which eternity alone can answer.

The brother rather intimates that prayer alone will suffice to remove this great curse. I do not say it will not, but I think it will require work also. How many examples are recorded in the Bible where prayer was made to God for so and so, in answer to which he required an action on the part of the petitioner, in order to bring about the thing asked? And who can tell whether this is not an action, required on our part, to bring about the much needed reformation? It seems to me at least, and I would that every living man, woman and child were of the same spirit. It seems as if Satan were aware that his deputy, King Alcohol, was about to be deposed from his throne on this continent; and that he is making his final and terrible struggle to maintain the ascendency of his kingdom. If he can find a religious paper whose columns are for sale, he charters a department of it and advocates the use of domestic wine as a beverage. If he can find a physician who cares more for his fee than he does for his patient, he visits him in his study; and, like the serpent in Eden, whispers the advice to use alcohol, in preference to any substitute for medical purposes.

T. S Cuyler says, "Drinking usages and the curse of drunkenness are eating their way into social parties, into our congregations, and too often into the ranks of the communicants at the Lord's table. I could give facts that would astound those who never look under the crust to see what the devil is about with his sapping and mining apparatus." Mr. Gladstone, Prime Minister of England, stated, a short time since, that $484,000,000 in gold was expended annually in Great Britain for strong drink.

In conclusion, I would say: Brethren, take heed to yourselves what ye intend to do as touching this question, for if this counsel, or this work, be of men, it will come to nought: but if it be of God, ye cannot overthrow it; lest haply ye be found even to fight against God. Therefore, I would say, go and vote No License, and close every grog shop in Pa. If a person cannot get strong drink, why he cannot drink it. I am sorry to say we have some brethren in the church that are too often seen under the influence of intoxicating drink.

Southern Iowa District Meeting.

Pursuant to a call for a special meeting, of the district council of the Southern District of Iowa, to be held in the Monroe congregation, on the 28th of February, 1873, "for the purpose of devising ways and means to send two brethren to preach the Gospel," in districts where there are no ministers, and where people desire to have the brethren preach, a small number of members from Jefferson, Appanoose, and Monroe, having assembled, after some deliberations, a vote was taken on the following resolution:

That two brethren shall be chosen by this meeting for said purpose, and to be furnished with whatever means may be contributed, and sent out to such places as may seem to them and to this meeting to the most for the advancement of the cause of the Lord: Lost: Yeas 7, Nays 10,

2nd. Resolved that this meeting request the delegate to next A. M. to present the following query to said meeting, for their consideration: "Is it according to the Gospel, for council districts to select brethren (from among their ministers) and send them out to preach the Gospel in places where there are no ministering brethren, and where the people desire the brethren to preach? And, to pay the traveling expenses of such brethren?" Passed unanimously.

Brother Henry: The above will certainly seem very lame, but it was the best that could be accomplished under the existing prejudice, among the brethren in this district. I hope the A. M. will not pass the above with a simple Yes or No, but will give such answer, supported by such Gospel authority, that it will forever set the question in its proper light before the brethren, as I believe that upon this point hangs the question whether the Brethren as a people shall retrograde or advance. Yours in love.

G. B. REPLOGLE.

BROTHER HOLSINGER: The Brethren at Coventry held a series of meetings, commencing on the 4th of January, and closing on the 19th. We had meeting every evening, and including Sabbath mornings, seven day meetings. Our meetings were well attended, there being good sleighing nearly all the time. The good Lord showered his blessings upon us, and we truly had a feast of fat things. About twenty have been made willing in the day of grace, to enlist under the blood-stained banner of King Emmanuel, and to obey Christ in baptism. May the gospel truly be to them, a lamp to their feet, and a light to their path. We hope many more will soon become sick of sin, and turn to the Lord.

The ministering brethren in this church, are: Elder John R. Price, Elder David Keim, John Harley in the second degree of the ministry, and Jacob Conner in the first degree.

The following ministering brethren from a distance were with us, and labored faithfully: David Younce, from Germantown; Elder Grabill Meyers from Blair county, John Gotwalz, from Montgomery county; Samuel R. Zug, from Lancaster county; Daniel Hollinger, from Cumberland county; and Isaac Price, from Chester county. Hoping the good Lord will abundantly bless those dear brethren who labored so earnestly in our midst; that they, at the close of life, may say, with one of old, "I have fought a good fight: I have finished my course: I have kept the faith: Henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the righteous Judge shall give me at that day: and not to me only, but unto all them also that love his appearing." And brethren and sisters, we who have heard them tell of the marvelous love of God to man, may we truly put on the whole armor of God, that we may stand in the evil day, and having done all to stand.

Our labor in the Lord is not in vain.

JOHN Y. EISENBERG.
East Coventry, Pa.

Brother Henry: We would like to say to the readers of the COMPANION, that we have had a glorious meeting with us. We had a visit from brother Davis Younce, of Germantown. He came to our arm of the church, Feb. 9th, and continued with us until the 19th of the month, preaching evenings. And whilst he was with us he had the pleasure of seeing 10 precious souls received into the church, whilst many others say they are ready to go with us on the way to the glorious world, where parting is no more. Our meeting was well attended throughout. Our brother preached the Word with great power and feeling, so much so that many who had thought but very little about religion, were made to tremble like Felix of old, and were almost persuaded to become christians. O Brethren, we will long remember our brother's visit on the account of the solemnity of our meetings. Never shall we forget the last meeting when our brother had to say farewell to us all. We felt like Paul's brethren to fall on his neck. We hope he will visit us again, and that he will not forget us in his prayers. If this should prove to be the last visit he should ever pay us, may God grant that we may, with our little church, meet him and family in the paradise above, where we can mingle our voices in that sweet world of glory, where our labors shall be at an end. I remain your brother in hope of that glorious resurrection, in Christ Jesus.

Query.

Is it consistent with the Gospel of Christ, for brethren and especially ministering brethren to build fine costly houses and barns, in all the style and fashion of the world? If not, what should be done with those brethren who persist in those things, contrary to the council of the Elders? Is there any difference between a display of pride on one's person or on their buildings? Also is it consistent for sisters to dress their little innocent children in all the foolish fashions of the world? If not what should be done with those sisters who do these things? Is this bringing up their children in the nurture of the Lord? Will some one answer?

CONSISTENCY.

BELOVED BRETHREN: Beware of deceivers. Not long since I received the following from some persons who are busy in other men's matters: The Minister's Hand-Book. By Rev. Edwin H. Nevin, D. D. A valuable aid to all Ministers. It contains a collection of the approved forms for Infant and Adult Baptism, the Lord's supper," &c. A few words are necessary here. The only hand-book for the Gospel carrier, is the Bible, and it thoroughly understood, and then appropriately delivered, in accordance with the Gospel Rule. Christ and his apostles treated all persons within the provision of the commission. See Matt. 28 : 19. Infant Baptism is no where in the New Testament; neither in command, example or inference. Hence all forms for it whatsoever, are extra, human, invented, and now sold on terms of $1.00 post paid.

Adult Baptism is simply dipping the believer into water, thrice; into the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit. Lord's supper, see 1 Cor. 11, and St. John 13th chapter.

Marriage is a legal act, and therefore the laws must establish its form.

Burials are controled according to the customs of parties, relatives, or notions.

Prayers, by the spirit of the Holy One, or Lord's prayer.

Commandments, see Bible.

Creed, see New Testament.

Texts for funerals: the words of Jesus and his apostles.

Now take the first: "A valuable aid to ALL Ministers." Nothing but the gift of the Holy Ghost, and watchings, and prayers, unto the end.

Begone Speculative Books, and the makers of them.

JOS. I. COVER.

DEAR BROTHER: In COMPANION number 5, I see an article about Stylish Churches. I think we have more style and dress in all our churches than we should have. It is time, and high time that our sisters should begin to lay off some of their worldly fashions. Indeed it is awful to see how some of our sisters do come to the house of God, with all their flounces, and ruffles, and double dresses, piled on them. We very well know, that while their minds are on such dressing, they can't be on their Savior too. But in place of laying it off, some say they will leave the church before they will come down and dress like an old woman. Now I don't think that it has ever been asked of them to dress like an old woman; but it has been asked of them to dress plain, and in the order of the church. Now is the time we should serve the Lord and dress pleasing in his sight. Dear sisters; who would'nt rather dress plain and pleasing in the sight of the Lord now, than have him tell us in that great and awful judgment day: "I know ye not?" Let us study over these things, and see if we would'nt feel like wearing the plainest dress that we could put on.

H. J. JOHNSON.

BROTHER HOLSINGER: After so long a time I send up my subscription for the C. F. C. I cannot well do without it. Take from me the knowledge of the doings of Zion, and you rob me of the COMPANION. As brethren seldom visit our little church, we can only hear how the brotherhood is prospering through the periodicals published by the brethren. And besides this, we are supplied with wholesome food, upon which the soul delights to feast. How so many can live at ease in Zion, without reading the COMPANION is a matter of mere speculation with me. But I suppose many have not the money to pay for it. And many do not like to read, and therefore will not take the paper. In the later case we believe that one dollar and a half is larger, and engage the mind more than the "crown of life." But let others do as they may, as for me, I will take the COMPANION as long as I am able, and when mony fails I hope I will not be ashamed to beg. And if the COMPANION brings to me something that may be wholesome, that is not altogether in the Spirit of Christ. I can just only say a little more "Salt," brother or sister. And again; if the COMPANION brings to me anything that will grind this nature of mine into a full submission to the whole will of heaven, instead of me falling out with you, I pray God to let it grind. Yes let it grind until a mind, submissive, meek, alone is left. Let it grind until every chaff: every speck is torn asunder, from the grain of life. Let it grind until we are thoroughly dursted; until we are upon angels wings borne to the sweet by and by, where Israel's God will wipe the tears from our eyes, that have been shed and the trials here. Heaven is not far away; it is where God resides. That is our country. There Jesus our brother dwells.

SAM. C. BASHOR.

Whiteville, Mo.

P. S. Since written the above the Cambleites have commenced a revival meeting in town. Their minister, Mr. Coffee, is a very intelligent man, and a fluent speaker; he seems to have the talent of convincing his hearers that there is no people on earth who preach the gospel except themselves, claiming that it is alone through the means of the gospel that we are saved. Then they claim they alone use those means, therefore justifying themselves thereby, and condemning all others who differ with them. Then they turn around and condum all they preach by inviting all to come to the Lord's table, and partake as Christians with them; the emblem of his broken body, and shed blood. How is that?

Annual Meeting of 1874.

EDITORS C. F. C.: Please say through the COMPANION that the Committee of arrangements, after carefully examining the many places of holding the Annual Meeting for 1874, have finally decided, all things considered, Joseph Filbrun's have the best facilities for the accomodation of the Annual Meeting. Therefore the Lord willing, the A. M. of 1874, will be in the Ottercreek congregation, Macoupon Co., Ill., 25 miles south of Springfield, at the residence of brother Joseph Filbrun, only about 200 yards from the St. Louis, Alton, & Chicago Rail Road. You will also please say to the Brethren of Southern Illinois, that the amount subscribed for procuring a tent for the benefit of the churches, in the Southern District of Illinois, is not sufficient, and that the project is therefore a failure, for the present.

MR. EDITOR: Having read several pieces in the COMPANION, headed "License or no License," although I am but a boy, I feel like casting in my little mite. It is a fact we all know, that there is a great and a growing evil arising from the use of intoxicating drinks, and I would say to all boys, beware of the intoxicating bowl. Shun it as you would a serpent. Its effects are even more ruinous than the bite of the deadliest viper, for the snake can but kill the body; but intoxicating drink does not stop with the destructions of the body, but kills beyond the tomb. The Bible tells us that no "drunkard shall inherit the kingdom of heaven." If this were the only passage recorded in the Scriptures against drunkenness, it seems to me it would be enough to prevent any rational being from touching the liquid poison. But this is not all; the Scriptures are full of such like passages. They are even classed with the most vile and wicked on earth; such as murderers, thieves, liars, &c. The Scriptures say that we are made after the image and likeness of our Creator. Just think for a moment that beautiful image polluted and corrupted by alcohol.

I am thirteen years old; was raised in Pennsylvania; moved here last summer, and consequently know something of the evils of intemperance there. Now I would say to all for the sake of humanity, and for the sake of the rising generation, put in your vote for No License. I don't belong to any church yet, but I think the Brethren come the nearest fulfilling the Scriptures of any church I know of.

The Christian Family Companion. Is published every Tuesday, at $1.50 a year, by Henry R. Holsinger, who is a member of the Church of the Brethren, sometimes known by the name of "German Baptists," and vulgarly or maliciously called "Dunkards."

The design of the work is to advocate truth, expose error, and encourage the true Christian on his way to Zion.

It assumes that the New Testament is the Will of God, and that no one can have the promise of salvation without observing all its requirements, that among these are Faith, Repentance, Prayer, Baptism by triue immersion, Feet Washing, the Lord's Supper, the Holy Communion, Charity, Nonconformity to the world, and a full resignation to the whole will of God, as he has revealed it through his Son Jesus Christ.

So much of the affairs of this world as may be thought necessary to the proper observance of the signs of the times, or such as may tend to the moral, mental, or physical benefit of the Christian will be published, thus removing all occasion for coming into contact with the so-called Literary or Political journals.

Subscriptions may begin at any time.

Happiness.

There is a bliss for which you sigh, that cannot be found where it is too frequently sought —without coming to Christ. Rest is sweetest after labor ; and happiness will never be to us, what it is designed to be, until a battle has been fought to gain it. The glorious victory that must be gained over sin and temptation, will bring to all, the happiness that angels could wish. But, here seems to be the great difficulty: I must fight before I can win. Yes, and you must conquer or you'll die. "Sin, when it hath finished it's work, bringeth forth death." Thoughts of this death will deprive you of true happiness, though the world with all its wealth and amusements may favor it. Therefore you had better not let sin hinder the soul's happiness. Your sins trouble you. They make you miserable, though they do afford a kind of momentary enjoyment, in the gratifying of your lusts.

Would you be truly happy, you must be wise. Ignorance is not bliss. I would recommend you, first, to be studious. It is while studying the nature of the Supreme Being; the nature of his creation, the most noble of which is man, that we are led to appreciate the dignity of the higher life, without which there can be no happiness, such as will assimilate us unto Him, who alone can make the miserable happy.

Secondly, I would recommend you to be thoughtful. Great thinkers have made themselves happy. Thoughts are to the soul, as food is to the body. If our food be stale, impure, and unhealthy, the physical man is a sufferer. If our thoughts are impure, the soul is not happy : it is miserable. If, instead, of feeding, nourishing and sweetening the mind with thoughts of a religious character, we dig down into the mire and filth of sin, in search for thoughts that always result in shame—shame that will cause the friends of our own house to forsake us—we need not even dare to think that we can have even a faint idea of what constitutes real happiness. Let the soul feed on thoughts of the good time coming, when it shall raise its wings, as a dove, to fly away and be forever at rest, where the happiness of the pure fadeth not away.

Thirdly, I would recommend you to seek, daily, the happiness of others. There is such a thing as being burdened with sins that are not our own ; and those can never be laid aside unless we heed the admonition ; "Bear ye one another's burdens." You are a very selfish Christian indeed, and I don't wonder that you are unhappy, if you do not, from a motive of love, seek the happiness even of your enemies. What does Christ teach, by precept and example, in regard to seeking the happiness of the unhappy ? Does he not teach us to seek the good of all mankind ? True, there is a considerable amount of spiritual suffering accompanying our happiness, while in pursuit of the happiness of those who seem to be lost in sin's dark way ; but then it is vastly different from that that is continually stinging us, while conscious of not performing any known duty that God has assigned us. While touching upon the subject of happiness, I do not wish you to infer from what I may say, that the goal of happiness can be obtained in this life. However, I do not wish you to be satisfied with any source of happiness, save that given as a compensation for the work of reformation. Admitting, then, as every sane man must, that it is by engaging in the work of Christianity, that true happiness—happiness that will not leave us in life or death—can be obtained, is it rational to avoid the only means of being happy, in time and in eternity, and die in sin and despair ?

Friendly alien, you are invited to come to Jesus and be blest. Cast your burden of sin upon him ; for he careth for you. Come to him and find pardon. Find pardon. Yes, herein is the beginning of true happiness. Stay away from Christ, and you stay away from happiness. Stay away from happiness, and you stay away from heaven.

F. M. SNYDER.

A Father to a Profligate Son.

Son Charles:—Your continued ill courses oblige me to write this letter to you. I flattered myself that your solemn promises of amendment might have been better depended on; but I see, to my great mortification, that all I have done for you, and all I have said to you, are thrown away. What can I say to you more than I have said? yet, once more, I am desirous to try what the force of a letter will do with one who has not suffered mere words to have any effect upon him. Perhaps this remaining with you, if you will now and then seriously peruse it, may in some happy moment, give you reflection, and by the grace of God, bring on your repentance and amendment. Consider then, I beseech you, in time, the evil of your ways, that your present courses must impair a good constitution, destroy your health, and undoubtedly shorten your life. No family which values their own honor, and the welfare of their child, will allow your addresses to a daughter worthy of being sought after for a companion, should you incline to marry. In that case, the worst of their sex only will accept of you as a companion for life, which will make you completely miserable, when you had it in your power to be as happy. As to another world, beyond this transitory one, my heart trembles for what most probably will be the consequence to your poor soul; for the human mind is seldom at a stop. If you do not grow better, you will undoubtedly grow worse, and you may run into those sins and evils which you may perhaps think yourself incapable of, as already you have arrived at a height of folly and wickednes, which once you thought you should never be capable of being guilty of. Do not, my dear son, let your poor mother and me have the mortification to think, that we have been the unhappy means of giving life to a child of perdetion, instead of a child of glory; that our beloved son, with all the pains we have taken to instill good principles into his mind, in hopes he would one day prove a credit and comfort to his family, should, instead of answering our longing wishes, when at age, take such contrary courses as will make us join to wish he had never been born. Consider, my dear son, we do not want anything of you but your own good. Let us but have reason to hope, that when we are dead and gone, you will support our name with credit, and be no burden to your poor sisters nor disgrace to our memories. Let them think of you as a protector in my stead, rather than as an ungrateful spoiler among them. My dear son, I conjure you by all our past tenderness and affections for you, by our hopes and fears from infancy to manhood, to think of all those things; reflect on the instability of all worldly enjoyments. You will find that no satisfaction, which is not founded on virtue and sobriety, can be durable, or worthy of a rational creature. Your good mother, who mingles tears so often with mine, to deplore the sad prospect your ill course gives us, joins also her prayers with mine, that this, my last effort, may be attended with success, and that you will at last listen to the advice of your indulgent father.

THE ANSWER.

Honored Father:—It is with no small share of shame and confusion that I have perused your indulgent letter. I am extremely sorry that all your good advice before has been thrown away upon, me as to render this farther instance of your paternal affections necessary. I am resolved instantly to set about a reformation, and to conform myself entirely to your good pleasures for the future. I beg sir, the countenance of your's and mother's prayers to God, to enable me to adhere to my present good resolution. I have so often reformed, and so often broken my word, rather indeed through the strength of my passions than a desire of non-performance, that I think I ought now to give you some proof that I am in earnest; and what better can I give than assure you that I will henceforth break myself from the frothy companions I used to take so much delight in, and whose lewd panters and temptations have so frequently set aside my good purposes? You, sir, for the future, shall recommend the company proper for me to keep, and I beg you will chalk out the paths in which you would have me to tread, and as much as possible, I will walk in them. When I shall have convinced you of the sincerity of my reformation I hope you and my honored mother will restore me to your good opinions which it shall be my constant study to deserve. I have already broken with my companions who attempted to laugh me out of my good resolutions. I beg leave to wait upon you for such a space of time as you shall think proper, and in order to break myself fully from all of my profligate companions, and that I may have the benefit of your advice and direction for my future conduct. May God continue long, for the benefit of us all, your life and health, and make me happy in contributing as much to your future comfort as I have by my past excess, to your trouble of mind which shall be the constant prayer of your truly penitent and dutiful son. For the COMPANION.

Home.

There is certainly a great deal contained in the little word "Home." It is true many families live and die without such a place as home. But with all this, there is not a doubt that many of them wish for a home. It is also true, God gives, in one sense, a home to every human being, which is born into this world. But in another sense, many are without what they would like to call a home.

In this world people possess homes, some by inheritance, some by purchase, and others by rent, or paying a certain sum, either for a year or month. Of course we all admit that it is possible for those who have homes by inheritance to lose the title, or lose their homes altogether. Again, it is possible for the poor to get able to buy homes by the earnings of their own hands. These two possibilities we will take for the text of our essay. As we do not intend to write much about our earthly homes, only make some comparisons.

I think this idea before our minds, will be a good one. It may be true that many of the readers of the COMPANION have been among the lucky of this world.—Their parents may have been what we call rich. Therefore they were enabled to give to their children a home free gratis; but what is the result? "Easy come, easy go," is an old maxim, well applied here. The fortune is run through in what way? Not in the way, or by the advice of the parents; for they know what those homes have cost. They know the actual value thereof. It was not a trifle, that which the father purchased them with. No wonder they warn the son, admonish the daughter; they explain to the children the consequence of a riotous living. But all in vain; the course has been begun, the last acre must be sold, the last dollar must be spent; no matter if it breaks the heart of the parents. Of course it is often seen by the unfortunate party when too late. Then they think of the goodness of their parents, and implore their assistance to procure back what has been lost.

Now, reader of the COMPANION, how is it in our case? We have all been born to inherit eternal life, to have a home, not only for time, but for eternity. Did we give heed to the advice of a merciful God, and a bleeding Savior? I am afraid the majority of you, with myself did not see the danger of our course until too late. The father was trying to draw us from our sinful course. Christ our Savior, stood with bleeding side, at the turning off point to beckon us back. He sent His ministers to warn us; but, oh! maddened, as we were, none of these stopped us, to consider where all would run. We kept, sold, our last talent, spent the last pound, and still on to destruction. And was this all, do you ask? No, no! just as the person in this world, if he is on the down-hill path, he wants all the company he can get. So we did; not enough that we and our souls were to be lost. Oh no! there would be no pleasure without company. So we must induce others to join also. Those that we cannot get to join our company we borrow of them. We are to be ruined, and certainly it is the Devil's pleasure to ruin by the wholesale. But stop, look ahead; not as you expected. We are certainly in sight of danger; we get excited. We thought we could do without God; the Bible a novel; God's warning a mockery; his ministers not in earnest. We stop to catch the sound of—what shall I call it? We hear cursing, lamentation, want, in everything. What can it be? Oh, listen! I am on the brink of Hell itself. I who had a home by inheritance, have squandered the last hope in myself. I am gone too far. Oh, my God! what shall I do? Is there hope yet? is there hope anywhere? I am afraid I am lost! What shall I—what can I do? Is there yet a Savior? Hark! whose beautiful voice is that? I heard some one say, "Come unto me." I wonder if he means me. Oh! I can see him now. Listen; he says, "If your sins are as mountains, I will remove them. Oh, it is Jesus! I will fly to his arms, and all will be well.

This, no doubt, is the true picture of the condition of a great many of the humble followers of the Lord. We return to him, but without any good about us. Then he offers us again a house on certain conditions. It seems that God is certainly a good Father to us all. He will not that one sinner shall be lost. We can buy a heavenly home, and how? with silver and gold? oh, no; but by obedience to God and to his will. Did I say we can purchase a home? no, better than this—we shall have it free of cost. Only comply with the conditions which are offered to us. But the best of all is, we can get our title clear, already in this world, if we comply with the requirements of the Gospel. Our home will be ready for us, and will not cost us more than to be lawfully adopted into God's family.

Reader, would you like to have a home for ever? If so, give God your heart, join his family here on earth; work in his vineyard while you live, and certainly you will be well paid for all. Here in this world, if the poor have been so lucky as to purchase a home with their hard earnings, oh! they long for the moving day to come. The writer can speak from experience. First the months, then the weeks, and finally the days, and hours are counted, until the time arrives when we may actually move into our new home.

Again, we have always those who are willing to help the poor to get homes.—Oh, how we remember them, we respect them, we love them. Is it not so in the Christian's case? There are those, who are a helping hand; some who have prayed with us, who have given us light on dark subjects; in short, who have done all they could to get us into the Church of Christ. Those we respect, we love and esteem; and why should we not? Jesus has said, "Love one another."—But more than this, if we have come to possess these heavenly homes, this place in God's family, we certainly should be careful that we will not lose this title again. How careful are we with the titles of our earthly homes. We try to shield them from fiends of all discriptions. Do we do this in regard to our heavenly titles? Do we not too often give robbers of all kinds an opportunity to destroy them for us? Oh! brethren and sisters, I am afraid we are all too careless in our Christian duties. Can we not make up our minds to guard against Satan, no matter in what shape or color he approaches us? Let us remember what our heavenly home has cost—nothing less than the blood of Jesus, the Son of God. Will we, then, trifle with all this? God forbid! Let the enemy come, and his army, as it were, surround us: but to give up the title which Christ has made clear with his precious blood, we will not. It is true there are times when it seems that the forces of the enemy are combined in order to destroy us. They may effect an entrance into the camp, but if we are on our guard, they, at the least, can only surround us. They never can destroy us, but we must watch and pray, or the Devil will take advantage of our carelessness, and he may thus be victorious. The danger is certainly great. May it be apparent to every one, so that all may keep ready for the sounding of the bugle.

Brethren, in conclusion, let us not only watch our own safety, but that also of our brethren and sisters. If we are children of one parent, members of one family, our interests should certainly be mutual. If we see one brother in danger, let us admonish him of the fact, in love, and if we work together, here in this world, in love, union, peace and faith in God, when moving day comes, that we can all move into that home which has been bought and prepared for us, we will then give God, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit the praise for all, and forever. What a happy meeting it will be. Brethren and sisters, don't forget to think about it.

The Scriptures No 4.

The authenticity of the scriptures, as handed down to us, is almost universally admitted, except by those who disown the Bible as a revalation from God to man. And as I have already heretofore allnded to this part of the history of the scriptures, I now propose to notice briefly its anthorship, &c.

Prominent among the writers of the scriptures is Moses, who seems to stand at the head of all the rest; being educated in all the learning of the Egyptians, and in all probability, was one of the most learned men in that age of the world. And Moses was learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians, and was mighty in words and in deeds." Although he was supernaturally saved from a watery grave, and taken up by order of Pharaoh's daughter to be nursed and nourished for her own adopted son, together with the educational advantages, superior social intercourse and pleasures he enjoyed in the King's court. Notwithstanding all this, "when he was come to years, refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter; choosing rather to suffer affliction with the people of God, than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season; esteeming the reproach of Christ greater riches than the treasure in Egypt; for he had respect unto the recompense of the reward. Undoubtedly he could not bear the idea of seeing his Hebrew brethren, in such a low state of servitude, and with taskmasters set over them, who perchance ruled over them as with a rod of iron. His better nature would not permit him to remain at court, and in consequence, he leaves to espouse the cause of his oppressed Hebrew brethren. While on a special visit to his friends, "And seeing one of them suffer wrong, he defended him, and avenged him that was oppressed, and smote the Egyptian."

It seems from the language of "The Scriptures," that it was revealed unto him that he was to be the deliverer of the Israelites from Egypt's bondage.

After spending forty years more in the land of Midian, at the advanced age of eighty years, he was finally commissioned to lead the Hebrews out of Egypt into the promised land of Canaan. During their long and tedious journeyings across the sandy deserts of Arabia, he received the law from the hand of God himself. During their forty years' travels, the Pentateuch was written, and in all probability is the oldest literary production in the world. Some few biblical scholars and comentators claim the book of Job to be older, but so far as I have learned ecclesiastical writers, both ancient and and modern, claim Moses to be the most antique historian extant. It was undoubtedly written by Moses himself, with the exception of the account of his death, and a few other parts that were added afterwards, but in the main, it is accredited to him as "The Law of Moses." Christ, frequently in his teachings and discourses, referred to "The Law," in order to prove his Messiahship, and of what was predicted therein concerning his coming into the world, &c.

Admitting, then, the Pentateuch, or the five books of Moses, as they are placed in the canonical order of the Scriptures, to constitute the work of Moses, and to be the oldest book in the Bible. The question naturally arises in the mind of the honest reader, how and from what source did Moses obtain the necessary information which composes these writings, especially that part of the history intervening between the creation to the time when he flouri-hed, including a period of time not less than twenty-three centuries.

The material knoweledge of which the Pentateuch is composed, Moses must have gathered either from history, tradition, or inspiration. That he compiled this great work from other writings extant before his time and to which he had access, is a theory too wild to speculate upon. It is a question even among modern scholars, whether the archives of history were preserved in the form of written documents or not, in those remote ages of the world. In tracing up the history of philology, it cannot be definately ascertained even if written language was devised previous to Moses' time or not. Eusebius, Clemens, and others attribute this invention to Moses himself. Adam Clark, also inclines to the same opinion. Leaving the above conjectures for what they are worth, it is not likely that the sacred historian had recourse, in the least, to any written accounts of the history of the world whatever, but it would be more reasonable to suppose, that Moses wrote from traditional accounts. Oh! says some one, what do you signify by that? By tradition is meant an oral account transmitted from time to time, age to age, or generation to generation. Taking it for granted that Adam knew all about the history of the creation of the world, and what took place during his lifetime, all of which could have been transmitted orally through the medium of seven persons to Moses, running over a period of between two and three thousand years. The reader, by referring to the fifth chapter of the book of Genesis, will there discover that the antidiluvian patriarchs' longevity of life was spun out in some instances to nearly one thousand years, and the deluge took place in the seventeenth century, in the year of the world, so that the connecting link, so to speak, between Adam and Noah was Methuselah, who was contemporary with Adam over two hundred years, and in like manner was Methuselah contemporary with Noah about six hundred years, if my calculations are right. So that the traditional accounts up from Adam to Noah were an easy matter, having of necessity only to pass through one person, who lived long enough to see them both. In the same way could the traditional history of the antidiluvian world be transmitted by the patriarch Noah, who was both ante and postdiluvian, to succeeding generations. The chain runs thus: Noah lived to see Shem, Shem lived to see Abraham, Abraham Isaac, Isaac Joseph, Joseph Amram, and Amram Moses, so that, in short, the traditional account, antedating from the birth of Methuselah had only to pass through seven persons to reach the ears of Moses. This view of the question would seem plausible enough, were it not that the scriptures of divine truth declare in plain language, that "all scripture is given by inspiration of God."

From the above passage of scripture we can plainly infer, that Moses was actuated to write under the influence and spirit of God himself, and if the art of writing was unknown before Moses' time, God taught him the use of letters with his own fingers on the mount, where he received the decalogue on two tables of stone, written with the finger of God himself. If this was the first system of written language devised by God himself, he [Moses] was likewise taught to use it, and was the first to introduce it to his fellow man. This may seem strange, but it is not any more strange than for unlearned fishermen to speak in languages they were never taught. In precisely the same way and backed up by the same supernatural power, did Moses compose the Pentateuch, in the main. In short, it was the work of divine inspiration. In corroberation and proof of this fact, we shall cite the reader to "The Law" of Moses to prove its own ground. "These are the statutes, and judgments, and laws, which the Lord made between him and the children of Israel in Mount Sinai by the hand of Moses." Again, "these are the commandments and judgments, which the Lord commanded, by the hand of Moses, unto the children of Israel in the plains of moab, by Jordan, near Jerico." Also, "Moses spake unto the children of Israel, according unto all that the Lord had given him in commandment unto them." These scriptural citations explain fully themselves, and the intelligent reader will readily infer from the above that Moses wrote by inspiration, and not by compilation or tradition.

We have now treated a few of the leading characteristics connected with the authorship of the book of Moses, and it only remains for us, in this short notice, to follow the author briefly, in the beautiful and systematized order in which the sacred historian has narrated the world's events, as they transpire in their regular order of time. It may truly be compared to a chain, without the loss of a single link.

The past events recorded by Moses, we may reasonably suppose were pictured before the mind of the inspired penman, Like a great panorama, they were unroll-ed and made to pass before his eyes in historical and chronological order, from the creation of the world up to the time of Moses. Analytically, we have the six days's work in the creation, including a definite account of each day's work, Paradise; the fall of man; the increase of wickedness in consequence of human depravity, the building of Babel; confusion of tongues; the deluge; repeopling of the world; history of Abraham, &c.

Of Hieroglyphic Babylon.

As men journeyed from the east, in the days of Nimrod, the mighty hunter of men, they came to a plain in the land of Shimer, on the river Ephrates where they built the memorable Babylon, which was begun in that of Babel. In this great city stood the celebrated temple of Belus, denoting the religion of the land. Babylon was inclosed with a wall of brick, three hundred and fifty feet in height, and eighty feet thick, the bricks were taken from a ditch afterwards filled with water to add to the strength of the place. The circumfereuce of which was not less than sixty miles. It was four square, with twenty-five brass gates on a side, making one hundred in all. From each gate there was a street leading across the city, from gate to gate, so that the streets interseet each other at right angels, and divided Babylon into five hundred and seventy six squares, besides the spaces, for building, next to the walls, which were defended by several hundred towers erected upon their summit.

Now there was a very wise prince of age and experience, who reigned over Babylon. His name was Jupiter, and he was the author of the wine of Bacchus, which wine is moral evil. With this wine the people of Babylon were stupidly intoxicated, so as to be almost insensible to those important things, in which all are greatly interested, and there was a great confusion of tongues, insomuch that there were not less than seventy-two languages, which have since increased to more than one hundred and twenty. There were many things in the environs of Babylon, more than could be well enumerated, which were very troublesome and painful, and which are called natural evils, all of which are the effect, or consequence of moral evil, for this was the cause of their introduction into the world. There were also certain associations, which may well be denominated the school of Babylon. So great the influence of their example, and the progress of their pupils. Men of ability and spirit, being intoxicated with the wine of Bacchus, volunteer their services, pleased with the idea of becoming masters in those schools, which by the by is considered as an important distinctiou, and constituting them great and mighty men.

The first is the military school. There is taught the art of war; its object is fame and glory; although it is attended with such horrors as tend to harden the heart, yet many weak men are so infatuated as to be delighted at the sight.

The second is the dancing school. Where is taught the important art of hopping and jumping about, at a signal made by a black man, who, as their captain, with his noisy instrument, directs their movements, whilst they turn their backs and faces to and fro, without either sense or reason; except indeed it may serve to show fine shapes and clothes. But consumptions are dated, and serious impressions are driven away.

The third is a school of lawyers. The nature of this association will be discoursed by the following lines.

"Should I be a lawyer I must lie and cheat,
For honest lawyers have no bread to eat;
'Tis rogues and villians fee the lawyers high,
And fee the men who gold and silver buy."

The fourth is a school of music, intending to divert the mind and touch the passions, and is admirably calculated to be a substitute for penitence, and the prologue to forbiddeu indulgences.

In the fifth is taught the art of dress. This is intended to hide deformity, and please the eye, to gain a fanciful pre-eminence, and wear the bell, as first in fashion. Glorifying in their shame for dress, was ordained in consequence of sin, and may be considered as a badge of fallen nature.

The sixth is a school of quacks. These have had success in imposing on the ignorant, by high souuding words. But the poor deceived sufferers at length detected the imposition and die to warn their survivors uot to partake of their follies.

In the seventh is taught the fasinating art of theatric representation. This is called a very moral institution by its advocates, who affect to consider it very corrective, of every species of vice. But matter of fact sufficiently proves that the theater is best supported, when vice most abounds.

The eighth is an establishment for the promotion of polite literature. Here leetures are given upon the barbarity and folly displayed by the writers of the Old and New Testament; and on the sublimity, beauty, elegance, taste and morality which are everywhere found, in a choice collection of romances and novels. This establishment is exclusively intended for privileged orders, such as have been distinguished by wealth and idleness, and such as had rather feel than thiuk. The ninth is a very extensive institution, having many united colleges, in which are taught the various arts of picking pockets, picking locks, stealing, highway robbery, house breaking, &c., and the progress of these pupils who are instructed in these various branchas, is really prodigious. There is also a department, an appendage to the former, where is taught the art of preparing and using false weights and measures; the method of raising false charges of managing, extortion, the excellent art of overbearing and over reaching in bargains, and the making of others extremity their own opportunity to be well served at their expense.

The eleventh is furnished with male and female instructors, for the improvement of talking, backbiting, lying, &c. Here also astonishiug progress is made by all the pupils of both sexes.

The twelth is a school for match making, and considering the motives which seem to govern most people on the subject of marriage, and the many unhappy families which are formed, it would appear that the wine of Bacchus furnished the stimulous, and Cupid and Hymen the only bands of union. But this is a private establishment, and their lessons secretly given.

The thirteeuth is the university of grandeur. Here Pompous show, empty titles, imputent flatteries, haugty oppressions, vain ignoracne, pampering luxury, and wanton revelling, are effectually taught. This establishmeut is the most popular, and scarcely a family can be found in all the precincts of Babylon, which is not ambitious to obtain a finishing touch to the education of their children, in the grand university. In this great city is erected the temple of Belus, called church, established by law. This is a towering building, exalted almost to the lowering sky, intended by its stupendous height to domineer over the conscience of all the people, and so imperious are the priests, that the temple of Belus could not be reared, but where the wine of Bacchus greatly abounds. The rites of this temple are very pleasing to Jupiter, the supreme god of the city, who is called the prince of this world, reigning in Babylon, over the children of disobedience without control. So much for mystical Babylon.

Inquirer having observed all these mysteries, still looking at causes and effects, was convinced that there was such a thing as an overrulling hand, who superintended the affairs of life, and governed in wisdom and goodness, as well as in mercy and justice, and mighty power. He perceived also, that there were many things in Babylon, which were opposed to the nature of this Supreme Ruler, and therefore could not be right, nor by any means spring from the same original fountain, and consequently must have proceeded from a different source. And lo! whilst sorely grieved at the condition of the deluded citizens of Babylon, an angelic voice called his attention, inviting to take a survey of a much more glorious city, the

CITY OF JERUSALEM.

This city is called Jerusalem, and is the glorious habitation of the moral governor, against whom the prince of this world had revolted, and set up his kingdom in Babylon. Jerusalem is situated in the new earth, where there is no sorrow, nor pain, neithnr frost nor chilling winds, but all is delight and tranquil, and the inhabitants have pleasure for evermore. Jerusalem is six thousand miles in circumference, and fifteen hundred miles in height, with a window which extends all around the city, through which the light shines out from within, to a vast distance, even to Babylon, so that people may see how to travel the road to Jerusalem There are twelve gates to the city, with an angel at each gate, to wait upon the heirs of salvation; and on the gates are written the names of the twelve tribes of the Children of Israel. The wall of the city has twelve foundations, and upon them are written the names of the twelve apostles of the Lamb. The city, the houses, are built of gold, the wall of Jasper, and the foundations between the gates were made of precious stones. The first foundation is a jasper, which is the color of white marble, with a light shade of green and red. The second a sapphire, which is sky blue, speckled with gold. The third of chalcedony i. e., a carbuncle, and of the color of red hot iron. The fourth an emerald, and is of a grass green. The fifth a sardon, red streaked with white. The sixth a sardius, which is a deep red. The seventh a chrysolyte, a deep yellow. The eighth is a beryll, a red green. The ninth a topaz, which is pale yellow. The tenth a chrysophase, greenish and transparent, with gold specks. The eleventh a jacinth, which is a red purple. The twelth an amethyst, a violent purple. The twelve gates are twelve pearls, each of the gates is of one pearl, and the streets of the city pure gold, and transparent as glass. The city hath no need of the sun, neither of the moon to shine on it, for the gates will not be shut by day and there is no night there. In this city there is a throne, belonging to the great King; round about it is a rainbow and four living creatures, four and twenty elders sitting upon thrones, clothed in white with crowns of gold upon their heads. Next to those were the saints, and then the angels encircled the whole, of which two hundred million were but a part, and they are of different orders, as the cherubim and seraphim, arch angels. From the throne proceeds a river, clear as crystal which is the water of Life, and those who drink it will never thirst. This city was prepared originally for man, from the foundation of the world, in the order of things, as primarily established by the Creator in his moral government.

Make to Yourselves Friends. No 3.

We infer from what is recorded in 1st John 3: 17, that a man who is in possession of an abundance of this world's good, and does not lend a helping hand to a poor brother, when he has an opportunity of doing so, can not be a true Christian. The scripture reads thus: "But whoso has this world's good, and seeth his brother have need, and shutteth up his bowels of compassion, how dwelleth the love of God in him?" "My little children," continues the beloved disciple, "let us not love in word, neither in tongue, but in deed and in truth." He also said, "We know that we have passed from death unto life, because we love the brethren." Our Savior said to his disciples, "By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love one to another." Love must be manifested, not only in words but by acts of kindness. Among the seven graces set forth by the apostle Peter, brotherly kindness ranks next to charity, which is said to be greater than either faith or hope. In reference to brotherly kindness, we remark farther, she will not allow any of the members of her fraternity to become a public charge to the kingdoms of this world. We are commanded to let our light so shine that men may see our good works and glorify our Father which is in heaven. If, when there is among us a poor brother or sister, especially an aged brother or sister or a widow, we bring them to our houses, or provide for them a comfortable habitation, and prepare for them subsistence, so that at least they may enjoy life as well as the generality of brethren, and we do it cheerfully, such acts speak louder than words. They would reflect like the sun. This would be letting our light shine to the extent that men would be constrained to glorify God, and that on our behalf. Who could do otherwise than admire a people who would deal thus to their poor? and who but an infidel would feel to reverence God, the author of so glorious a constitution which thus provides for her poor? But if, when we have any poor among us who are entitled to our charity, we let them struggle until starvation and cold seize their body, and compel the monster (death) to separate soul and body: where is the light? Great indeed is that darkness: and who would desire to become a member of such a society? Worship would well nigh become an abomination in the sight of the Almighty. We are exhorted to use hospitality toward one another; and that without grudging; for "God loveth a cheerful giver." Our charity, however, must not be confined to the brotherhood. The apostle would have us to be kind to strangers—yea to all men. "As we therefore have opportunity let us do good to all men, especially unto them who are of the household of faith." "He who soweth sparingly shall also reap sparingly; and he that soweth bountifully shall also reap bountifully." Great will be his reward who has liberally distributed his goods. "His righteousness remaineth forever." He will return with joy bearing his sheaves with him.

We are instructed by our Savior to love our enemies. Love to enemies must likewise be manifested by acts of kindness. Solomon says "If thine enemy be hungry, give him bread to eat; and if he be thirsty, give him water to drink; and the Lord shall reward thee." Prov. 25: 21, 22. If instead of threatening and forbidding them to enter our premises we invite them in and give them meat and drink; we may "make to ourselves friends;" yea we may "save a soul from death and hide a multitude of sins." James 5: 20. "Be not overcome with evil, but overcome evil with good:" is the divine injunction. Furthermore, our Savior instructed his disciples, saying: "If any man will sue thee at the law, and take away thy coat, let him have thy cloak also." We let him have our cloak, or some extra to show that we did not intend to defraud him: or if he has claimed aught from us unjustly, and by unfair means compelled us into measures; we willingly allow him to take still more; this might cause reflections which would never be forgotten. Our coat may be restored to us again: if not we are quite certain, the essence thereof (its value) will be laid up for us where thieves cannot approach, which would be far better. Our Lord also said: "And of him that taketh away thy goods, ask thou not again." (We are aware that the expressions are not popular; however, I wish to be understood that I do not labor for popularity.) If, when our goods are taken from us by unfair means, by force, by fraud or by theft, we, instead of resorting to the law, or of procuring a warrant and going from place to place, in search of our property, we at once commit our case unto the Lord; we shall receive a hundred fold. Says the great teacher: "There is no man who has forsaken houses or lands, father or mother, brother or sister, wife or children for my sake and the gospel's; but he shall receive a hundredfold." Matt. 10: 29, 30. The christian has an advantage over the people of this world, which is of inestimable value. The man of this world is apt to resort to the law for justice; and often continues suit until the cost exceeds the amount in dispute; and sometimes loses all at last; and if he would succeed in reclaiming his goods it will be but a short time at best, that he can enjoy them: but the christian (instead of "resisting evil") may lay up his goods where no thief can approach, where no power on earth can remove, nor even moth nor rust corrupt, which, with an increase, will be his portion forever to the joy and satisfaction of his soul. To the encouragement of those who do not belong to the family of Jesus, as well as to those who do; I will say: Every good deed, every charitable act bestowed upon the faithful follower disciple of Jesus will bring you a reward: even as low as a cup of cold water, given to any of his; in the name of a disciple or because they belong to Christ, shall be had in memorial by the impartial Judge." (Read Matt. 25: 31, 46, with this conversation, if you please). But perhaps some will console themselves, saying we have no poor among us: everybody seems to have a comfortable livelihood. If this be the case, we commend to you the noble proposition advanced in Companion Vol. 8, page 426, designed to raise means to equip Embassadors of Christ to disseminate the truths of primitive christianity to where the gospel is not proclaimed in full. Or if you prefer, send your spare dimes and dollars to the Companion office as charity fund; for the purpose of sending that welcome visitor, (C. F. C.) to those who are not able to pay, or send a copy for six months or a year to some of your friends or acquaintances, who live where you know primitive christianity is not practiced. This course would enable and encourage our brethren Editor's to do likewise. Not willing to be in the rear they would doubtless search out every place in the country wherever practicable, and send copies free to sections where the Ancient Landmarks are not observed. This would be "casting our bread upon the waters," in deed and in truth. The good which might result from such deeds are incomprehensible. The Companion was first sent to us prepaid for the space of about one year and six months by a kind brother. And although he may have forgotten us, I assure you kind reader, we have not forgotten him; and feel even now while penning these lines, to offer many thanks for the kind favor. The Lord will recompense him abundantly. In connection with this I wish to revert the mind of the reader to "the cheerful giver, in C. F. C., Vol. 8, page 583, "I love to give away the money you give me, don't you love to give away the money God gives you?"

I have now set before the reader, my view of the manner of making to ourselves friends of the "mammon of unrighteousness; yet there is another way of securing to ourselves friends; which requires neither gold nor silver nor goods, which is designed more especially for those who have not this world's goods at command; yet the rich may avail themselves of its blessings as well as the poor. Our loving Savior instructed his disciples, saying: "Bless them that curse, and pray for them that despitefully use you and persecute you. And unto him that smiteth thee on one cheek offer the other also. And whosoever shall compel thee to go a mile, go with him twain." To these divine injunctions, the bright follower of the meek and lowly Jesus will cheerfully submit (Acts 5: 40, 41). "Being reviled we bless; being persecuted we suffer it; being defamed we entreat;" is the maxim of the christian. (1 Cor. 4: 12, 13). Father, forgive them; forgive them! for they know not what they do: was the example of the Savior. Remember the golden rule in Matt. 6: 12: read it, if you please and in connection with it read Hymn No. 496 Brethren's Hymn Book. We may sum up the whole in very few words; namely, it is by keeping the commandments of God, that we make to ourselves friends and lay up for ourselves treasures in heaven. We are taught that all who would be happy, will have something to do, whether rich or poor, learned or ignorant, and although some have ten talents to occupy; those who have but one are not excusable if they do not improve. "Of him to whom much is committed, much will be required." I will say then, in the language of the poet,

"Do not then stand idly waiting,
For some greater work to do;
Fortune is a lazy goddess,
She will never come to you.
Go and toil in my vineyard,
Do not fear to do or dare,
If you want a field of labor,
You can find it anywhere."

The Body of Christ.

The question often presented to my mind, in my younger years was, "Where is the body of Christ?" And there are many more to whom this question presents itself, even after they are on the true way which leadeth to heaven. The reason probably is, because there are so many so called bodies, and if it were possible the very elect would be decieved, because there are some so near like us; but are not of us. The Apostle Paul, Cor. 1 : 12, teaches us that even as our natural body, so the body of Christ consists of many members, but all these members together constitute the body, and as is natural that each member has peculiar work to do, and if it faileth in one it is not a true body. And if they were all one member, where were the body? No doubt some of my readers have been at places of worship where there was disorder and confusion. Why is it? Because that body seems to have but two members—mouth and heart.—If the hands are to be opened to give a few pennies to the poor, they seem to be wanting. Other bodies, again, may have the hands and mouth; they give to the poor, but the mouth is sure to brag of it. These generally seem to have no hearts at all, or if they have, they seem to be of stone, in which the true love of God never existed.

Other bodies, again, are as the serpent in winter time, torpid, cold, lifeless, who will perhaps not wake up to life and duty until winter is past, and the day of grace is gone. Other bodies seem to be all head; they at least have all their members so high that the poor are unable to reach them. Some are all ears; they hear for others. Some are all eyes; they see others' faults, but not their own.

But the true body has all the members; the high and low, the comely and the uncomely. And the true body has living members. It hath a mouth to speak, eyes to see and watch, ears to hear, not for others, but for itself, hands to help the needy, feet to bear all the members along. And in my estimation, the foot, as a member in the Church, is one of the most necessary, also one of the most safe; for, as the darts of Satan generally are not aimed so low that they come to the humble foot, it is safe, and one of the most necessary, because when the other members get sick and sore, it tries to do its part nevertheless. Let us, therefore, if some of our members fail, if they get sick, let us, as the foot, humble ourselves, and help to bear them along, till the Great Physician is able to heal the diseased members. CYRUS BUCHER.

Avoidance.

I feel to give a few thoughts on the subject of avoidance, as recorded in First Corinthians, 5th chapter. Some brethren think we must avoid certain offenders outside of the Church. I understand that they must only be put out of the Church, and after that, hold them as we would all other sinners. I will give my views, so as to give the brethren an opportunity to correct me. The Apostle Paul is faulting the Corinthian brethren for not taking action and passing judgment upon a certain fornicator, admonishing them to put such a one away from among them. Who could undertake to say that the Apostle meant anything else, than to simply put him out of the Church, so as to let him know that he has no fellowship with the Church, with Christ, or with God; but that he is delivered back unto Satan, from whence he had been taken, and that by seeing where he is, it may destroy the works of the flesh, while in the flesh, so that the spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus.

In the second verse Paul says: "Ye are puffed up." In the sixth verse he says: "Your glorying is not good. Know ye not that a little leaven leaveneth the whole lump?" thereby admonishing them to be punctual, and purge out the old leaven, that they may be a new lump. Paul, no doubt, felt grieved that they did not take more heed to his teaching. And now he says, in the 9th verse, "I wrote unto you in an epistle, not to company with fornicators." Now for fear they might misunderstand him, and instead of avoiding fornicators in the Church, they might try to avoid such characters in the world, in their worldly dealings, he says: "Yet not altogether with the fornicators of this world," &c., for then ye must go out of the world," thereby giving them permission to deal with such characters in worldly matters. Now, in the 14th verse he tries to explain, and says: if any man that is called a brother, be a fornicator, not to keep company with him, but put him out of the Church. And if we should find out that one is guilty of such a crime, just shortly before a feast, we are not to eat with him, but get him to stay away from the table until he can be brought to council, and be expelled from the Church.

Now, taking the above view, it is easily understood, and can be complied with, without conflicting with other passages of Scripture. But to take the view that is approved of by the Annual Council, it is hard to understand, and is, according to our view, impossible to be complied with, without conflicting with other passages. The Apostles admonishes to put such away, as mentioned above, from among us. Now, to understand this literally, we must compel them to remove to some parts, away from the brotherhood. If he is allowed to remain in the vicinity of the brethren, he is still among us. We must compel him to stay away from our public meetings; if we do not he will be among us. If he comes into our houses, we must compel him to leave; if we do not he is among us. The Apostle forbids to company with fornicators, or, according to the German, have nothing to do with them. Now, to understand this literally, it includes a great deal; yes, I may say it includes all. We dare not buy of him, nor sell to him; we dare not work with him. If we see him in a helpless condition we dare not assist him. Yet Christ commands us to do good unto all men. If we see him destitute of food and raiment we dare not administer to his wants; yet Christ commands us to feed the hungry and clothe the naked. It would also separate man and wife. A sister would not dare to administer to her fallen husband. She would not dare to live with him. And in case of sickness she would not dare to wait upon him.

Dear brethren, the foregoing subject is a doctrinal point, and I suppose you are aware that we are divided on this point. It is therefore of great importance that we investigate the subject sincerely, and prayerfully, and inform ourselves, so that we may be prepared to give a reason of the hope that is in us. I hope that the Lord may direct us so that we may all have the same mind, and speak the same thing. Brethren, let us pray for love and union, without which it is impossible to meet the approbation of God.

Your unworthy brother in the Lord,

Love.

There is no subject that is made more prominent in the Holy Scriptures, than love; love to God and love to our fellow men. "He that loveth not knoweth not God, for God is love." In the first place, God requires the warmest and truest affections that we are capable of feeling. He must be loved above all other objects. We read that a certain one came to Jesus with the inquiry: "Master what is the great commandment in the law?" The answer was, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind. This is the first and great commandment. And the second is like unto it, Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself. On these two commandments hang all the law and the prophets."

If we say we love God, we must show our love by our works, and faith in his words. Christ says: "If ye love me keep my commandments;" that is keep all whatsoever I have commanded you. This of course includes all the ordinances of the New Testament. And again for this is the love of God, that we keep his (the Father's) commandments." Rev.

22 : 14. Also Rev. 14 : 12. "Here are they that keep the commandments of God, and the faith of Jesus." The faith or testimony of Jesus is his teaching, in the New Testament, while the commands of God are the great moral principles of love to God, and love to man. These are called the great commandments, while the ten commandments are called the lesser, or least commandments.

This will explain the query or answer of a brother in the last Companion : "What is meant by the expression of the Savior, he that breaks the least of these (ten) (see Ex. 20; James 2 : 10,) commandments, shall in no wise enter the kingdom of heaven." See Matth. 5 : 19. If we love Christ, his commands will be easy to be obeyed, and this is what the Savior meant when he said : "If ye love me, keep my commandments," which means all.

Again this is the love of God, (the Father) that we keep his commandments, and his commandments are not grievous, or hard to perform, but the child of God will say, with David of old, I delight in thy commandments. Please read Psalms 19, and 119.

The true and humble child of God, who sincerely loves God, will willingly and cheerfully obey all the Bible or God requires, at his or her hands.

But love should not stop here ; it should also be extended to our brethren and sisters, and to our fellow man in general. "If we love not those whom we see, how can we love God whom we have not seen ?" He that saith he is in the light, or is born of God, and hateth his brother, is in darkness, even until now. And in conclusion, let us hear what the wise man says : "Fear God and keep his commandments, for this is the whole duty of man." For, or because, God will judge us by this great rule, love to God and man. These commands will be the future rules of the judgments of God, as well as the present conduct of man.

Patient Little Fred, or, The Power of a Good Example.

BY SUDIE M THOMAS.

As I walked home from church one day,
I heard a little urchin say:
"Oh do stay, Willie dear."
And stopping in pretense to wait,
I plainly heard the boy relate,
The words I now place here:

"You know," said he, "if you should go,
Poor Ma and I would miss you so ;
Oh Willie do stay here.
I'll beg of father not to beat,
Or you so cruelly mistreat,
If you'll stay, Willie dear."

"If you should go so far away,
I could not live a single day,
Perhaps Ma, too, would die !
Then who would care for father, Will,
And drag him home as you do still ?
For far too small am I."

Thus plead the little child in woe,
"Dear brother Willie, do not go ;
And may be bye and bye,
Father will turn, and better be,
And we all happy days will see ;
Oh ! Willie, wait and try."

At last the elder brother said,
"You are a darling brother, Fred ;
And home with you, I'll go :
To bear these sufferings I'll try,
And perhaps Ma and you and I,
Yet happiness may know."

Oh noble hearted brother Will,
I know the Savior will fulfil,
His promises : and they
Are, unto those who ask, I'll give.
Then let us seek, and we'll receive,
Joys that fade not away.

To-day, Will is a fine young man,
Determined to do all he can
To make a happy home ;
And by himself 'tis often said,
"If it were not for brother Fred,
A profligate I'd roam."

Of father now new life we boast,
For he has joined that happy host,
Who are by Jesus led ;
But ere he left this world of woe,
Said he, "I shall, to heaven go,
Through patient little Fred."

And Ma, in age, doth constantly
Declare her crowning joy to be,
Dear patient, loving, Fred.
For, through this noble hearted boy,
They all have found a precious joy,
In Christ the living head.

Think of This.

"Be careful of your health, girls. Don't mind being called 'old fogy' because you wrap yourselves up well and never venture out in thin shoes. Better be an old fogy than a young invalid."

I do not know who wrote this advice, but practical experience has taught me its worth.

Is it not a pity, since the Creator has adapted the organs of the body to purposes for which he designed them, that girls who otherwise have good sense, exercise so little in regard to dress. Even some who the :

"cross have taken
All to leave and follow" the Savior, will wear garments so tight that it is impossible for them to take a natural breath, and shoes which cramp the feet into a shape quite different from the original. They scarcely reflect that hereby they impugn the wisdom of a loving Father, who would have us present our "bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God, which is our reasonable service." My object being simply to call attention to this matter, I abruptly submit it to the consideration of "all whom it may concern."

THE SILVER CUP.—There is a story of a servant receiving a silver cup from his master, who suffers it to fall into a vessel of aquafortis ; and seeing it disappear, contends in argument with a fellow-servant, that its recovery is impossible, till the master comes on the scene and infuses salt water, which precipitates the silver from the solution ; and then by melting and hammering the metal, he restores it to its original shape. A skeptic was so struck with this apologue that he renounced his dissent, and became a Christian.

CHARITY.—"The highest exercise of charity is, charity toward the uncharitable." "Though I speak with the tongues of men and of angels and have not charity I become as sounding brass, or a tinkling cymbal." Let us see that we have charity, and the Spirit of God predominant in our hearts. "If we have not the Spirit of God, we are none of his."

RURAL VALLEY, Pa.
March 11th, 1873

BROTHER HENRY:—Thinking that an item of correspondence might be of some interest to you and the readers of the COMPANION, we will give you a report of our journey thus far.

As you are aware, on account of the wreck a short distance east of Dale City, on the 7th inst., we were detained about three hours. We left 2: 15 P. M. Before we reached Mineral Point. a small bolt was lost from some part of the engine. Although it seemed to be a trivial loss, it had the effect of stopping the train, and detaining us about half an hour. Everything seemed to be important in its proper place. It is so, not only in machinery, but in the church of Christ. There are many members compacted and collected into one body. "And the eye cannot say unto the hand, I have no need of thee: nor again the head to the feet, I have no need of you. Nay, much more those members of the body, which seem to be more feeble, are necessary." 1 Cor. 12: 21, 22.

After the necessary repairs were made, we passed on without any farther hindrance, arriving safely at Pittsburg, about 10 o'clock P. M., four hours behind time. We lodged at the St. James Hotel. Our accommodations were good, and in the morning we felt much refreshed.

We left Pittsburg at 7: 20 A. M., and reached Kittanning, on the Alleghany Valley R. R. about 10 o'clock. This is 44 miles north of Pittsburg, and is the county seat of Armstrong county. After taking some recreation, and attending to a few matters of business. which we deemed of some importance, we announced ourselves ready to be conveyed to the home of our childhood and youth, Jacob Beer's twelve miles east of Kittanning.

The snow had disappeared; the roads were paved with mud; and we were annoyed by frequent and very strong blasts of wind. These combined, made our trip somewhat unpleasant; but this was modified a little by the many recollections, that were revived by the familiar objects and scenery along the way. It is strange how the past comes up and assists in forming our present state of existence. We reached our destination about half past three o'clock P. M., and found father's family in usual health and spirits.

We felt a little fatigued, and would have enjoyed a night's rest very much. This, however could not be, as there was an appointment for evening meeting, at the Baptist meeting-house, about two miles distant. We attended, and labored in the good cause, as the Lord gave ability. There was a good congregation of attentive listeners.

On Sunday 9th, at 10 o'clock A. M., we had meeting again at the same place. We endeavored to encourage our hearers to behold and meditate upon the love of God manifested toward us that we might become his children; and admonished them to be thankful and God-like.

We returned to father's dined, and then were conveyed by him, accompanied by brother J. B. Wampler, a distance of seven miles, te the Cowanshannoc meeting-house, where we had evening meeting. Here we met many familiar faces, and a number of brethren and sisters, with whom, in former years, we had often met and mingled in the worship of God. Many pleasant reminiscenses crowded upon us, and we felt to praise God, that we were permitted to meet again to serve the Lord and to labor together in his cause, As this was to be the first of a series of meetings, in this place, we thought it good to remind the brethren of the importance and worth of prayer; hence we discoursed upon the Lord's Prayer. We trust that some good was accomplished. It is to be feared, that this short but significant prayer, is, too often, merely repeated instead of being prayed with the Spirit and understanding.

We lodged at brother Wm. Rarigh's, who lives near by. Brother and sister Rarigh will be remembered by all who have visited this place; and their hospitality will not be forgotten before the Lord. Brethren Levi Wells and Robert Whitacre are the ministers in this congregation. Brother J. P. Hetric, of the Redbank branch, has also devoted part of his time and services to this arm of the church. We are sorry to learn that they are likely to lose his labors, for awhile, at least. There seems to be considerable interest manifested here, and we hope the Lord will revive his work and that many precious souls may yield to his claims.

Last night, (10th,) we again had a well filled house of interesting and apparantly, interested hearers. We feel assured that good impressions were made; and our prayer is, that the Lord will fasten and deepen them. It is, indeed, strange, that intelligent beings can see what God has done for their salvation, and yet not return one thank for all his grace, while at the same time, they studiously thank their friends for the most trivial gifts. Strange that persons will not love and glorify God, who has loved them so dearly and done so much for them. Surely it must be a want of meditation, that induces this indifference.

After the services were closed, brother Leonard White conveyed us to his home, where we passed a pleasant night, and, up to this time a pleasant day. We solicit an interest in the prayers of God's people.

It is a great relief to an editor to have good contributors, whose manuscript needs only to be read, punctuated, and then handed to the printers.

We are experiencing said fact just now, and highly appreciate the timely assistance of our correspondents. Hope there will be no relaxation for six months at least.

Will please take notice that brother E. J. What does it mean? Brother Fadely is very anxious to be in communication with him, and have him to move on his farm in Jasper county Iowa.

NEW YORK CITY, March 15th, '73.

Dear readers of our dear COMPANION. I have learned that by so long deferring to write, I have unconsciously deprived myself of what has since been to me the source of much pleasure. Since my last appeared in columns of the COMNANION, I have received a number of letters from some of my dear brethren—some old acquaintances, and some whom have known only by reputation, whose articles in our papers, I have frequently read with so much pleasure, and comfort to my soul, when weary and almost ready to despair. I trust my brethren who abound in "crumbs of comfort" will continue thus to "scatter seeds of kindness." We are so much encouraged and built up by the prayers and sympathy of those who in any manner, manifest an interest in our weal. For the information of those who, when visiting New York, may hereafter call to see me. I will say that my regular office hours are from eight to ten A. M. I was extremely sorry, and have been ever since, to have missed seeing those young brethren and sisters who called to see me on the eleventh of March; and who were described to me the next morning as "ladies and gentlemen, very neat and plainly dressed, and of very intelligent, yet modest appearance." Now I am very anxious indeed to ascertain who those intelligent, modest and plainly dressed laidies and gentlemen were. If they had called at my boarding house' Corner. Fourth-st, and Washington Square, they would have found me. I hope some one or more of the party will do me the kindness to let me know by some means, who they were. I would have gone to any part of the city, if they had left a card to indicate where they were stopping. If any of our fraternity should again visit, or pass through the city, they will find a most hearty welcome by calling on

On the Death of Brother Joseph Funk.

BY LOVINA H. BURKHART.

Schoolmates weep not for your father,
He has only gone to rest;
Gone to sleep that sleep in Jesus;
Happy Father! he is blest.
First your dear and sainted mother;
Journeyed through the shades of death;
Through that valley Jesus led her,
To a land of peace and rest.

Yes; in heaven your dearest mother
Waits for you to meet her there;
Watching for her children's coming—
Those she left behind her here.
Then your sister crossed the river,
Leaving husband, children, friends,
Home, and all her earthly treasures,
For that world that never ends.

Now your father, too, has left you,
But 'twas Jesus bid him come;
He had done with earthly sorrows,
God has taken him up home.
What to them were earthly treasures,
O the water's dreadful roar?
On the other side the river,
They had spied fair Canaan's shore.

You will miss them, oh, I know it!
I have lost some dear friends, too;
Well I know that deep, deep sorrow,
When a dear one's bid from view.
Death has robbed me of two brothers,
Who were ours to own and love,
And a darling little sister,
Who is now in heaven above.

Schoolmates, mourn not for your father,
He may dwell at God's right hand;
Fields of pasture, fresh and fragrant,
Blooming in that better land.
He has passed across the Jordan,
And has landed without fear.
Oh dear children, do not tarry—
Try to meet him over there.

All your brothers now are walking
In that road your parents trod;
And a sister, too, is trying,
To be owned a child of God.
Though a Christian's road is often
Marked with trials on the way,
Yet an advocate is promised:
Oh! then come, and don't delay.

Come to Jesus; long delaying
Won't insure that blest retreat;
Putting off this timely warning,
You may lose that mercy-seat.
Dearest schoolmates, don't be sorry,
All I wrote I mean for good:
Fain I'd leave all earthly treasures,
To be saved through Jesus' blood.

BROOKLYN, Iow, March 5th, 1873.

BROTHER HOLSINGER: You will please announce that the Brethren in the Middle District of Iowa, purpose holding their District Council Meeting, with the brethren in Dallas Co., in their meeting house, on Monday the 19th day of May, 1873. We expect a good representation of Delegates. Also a general invitation to the brethren to be with us.

J. S. SNYDER, Cor. Secretary.

BROTHER HENRY: With your consent I would like to say a few words through the COMPANION, in the reading of which we noticed several articles concerning the question, license or no license; a great moral question indeed, and demands of us as a Christian people a careful consideration, that we may do our part conscientiously in regard to its demands upon us, remember that this is going direct to the question at issue, it is voting for measure not for men. We argue it belongs to the world, so do many other things we take part in; and as to being exposed to danger, what can we engage in without being in danger, for we are taught to watch always. The apostle teaches that the effectual fervent prayer availeth much, but what would we think of the man who prayed every day for his bread, yet made no effort of the means within his reach to obtain it. Or the individual whose daily prayer was for salvation, yet lays no hold of the necessary means to obtain it; why our conclusion would be, it was not the prayer of faith, so in the case under consideration, if we love our neighbor, as our duty points out to us, as ourselves, we see them in danger, and especially the young in great danger, should we not help remove it? Would to God, every mother; every sister; in our county, had the privilege to help to decide so great and important a question. My humble prayer to God is that his spirit may direct in our duty.

BROTHER HENRY: You will please publish through the C. F. C. that arrangements have been made from Chicago to Pittsburg, on the Pan Handle road, for the brethren going to the Annual Meeting to be held in Dale City, Pa., in June next, on the following terms: Those going to the Annual Meeting must leave at Chicago, on Thursday morning, May 29th. They should club together. Clubs from 20 to 30 in number, will pass for 5 cents a mile. From 30 to 39 4½ cents, and 40 and upward for 4 cents and return free.

The idea of leaving Chicago at the time named, is to connect with others, so if their club is not filled they may meet them by the way. The brethren at Richmond, Ind. will start May 30th, at 3 o'clock A. M., and those at Piqua, Ohio, May 30th, at 7 A. M.

Those being of this number, will call for their free return tickets at the office on their way to the Annual Meeting. Those free return tickets will be good for 30 days. Understand me, this is only on the Pan Handle R. R.

Profanity.

MR. EDITOR: Upon meditation I concluded that I would put forth before your readers another subject for thought and reflection, viz: Blasphemy, which I feel is a great and crying sin in our christian land, when at the same time, it is so strongly forbidden in the teaching of the Savior, who informs us in plainer terms, to "Swear not at all, neither by heaven, for it is God's throne; nor by the earth, for it is his footstool; neither by Jerusalem, for it is the city of the great King; neither by thy head, because thou cans't not make one hair white or black." Matth. 5: 34, 35, 36. This is the plain declaration or teaching of Jesus, and the majority of the world recognizes his word as truth. And we make no hesitancy in saying that profanity is a mark of very low breeding, and no one who indulges in the ugly and low practice can have a proper love for order or right. Is there not sufficient language in the world's great lexicon to use without profaning God's holy name? And when the great Teacher himself has told us in such emphatic language, to swear not at all, without any coloring whatever, and spoken by one who spoke as never man spake, and those teachings were for the world to example after and obey. But alas! how many are wandering farther and farther away from the fold. Wickedness is stepping forth in all gaudy coloring of vice. And among the many, is profanity. Why is it I ask? is it because the professing Christian passes it heedlessly by, without a word of warning for those who indulge in this great and growing evil? Is there not beauty enough in the Christian garb to encourage the wanderer to seek to obtain that dress which is composed of delightful colors, such as faith, virtue, knowledge, temperance, patience, godliness, brotherly kindness, and charity? And we are told if these abound, they make us that we are neither barren nor unfruitful always abounding in the work of the Lord.

"What God Blesses."

Pleasant View, Pa.

God blesses very slender things to the conversion of souls. It is very humbling, sometimes, to a preacher who thinks, "Well, I did preach a pretty fair sermon that time, to find God does not care a pin about him or his sermon, and that a stray remark he made in the street which he hardly thought was of any value whatever was what God has blessed; that when he thought he had succeeded best he had done nothing, and when he thought he had succeeded worst then God blessed him. Many a soul has had his eyes opened by an instrumentality which he never dreamed of being so useful; and, indeed the whole way of salvation is in itself extremely simple, so as to be well compared to the clay and spittle which the Savior used. I do not find many souls converted by bodies of divinity. We have received a great many into the Church, but never received one who became converted by a profound theological discussion. We very seldom hear of any great number of conversions under very eloquent preachers—very seldom indeed. We appreciate eloquence, and have not a word to say against it by itself, but evidently it has no power spiritually to enlighten the understanding, neither does it please God to use the excellency of words for conversion.—When Paul laid aside human wisdom and said he would not use the excellency of speech, he only laid aside what would not have been of much service to him. When David put off Saul's armor, and took the sling and stone, he slew the giant; and giants are not to be conquered to-day any more than they were then by champions arrayed in Saul's armor. We must keep to the simple things, to the plain gospel, plainly preached.—Spurgeon.

How Did the Apostles Baptize?

In COMPANION, present Vol., No. 9 Dr. E. L. Mackey, propounds a query: "Are the apostles to be blamed for not baptizing in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, as it stands in Matthew 28: 19? Or did the Lord Jesus give this command in a parable, or mistery, to his apostles, and then give Peter the keys to reveal his mysteries, first at Jerusalem, and then at Samaria, and to all nations?"

This query is stated very strangely, and cannot be answered directly, without assenting that the apostles did baptize different from the commission, a thing that the Bible does not teach, neither should we. To the law and testimony.

The Savior gave the commission in these words: "All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth, go teach all nations baptising them in the name of the Father &c. Mark, the original is "eis to ovo ma" into the name &c Now the apostles in recording the accessions by baptism, express it in two forms, viz: "They were baptised in the name of Jesus." "ellti tio onomati" and again by "en to onoma and is rendered, "in the name of Jesus," while the first is by some rendered "upon the name of Jesus." Now there is quite a difference between baptising into the name of, and baptising in the the name of. In the name of, implies, by the authority of, or upon the authority of Jesus Christ. Hence the apostles baptised by the authority of, or upon the authority of Jesus Christ, who had given them a "formula" for all time and for all nations, namely, "baptise them into the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost.

Our conclusion is, that the apostles did baptize into the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. And the reason why we believe it, is because they were commanded to do so, and that the Bible does not say they did not.

Pride.

"And be not conformed to this world, but be ye transformed." Rom. 12: 2.

Dear brethren and sisters, I have often thought of writing for the Companion, but as often as I thought of writing, just that often I felt my inability. But this Sabbath morning, I will try to write a few lines for the first time.

Paul says, we are not to be conformed to this world. I think when Paul used this language he meant, not to be conformed to this world in dress, as well as in conversation, actions, &c. And I fear many of us are decorating those perishable bodies of ours too much after the fashions of this world. Pride is creeping into the church, little by little, and it is to be feared ere long the good old order that our forefather's taught, will be lost sight of. And my dear brethren, this ought not so to be.

Some say if the heart is right, all is right. So say I; but if the heart is right we will not dress after the fashion of this sinful world. "By the tree you shall know the fruit." Then if we have the uniform on the body, it will show to the world that there is fruit on the tree, not in the heart only, but on the branches of the tree also. Ye are the light of the world; a city that is set on a hill cannot be hid. Matt. 5: 14. If we dress in the fashion of the world, where is the light? We fear it is where it cannot be seen. "Neither do men light a candle and put it under a bushel, but on a candle-stick, and it giveth light to all that are in the house." Matt. 5: 15. If the heart is right, and we dress in the fashion of the world, the light is under the bushel, and cannot be seen. But if we put the light on the candlestick, which represents the body, in my opinion, it can be seen by all. Then our light will so shine that it can be seen by all, and others, seeing our good works, will glorify our Father which is in heaven.

Now my dear brethren let us try to follow in the humble paths that our forefathers traveled in, believing the Holy Spirit is not changable. And that it taught our humble old brethren, one hundred years ago, that plain dress, chaste conversation, meekness, and perfect resignation to what God says in his word, was necessary to their eternal welfare, is just as binding on us to-day, as it was on them in that time. If we depart from the order and simplicity which they observed, saying it is necessary to have an educated ministry, after the fashion of the world, do we not admit that they were wrong, or that the Holy Spirit taught them one thing, and now us differently? Let us love each other with a pure heart fervently, and ask God to keep us faithful to our promises. In love and fellowship.

I. H. CHRIST.

Tirden, Ills.

In Memory of Sister Sarah Furgason.

We have frequently looked, in silent meditation at the favor of our Father in heaven, during the past year, to us, as a congregation. Our spiritual horizon has once in a while been brightened by seeing those whom we loved, turn their faces toward the heaveuly Jerusalem, to seek the face and favor of that Father, whose mild entreaties of mercy they long slighted. The strong man, in full vigor of life, came, and the sweet blushing maiden also sought a home in the fold with God's people. While we rejoiced thus, in God our Savior, in the prosperity of his kingdom, we still had our moments of heaviness of heart, as we from time to time in our ministerial labor, called to see our sister, beloved in the Lord upon whom the afflicting hand of Providence was laid for the space of two years, in disease, so . deforming in its nature; dropsy. The destroyer of happiness and health, finally carried her away. During two full years of suffering, not a murmur was uttered, and we were truly made to feel that, "In your patience ye possess your souls." Sister Sarah sometime before her illness, connected herself with the "Brethren in Christ," or as they are more familiarly known, from their origin, "Shumakarians." She lived with them for some time, apparently in good faith, but when the king of terrors began to move in ghastly array before her face, threatening with his weapons of war to lay her low, and the mind pictured the turbid waters of the Jordan of death, she thought it not best to die there, and during the winter of 1873, while brother Calvert was with us, she made application to be received into the fold of Jesus. Accordingly on the 23rd of January, 1872, she, too weak to walk, she was taken to the water in a sleigh, and immersed according to the Lord's direction; and though very weak, she endured as a faithful soldier of the cross. She was a few days afterward anointed with oil in the name of the Lord. During the space of a little over a year she was tapped 11 times, and 32 gallons of water extracted from her. Thus she lingered, till the morning of the 4th of March, when the Spirit escaped from its prison of its clay, and took its flight to world's unknown. The next day the bereaved family with her numerous friends conveyed her to the narrow house, and left her among the remembered dead, till God shall bid her rise to a mansion at his right hand. On the following Sunday we all met again to participate in the general services, which were conducted in order, and remarks offered from 2nd Cor. 5: 1, which we hope will be remembered, and all may follow on to know the Lord. It was sorrowful te give our sister up at the youthful age of 22 years, 3 month and 18 days. But we hope to bow and say, "Thy will ob God be done."

Ts the kind family and relatives, yes to all we say prepare to meet your God, for we all must die. Ob that when we are called to die we may be ready, so our Lord may say to us, come up higher. May the comforting grace of God be with those who mourn her early departure from earth.

Outlines of a Sermon,

Delivered in the Berlin Congregation, November 23rd, 1872, by brother John Blough, from Ohio.

PREPARATION FOR JUDGMENT AND THE FINAL ISSUE.

"The Almighty God, even the Lord, hath spoken and called the earth, from the rising of the sun unto the going down thereof. Out of Zion, the perfections of beauty, God hath shined. Our Lord shall come, and shall not keep silence; a fire shall devour before him, and it shall be very tempestuous round about him. He shall call to the heavens above and to the earth, that he may judge his people." Psalm 50, 1—4.

The sermon on the occasion referred to above, was delivered in the German language, and in my estimation would be worthy of publication at any time. And as I have taken no note of the speaker at the time I must solely depend upon memory. I shall therefore recapitulate as nearly and as briefly as I can, the sentiments of the speaker, as expressed on the above subject matter before him on that occasion.

After a brief exordium, the speaker went on to say that "All Scripture is given by inspiration of God and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction, in righteousness," &c. The language under consideration is a portion of God's word, and is in the same way profitable.

He went on then to define the text as it stands in its several parts, in regular rotation, by calling attention first to the appellation, Almighty, as applied to God; that he was that all powerful Being, and is the same to-day yesterday and forever, being the Creator and preserver of heaven and earth. Well might the Savior say: "All power is given me in heaven and in earth. He is the "head of all principality and power," even "the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth." God is also omnipresent. We cannot flee from his presence, and wherever people are there God is. His all piercing eye is over us and about us, and consequently all our actions and doings are exposed to his naked eyes. The Scriptures say: "Where two or three are gathered together in his name there am I in the midst." Not only is God omnipotent and omnipresent, but he is also omniscient. Even from the beginning he knew what was in man, and in consequence the plan of redemption was laid before the foundation of the world. Such prerogatives God has reserved unto himself, and the full and definite import these words imply, can only be exercised and executed by the Deity himself. This Almighty, Allknowing, and Allseeing God, in the language of the text, "Hath spoken and called." Here we shall notice the difference between simply speaking and calling, and also whom he called, &c.

When we speak to an individual in our immediate presence, we do so in our ordinary tone of voice, as in common conversation. It would be impolite and unbecoming to modulate in a high key, our thoughts and ideas, to persons in our midst. But when persons have gone from us a distance, and we would call their attention, in order to communicate our thoughts we have to resort to calling, especially when we have anything to do for them. But when ordinary calling fails, we have other and various means to call. The farmer calls home his laborers to the board of refreshment by means of horns, bells, &c. The sexton calls people to church service by tolling the bell. Still more indirectly, we call through the medium of the press, by way of notification.

In the same way, comparatively speaking, God speaks and calls, and speaks to the people. Under the old dispensation God spake to the people through the prophets, and under the christian through his Son. Paul in writing to his Hebrew brethren makes mention of these things, and says: "God, who at sundry times and in divers manners, spake, in times past, unto the fathers, by the prophets, hath, in these last days, spoken unto us, by his Son."

He calls "the earth from the rising of the sun unto the going down thereof." The words, "the earth," signify the people on the earth, and "from the rising of the sun unto the going down thereof, implies all on whomsoever the sun shines. No one is excluded, now, who received the glad tidings of salvation. The Savior says: "Many are called but few are chosen." God calls in many ways, and also uses different means in accomplishing his ends. But chiefly he calls through his word, by the foolishness of preaching. Watchmen are stationed upon the walls of Zion, and through their earnest labors many a wretched soul, polluted with sin, has been made to feel the need of a Savior, and calls have been effected. God does not leave himself without a witness; he does his part, if man would only respond and come under the mild sceptre of King Emmanuel. But says some one, how can we know when we are called. Just whenever we feel the operations of God's spirit operating upon our hearts, and feel that all is not well. When we feel thus condemned we may rest assured that God calls and knocks at the door of our hearts, either through preaching, through the death of some near or dear relative, or whatever it may be, that brings home to our minds the thought of death, eternity and the judgment.

DIED.

We admit no poetry under any circumstances in connection with Obituary Notices. We wish to use all alike, and we could not insert verses with all.

At Garrett, Pa., in the Elklick congregation; March 14th, ROSIE REBECCA, infant daughter of brother Daniel D. and Catharine HOOVER, aged 10 months and 5 days. Funeral services by the editor of the COMPANION.

In the Nettle Creek congregation, Wayne county, Ind., Oct. 7th, 1872, sister ANNA, wife of brother Gabriel HARDMAN, aged 35 years, 8 months and 29 days. Disease, consumption. She was afflicted a long time, but her patience was sufficient unto the end. She passed away with a bright, angelic countenance. She was a worthy sister and mother. She leaves a loving husband, and two children to mourn her untimely departure, but they have the consolation, in that, they have hope. Funeral by the Brethren, from Cor. 1: 15, 22.

Also, in the same congregation, Jan. 28, sister JEMIMA, wife of brother Israel HARDMAN, aged 33 years, 1 month and 15 days, of typhoid and spotted fever. She was well as usual only four days previous to her death. She was a model sister in the Church, always plain, always sober, and inoffensive. A short time before her death, she took her husband by the hand, and said that she had lived a happy life with him, and that it was a happy thought that she could live, die, and be saved in the Lord. She then kissed him, and departed, leaving him and three small children to mourn the loss of a dear friend.

Funeral by the Brethren, from Amos, 4: 12.

Also, in the same congregation, Feb. 23d, sister ELIZABETH, wife of brother Daniel HARDMAN, and mother-in-law of the above two, aged 67 years, 5 months and 19 days.—She was one of the most exemplary members in the Church. Her seat was never vacant at meeting when health permitted, and it was possible for her to be there. The Church and neighborhood feel the loss of her, as well as the large circle of friends and relatives. Her children, eight in number, with their surviving companions, were all called in, and were by her bedside, and a short time before she died, having presence of mind, she gave them such counsel, that they will not soon forget. Funeral by the Brethren, from Rev. 14: 13.

The Christian Family Companion, Is published every Tuesday, at $1.50 a year, by Henry R. Holsinger, who is a member of the Church of the Brethren, sometimes known by the name of "German Baptists," and vulgarly or maliciously called "Dunkards."

The design of the work is to advocate truth, expose error, and encourage the true Christian on his way to Zion.

It assumes that the New Testament is the Will of God, and that no one can have the promise of salvation without observing all its requirements, that among these are Faith, Repentance, Prayer, Baptism by trine immersion, Feet Washing, the Lord's Supper, the Holy Communion, Charity, Nonconformity to the world, and a full resignation to the whole will of God, as he has revealed it through his Son Jesus Christ.

So much of the affairs of this world as may be thought necessary to the proper observance of the signs of the times, or such as may tend to the moral, mental, or physical benefit of the Christian will be published, thus removing all occasion for coming into contact with the so-called Literary or Political journals.

Subscriptions may begin at any time.

The Inconsistency of Bloodshed and Self-defense.

The minds of the popular are led to believe that the Word of God will sustain them in protecting the nation, themselves their persons, and their property. Others tell us that national defense is forbidden in the Word of God, but that it is every person's duty to protect himself, his person and property, and should they shrink from this duty, they would deem themselves guilty of transgressing the Gospel of Christ. Here are two propositions, and I shall protest against them both.—The latter is the more gross and absurd doctrine. The doctrine that will substantiate individual defense, will also establish national defense. I shall notice them both in connection.

I have already stated that the latter is of a more dangerous character than the former, because it has made its way into the Church of Christ. When I say the Church of Christ, I mean a body of believers that has no non-essentials. The Devil cannot persuade the members of this body to believe that it is right to go forth in defense of his country, where human beings are slaughtered by the thousands. But he will try his utmost to persuade them to believe that he has a just right to defend himself, his person and his property. Brethren, I am grieved to the very bottom of my heart, and lamentable that I must state here, that the enemy has prevailed upon some of the members of the Church of Christ.—I cannot say that I hope there are no brethren that will advocate the doctrine of self-defense. But there are some that will justify themselves in defending their person and property by a deadly weapon, and not a few that will justify themselves in defending their persons and property by some other means, which are equally the same. There are some brethren, yea some that are set apart, as it were, watchmen upon the walls of Zion, that would arm themselves with a deadly weapon, in case of emergency. Oh, this makes my heart throb, as I pen it down! Christ said unto Peter, "Put up thy sword in its sheathe;" and you profess to follow Christ, and yet take the privi-privilege of pulling it out again. Can the spirit of Christ and the carnal sword dwell together in the heart? I shall answer this in its course.

The aforesaid ministers will get up behind the desk, and proclaim that if it is required, we must lay down our lives for Christ's sake, and the Gospel's. Oh, Consistancy, blush! This forces me to quote the language of the Savior, where he says, "all, therefore, whatsoever they bid you observe, that observe and do, but do not ye after their works, for they say and do not." Matt. 23: 3

I also have heard brethren say, that it would not be expedient to tell the world the doctrine of non-resistence, in its full extent, because they would do thus and so with us. I have not as yet learned that we have any right to assume such authority, to withhold a part of the doctrine of Jesus Christ from the world, and keep it confined in the Church. "Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven." Matt. 3: 16. How can we let our light shine, unless we walk in the light, as he is in the light. The Apostles feared God above men. Paul says, "wherefore I take you to record this day, that I am pure from the blood of all men, for I have not shunned to declare unto you all the council of God;" Acts 20: 26, 37

Paul says at another place, that these things were not done in a corner. Brethren, let us all remove the thoughts of self-defense, for if we only even harbor this thought, we commit sin. Jesus Christ declared, himself, that "whosoever looketh on a woman, to lust after her, hath committed adultery with her already in his heart;" Matt. 5: 28, John says, "Whosoever hateth his brother is a murderer." By this we understand that we can murder spiritually, by evil thoughts.

It is evident by the foregoing language, that if we harbor an evil thought, we commit the same sin, as though we had brought the thought into action. "Dearly beloved, avenge not yourselves, but rather give place unto wrath, for it is written, 'vengeance is mine, I will repay, saith the Lord.'" Rom. 12: 19. Christ says "pray for them which despitefully use you," but carnality will say, combat with your enemies. I am forced to believe of such that uphold the doctrine of self defense, are led by a spirit of deception, agreeable to the carnal mind, which is not subject to the law of God, because the carnal mind is at enmity against God, for it is not subject to the law of God, neither can be;" Rom. 8: 7. "And of him that taketh away thy goods ask them not again;" Luke 6: 30. For ye suffer if a man bring you into bondage, if a man devour you, if a man take of you, if a man exalt himself, if a man smite you in the face;" Cor. 11: 20. I will here say, by the language of Samuel: "Hath the Lord as great delight in burnt offering and sacrifice, as in obeying the voice of the Lord; behold to obey is better than sacrifice, and to hearken than the fat of rams. For rebellion is as the sin of witchcraft, and stubbornness is as iniquity and idolatry." According to the laws of our country, we have a right to defend ourselves; also to shed blood in time of hostility, and in self defence. This law then must be based upon that law which says, "eye for eye, tooth for tooth, hand for hand, burning for burning, wound for wound, stripe for stripe. Now let us hear Christ; "But I say unto you, that ye resist not evil, but whosoever smiteth thee on thy right cheek, turn to him the other also; Matt. 5: 39.

But we are told "if you call for such passages of scripture to prove non-resistance, you represent God as a flexible being, for the Bible is the greatest war book I ever saw, and it is declared that he is unchangeable, the same yesterday, today, and forever. And Jesus Christ declared himself, that he came not to destroy the law, or the prophets, but to fulfil." I will try by the assisting grace of God to make it clear that Christ did fulfil and not destroy, notwithstanding he gave us a different law to that of Moses.

In a certain degree, Melchisedec was a type of Christ. The Lord hath sworn, and will not repent. "Thou art a priest forever, after the order of Melchisedec;" Psalms 110: 4. "If, therefore, perfection were by the Levitical priesthood, for under it the people received the law, what farther need was there that another priest should rise, after the order of Melchiedec, and not be called after the order of Aaron. For the priesthood being changed, there is made of necessity a change also of the law;" Heb. 7: 11, 12. "For there is verily a disannuling of the commandment going before, for the weakness and unprofitableness thereof;" Heb. 7: 18. Here a question may arise in the minds of some, in regard to the change of the law. Space will not allow me to go into a full detail of the subject.

When Christ arrived to the age of about thirty years, he took the mission, of which was prophesied that he should perform. When the law of a carnal commandment came to an end, and the Christian—the spiritual dispensation was ushered in. "For all the prophets and the law prophesied until John." Matt. 11: 13. "The law and the prophets were until John, since that time the Kingdom of God is preached, and every man presseth into it;" Luke, 16: 16. "For verily I say unto you, till heaven and earth pass, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law, till all be fulfilled: Matt., 5: 18. When Christ spoke this language he had not yet finished his wonderful council, neither had he suffered all the derision that was prophesied of him, nor had he yet been wounded for our transgressions, or bruised for our iniquities.—After he had performed all things which were prophesied, he ascended to his Heavenly Father. I deem it unnecessary to add any more testimony, as I think it is clear unto every unprejudiced mind, that Christ fulfilled the law to the very letter, notwithstanding he left us a different law to that of Moses.

I have already stated that Melchisedec was a type of Christ, and it is declared that he was a king of righteousness, and after that also King of Salem, which is king of peace. "For unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given, and the government shall be upon his shoulders, and his name shall be called Wonderful Counsellor, the Mighty God, the Everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace;" Isa., 9: 6. Here we have the antitype, the Prince of Peace. "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, goodwill towards men;" Luke, 2: 14.—Christ has illustrated his introduction very beautifully by precept and example. "For even hereunto were ye called, because Christ also suffered for us, leaving us an example that ye should follow his steps; who, when he he was reviled, reviled not again, when he suffered he threatened not, but committed himself to him that judgeth righteously;" 1 Peter, 2: 21, 22. "From whence come wars and fightings among you? come they not hence, even of your lusts that war in your members? James, 4: 1. It is lamentable to think what an amount of human blood has been shed since the Prince of Peace has made his appearance; and what makes it yet more lamentable, is that thousands, yea millions that profess to be governed by the spirit of Christ have shed human blood. The Temple which Solomon built was to represent the Church, under the Christian dispensation. David was a man of war, and yet a man after God's own heart. David, no doubt was justifiable in engaging in those wars but hear what God says to him, with reference to building the Temple: "And David said to Solomon, my son, as for me, it was in my mind to build a house unto the Lord my God; but the word of the Lord came to me saying: Thou hast shed blood abundantly, and hast made great wars; thou shalt not build a house unto my name, because thou hast shed much blood upon earth in my sight." Chron. 22: 7, 8. "Know ye not that ye are the Temple of God, and that the spirit of God dwelleth in you? If any man defile the temple of God, him shall God destroy, for the temple of God is holy, which temple ye are." 1 Cor. 3: 16, 17. David, therefore, being a man of war, having shed blood, was not permitted to build the temple, the house of the Lord. The temple, the type, was to be built by hands free from blood, so the antitype, the spiritual house is to be composed of material unstained by human blood. "Ye also, as lively stones are built up, a spiritual house." 1 Peter, 2: 5. "In whom all the building, fitly framed together, groweth unto an holy temple in the Lord. Eph. 2: 21.

But again, we are positively commanded that we should be subject to the higher powers. "Let every soul be subject to the higher powers, for there is no power but of God; the powers that be are ordained of God. Whosoever, therefore, resisteth the powers, resisteth the ordinance of God, and they that resist shall receive to themselves damnation." Rom., 13: 1, 2. This requires obedience to the higher powers. The character of this power must be a God-fearing power, to make it obligatory, for Peter and the other Apostles said to that power: "We should rather obey God than men." So we conclude, whenever that power comes in contact with the gospel, our course is plain; and if required to obey that power, however inconsistent to godliness, then was Daniel guilty, for he disobeyed that power, and so did also Shadrack, Meshack, and Abednego. It is our bounden duty to render passive obedience wherein that power does not conflict with the spirit of the gospel. "Render therefore unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's and unto God the things that are God's," Matt. 22: 21. We must forebear evil, and do that which is good, and we shall have praise of the same. We must willingly pay our taxes, for thus it is commanded. Christ, Himself, paid tribute money. Render, therefore, to all their dues, tribute to whom tribute is due, custom to whom custom, fear to whom fear, honor to whom honor." Rom., 13: 7. The Pharisees were terribly dismayed when their power was weakened by the doctrine of Christ. Had Christ preached and practiced the doctrine of self-defense, they would not have been afraid of the Romans taking away both their place and nation. "If we let him thus alone, all men will believe on him, and the Romans shall come and take away both our place and nation." John, 11: 48. The Apostles were very dull in comprehending the doctrine of Christ. They were so attached to the Mosaic law, that they were ready at any time to defend themselves and their Lord; and after they were fully established in the truth, they were willing to suffer martyrdom. They also disobeyed that power of which I have already treated. "Then Simon Peter, having a sword, drew it and smote the high priest's servant, and cut off his right ear. Then said Jesus unto Peter, put up thy sword into the sheath." John, 18: 10, 11. And, my Christian friends, there it will remain as long, as the spirit of Christ dwelleth in our hearts. Christ touched the ear which Peter had cut off, and healed it.—How beautifully he exemplified his introduction; he blessed his worst enemies, those who would have taken his life from him. And upon another occasion, his disciples asked him whether they should command fire to come down from heaven and consume their enemies. But he turned and rebuked them, and said: "ye know not what manner of spirit ye are of." "If we attach ourselves to the kingdoms of this world, we have a legal right to fight: But if we attach ourselves to this body, we are no more in the kingdom of Christ. Jesus says, "My kingdom is not of this world. If my kingdom were of this world, then would my servants fight." Hence, whenever we become servants of this spiritual kingdom we have no right to fight under any circumstances. The gospel permits us to defend ourselves by the sword of the spirit which is the word of God. Paul, when taken prisoner by the power of the law, used the sword of the spirit in his defense.—"For the weapons of our warfare are not carnal, but mighty through God, to the pulling down of strongholds, casting down imagination, and every high thing that exalteth itself against the knowledge of God, and bringing into captivity every thought to the obedience of Christ." Cor., 10: 4, 5. Paul had almost succeeded in pulling down King Agrippa's strongholds, and cast down his imaginations and every high thing that exalteth itself against the knowledge of God; for Agrippa confessed, and said unto Paul, "almost thou persuadest me to be a Christian." Acts, 26: 28. Hence, it is our privilege, as well as our duty, to use the sword of the spirit in our defense.—Paul says, "be ye followers of me, even as I also am of Christ." It has been alleged to me, that those that advocate the doctrine of non-resistance had no right to escape out of the hands of their enemies, for thereby they would be seeking their lives, and Christ said, "if we will save our life, we shall lose it." My dear brethren and friends, remember that Christ has left us an example, that we should follow his steps. I affirm that we have a legal right to escape out of the hands of our enemies, for Jesus Christ, our leader, on certain occasions, escaped the hands of his enemies. "Therefore, they sought again to take him, but he escaped out of their hands." John, 10: 39. "Then took they up stones to cast at him, but Jesus hid himself." No one will doubt but what Christ had power to quench his enemies, even by thought, without doing the least injury to the doctrine of non-resistence. From this we can learn a worthy and powerful lesson, that the creator hid himself from his creatures. "Greater love hath no man than this, that he lay down his life for his friends. Ye are my friends, if ye do whatsoever I command you." John, 15: 13, 14. "For whomsoever will save his life shall lose it, but whosoever shall lose his life for my sake, and the gospel's the same shall save it." Mark, 8: 35.—Christ says, "Be ye wise as serpents and harmless as doves. Blessed are the peace makers, for they shall be called the children of God." Matt., 5: 9. Paul says, "and have your feet shod with the preparation of the gospel of peace." Eph., 6: 15. "Not rendering evil for evil, or railing for railing, but contrarywise, blessing; knowing that ye are thereunto called, that ye should inherit a blessing." 1 Peter, 3: 9. A few words in regard to being in the minority. The great men, and the clergy in general, except a few sects, are in opposition to the heading of this article. God's people have been in the minority ever since sin entered the world. Then said Elijah unto the people: I, even I, only remain a prophet of the Lord, but Baal's prophets are four hundred and fifty men." These no doubt, were great men of the world, and could pray eloquently, and yet all were false prophets. See 1 Kings, 18th and 22d chapters. And as to avoiding the pains of persecution, we would answer in the language of the three Hebrew children: "We are not careful to answer thee in this matter. If it be so, our God whom we serve is able to deliver us; but if not, be it known unto thee, that we will not serve thy gods, nor worship the golden image which thou hast set up." See Daniel, 3d chapter.

It has also been said to me, that according to the doctrine which I have set forth in this article, there were no Christians upon the earth. I will try and remove this error in a few words. As soon as Noah and his family had entered the ark, every being that drew breath was destroyed. And again, as soon as Lot, his wife and two daughters had left Sodom, it was destroyed, for there were no Christians there to preserve Sodom. The Christian is the salt of the earth; we all know that anything that is to be preserved by salt, and if we neglect to salt it, how soon it will go to waste. So it would be with the present dispensation. If the Christians were all extinct from the earth, the present existing state of things would soon come to an end. Ye are the salt of the earth." Matt., 5: 13.

We shall call up one more witness, then we shall leave it to your serious and prayerful consideration. It is evident by the Apostle Paul's language, that there will be Christians upon the at Christ's second coming. Behold I show you a mystery. We shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed. 1 Cor., 15: 51.—"Then we which are alive and remain, shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air and so shall we be ever with the Lord. Wherefore comfort one another with these words." PERRY A. MILLER.

Love and Fear.

"For God has not given us the spirit of fear, but of power, and of love, and of a sound mind. 2 Timothy, 1: 7.

In the passage of Scripture heading this article, we have a fear referred to, by the Apostle, which is not of God.—Therefore has a soul destroying influence, where it predominates. It is very common in human nature, and develops itself the most in the proud heart. It keeps the soul away from God, but permits it to travel the broad road to destruction, with pleasure; and while it permits us to commit the greatest crime, or sin, with boldness, and courage, it intimidates us to do the least act in the service of God.

Dear reader, is this your experience? Do you fear you will lose your worldly pleasure if you come to Christ? or your reputation, or friends, or wealth, or real happiness; all these, with many other things you may fear, but it is imaginary, and I remember it is said, "the fearful will be cast into the lake of fire, with the unbeliever. And while this fear may prevent the sinner from coming to Christ, it may be also very injurious to the believer, and in that light, we will consider it a little.

We notice that the text was addressed to Timothy, a young man, who was also young in the ministry, and in the bishopric; consequently, had great responsibilities resting upon him, both as a minister and an elder in the Church. And the Apostle well knew by experience, that it required great courage and a good degree of humble boldness, to execute the duties of his office faithfully. Whence the propriety of the language of our text, "God has not given us the spirit of fear." Fear not to go forth to a wicked and gainsaying people, to protest against their wickedness, but lift up your voice like a trumpet, and show them their transgressions and their numerous sins; fear not, though the dragon may rise up and shake himself terribly against you, and may inspire his agents with a maddened zeal to oppose, crying peace, peace, where there is no peace; fear not to approach a dragon in the Temple, if you have the ark of the new covenant with you; fear not to approach a wall built with untempered mortar when you carry with you the hammer of God's word.

Again; this fear may not only prevent the minister, or official members of the Church from discharging their duties publicly, but it enters largely into the laity of the Church, and prevents many from discharging more private, yet not less important duties. This conclusion we have not only drawn from our own former experience, but from observation: for not unfrequently do we meet with brethren whose minds are strongly impressed with the necessity of family worship in order to be successful in bringing up their children in the nurture and admonition of the Lord; but fear has prevented them; hence duty is left undone, and they go on from day to day, with the great responsibility resting upon them, as a Christian head of the family, always unhappily, because of a consciousness that perfect love casteth out fear. Notwithstanding all this warning and unhappy state of mind, they stand as though their feet were bound with chains; no going forward to the work, no violence made use of to obtain the kingdom by force. Finally conscience is silent, and we fall asleep, and are no more able to see with our spiritual eye, the inexpressible danger to which our children are exposed, and hence live on in that state of indifference which ever characterizes the individuals that have a name that they are living and are dead.

Again this fear interferes much, when we feel to discharge our duties toward our brother or sister in case of private trespass, according to the 18th chapter of Matt., we fear to approach them, lest we might offend them, or perhaps they might tell us of some of our faults.—Various are the reasons which produce this slavish fear, however imaginary they may be; Therefore, dear brethren and sisters, let us try to be perfect in love and thereby overcome and destroy that slavish, devilish, and soul-destroying fear. Is it not singularly strange, that while so many are so fearful to engage in many Christian duties, such as public prayer, singing, and asking a blessing upon the food we eat, or to hold a religious conversation, that they are at the same time bold to speak of worldly things, even in public places, and often associating with it, foolish talking, and jesting, which are by no means seemly for a holy man of God, but dark spots on our holy profession. My brethren, these things ought not so to be.

The Rich Man and Lazarus.

Some men teach that the plain statement which our Savior makes with relation to these individuals is a parable, in which the "rich man" represents the Jews and Lazarus the Gentiles. This is altogether taken for granted, because the Evangelist does not call it a parable, neither does Jesus make the slightest allusion to the Jews or Gentiles throughout this simple, but awfully emphatic and un-ambiguous narrative. Our blessed Lord intended to teach us what is the state or condition of the souls of men, both of the just and unjust, after the death of the body; and it is well to take him at his word. He represents Lazarus as being carried by angels (a spirit carried by spirits) into Abraham's bosom, and there enjoying unalloyed happiness; and the rich man as lifting up his eyes in the torments of hell, when their bodies lay cold in death. Now, if he did not mean what he said, the thousands who take him at his word are deceived; and the few Soul-sleepers, who believe the Jew and Gentile parable theory, wholly conjectural as it is, are right; but thanks to our great teacher, he never taught with the slightest ambiguity, much less with positive falsity.

The Scriptures. No. 5.

In tracing up the history of the Scriptures in reference to its authorship, we discover that Moses, the writer of the Pentateuch, was truly one of the wisest and ablest legislators that ever appeared in this world. No code of laws ever devised by mortal man is equal to the law of Moses. He was the great law-giver, under the old dispensation, and is the only original work upon jurisprudence in existence. Some very noted law-givers have since Moses' time come upon this stage of action, such as Confucius the great Chinese law-giver, Mohammed the author of the Koran, Lycurgus and Solon the wise and great law-givers of ancient Greece, and many others that might be mentioned. Notwithstanding the ingenuity and wisdom displayed by the above mentioned men, in enacting laws for the people that even seemed to stand the test of time for centuries to come, they are nothing in comparison to the laws of Moses. It is unanimously declared by the learned, that the most excellent and meritorious parts in the above works or laws referred to, are by competent critics accredited to Moses himself. So that outside of what has been borrowed from the books of Moses, has very little tendency to lift the people from ignorance, obscurity and superstition to the higher and more enlightened state of civilization and christianity. Even at the present day the civil laws of all civilized countries, are more or less based upon the laws of Moses ; our country not excepted. There are many striking points of similarity between Moses and Jesus Christ, the former being the law-giver under the Jewish economy, while the latter under the Christian, and as the points of similarity between the two are so many, I shall forbear to enumerate them here. In reality they do not necessarily fall within the limits of the subject under consideration.

Having now touched a few points of interest in the life and writings of Moses, we shall briefly notice some of the leading features in the authorship of the prophetical Scriptures, as they flow in their regular order, the same as quoted by Christ himself, and recorded in St. Luke. Namely, what "was written in the law of Moses and in the Prophets, and in the Psalms concerning me."

This then divides the Old Testament Scriptures into three great subdivisions, and as such we shall treat them. The prophetical writings of the Scriptures compose by far the largest part of the book of God. Not only do the writings familiarly termed the prophets, alone contain all the prophetic language in the Bible, but likewise many of the other books in the Old, as well as the New Testament, prolifically abound in scripture, implicating futurity. The prophets are divided into the greater and lesser. Here biblical scholars differ as to classification. But it is generally admitted that Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel, are the greater, not alone on account of their superior prophecies, but perhaps on account partly of the large volume of matter they contain. The rest are called the minor or lesser prophets. Jonah is the oldest or earliest of the prophets, and flourished between eight and nine hundred years before Christ. While Malachi is the last in the chronological arrangement of the books of the prophets, and lived before the Christian era, between four and five centuries.

From the above the reader can readily see that the prophets lived and uttered their predictions, within the short period of about four hundred years.

While treating this part of the history of the Scriptures, it may not be amiss to state, that the Old Testament was written during a period of about eleven hundred years. From fifteen hundred and twenty to four hundred and twenty before Christ, and the New Testament in about fifty eight years, from A. D. 40 to A. D. 98. The period intervening between the two covenants,in which was nothing written,four hundred and sixty years. So that the entire actual time in which the Scriptures were written, both old and new, was a little over sixteen hundred years (1600) according to our present chronological tables, to which I am indebted, for the above calculations. The historical books of the scriptures of the Old Testament, are also included in the prophetical writings, and are termed the former prophets. In these writings the history of the Israelites can be traced up to the prophet Jonah, between eight and nine hundred years B. C., commencing with Joshua, who was appointed by the Lord to succeed Moses. The history of God's dealings with man can be satisfactorily traced up in the Bible, to A. D. 98, with the exception of about four hundred years, intervening between the Prophets and evangelists. First we have in the writings of Moses, the history of God's favored few, and the world in general, for the space of nearly twenty-five centuries, and in the prophets, including the Psalms eleven hundred years more, which brings us to within about four hundred years to the evangelical writings. In order to fill up the gap, and complete the historical chain, we must have more or less access to profane history, which is beyond the bounds of my subject, but the intelligent reader is referred to "Flavius Josephus' Complete Works," on the "Antiquities of the Jews." and "Rollin's Ancient History," a work of no less merit.

The third division of the Old Testament scriptures is the "Psalms." The term Psalms when used by the Savior and others, may not always have reference to the book of David. As far as prophecy is concerned it may, but when we come to the poetical part, it may have reference more or less to the Hebrew poetry of the Bible in general, in which style the book of Job and others largely partake. The book of Psalms, is as a general thing, accredited to David as its author. But many of the Psalms that are found in this book, are the production of other writers, while some are without a name at all. So that this book is a compilation of various authors, but the main or greater part is the work of David, and as such, may with propriety be called the Psalms of David. It is claimed by commentators that about eighty ought to be attributed to David, and out of this number seventy are prefixed by his own name. Among others the name of Moses is found at the head of the 90th Psalm. Since biblical critics differ so much in the authorship of this book, I will conclude, by giving a short biographical sketch of David himself, since the devotional exercises of every true and pious Christian, figure so largely in the sweet songs of the Hebrew poet, Many a forlorn and downhearted soul has found peace and consolation in God, by singing this time honored, heavenly poesy, found in the words of the sweet Psalmist of Israel.

Although about three thousand years have been buried in the oblivion of the past, since David has gone the way of all the living, and yet to this very day every genuine Christian delights to raise his voice in song, to hold communion with his God in the beautiful lines of this inspired writer of the Scriptures.

David was a shepherd in his youth, and at the time Samuel the prophet anointed him to be the King of Israel, he was found in the open field, faithfully watching his father's flock. The name of his father was Jesse, and descended from the tribe of Judah. He (David) was a man after God's own heart, not that he was infallible, but was possessed by the same sinful nature that we are, and in consequence, sometimes commits ted grievous sins. But God loved him as he does all his people, and failed not to lay the rod of chastisement upon him, when in particular on one occasion, he was very sorry and repented and confessed, "I have sinned against the Lord." During the early part of his life, David was sorely persecuted by King Saul, and was even in danger of losing his life. From the scriptures we learn that David and Saul were good and intimate friends, until he slew Goliath the great giant of the Philistines. For this brave act his countrymen honored him above the king, as did also the Hebrew women, who sang: "Saul has slain his thousands and David his tens of thousands." This we have reason to believe aroused his ambition, and created a spirit of envy and jealousy within his own bosom, and from that time on he sought David's life. Not long after, however, Saul was slain, and David raised to the throne where he reigned successfully, for about forty years. He was almost continually at war, and likewise conquered and brought into subjection the surrounding nations, and this extended the borders of his rule far and wide. During his life his people flourished, and he brought his kingdom to the highest pitch of power and glory. From the spoils taken in subjugating neighboring kingdoms, and other means, he obtained immense wealth and amassed large hoards of precious metals, gold, silver, &c., and thus largely prepared towards building a splendid temple. This was done by his successor Solomon, and constituted the chief event of his life. after having gained great fame as a prophet, a king, a worrior, and author of a part of the Scriptures, he died in the city of Jerusalem.

"But I have a few things against thee, because thou hast there them that hold the doctrine of Balaam, who taught Balak to cast a stumbling-block before the children of Israel, to eat things sacrificed unto idols, and to commit fornication." Rev. 2 : 14.

When the children of Israel were journeying from Egypt to the land of promise, Balak, the king of Moab, feared that he would be injured by the depredations of so formidable an army, and he, supposing the God of Israel was like the God of the Pagans, ready to bless or curse according to the interest of their votaries, sends for Balaam the famous diviner or idol priest, to curse Israel. Balaam ran greedily, but the God of Israel stood ready to defend them, and in his allwise wisdom he chose an unclean beast to forbid the madness of the prophet. By this extraordinary and significant miracle he was informed that man could not curse whom God had blessed. The prophet finding that he could not obtain the honor he expected from Balak, would have willingly returned, but God sent him on, charging him not to go beyond the proper limit, and there compels him to speak to the enemies of God's chosen, a parable, which for beauty and excellence surpasses the whole scope of Hebrew poetry. Num. 24.

Finding that all their plans were frustrated they resort to other means. God gave Israel the strength of the Unicorn and the beauty of valleys spread with ligna-loes as gardens, and cedars by the rivers. The adversary of souls, the enemy of God, was in existence, and with his subtility he contrives ; his suggestion is, they are blessed, have them participate with you and obtain their blessing : set a trap, entice them with bait. The Moabites allure them with their daughters, and they are soon found eating things sacrificed unto idols, and bowing down to Baalpeor. God's anger was kindled, and he commanded their heads to be hung up before the Lord against the sun, that his fierce anger might be turned from Israel. Their waywardness resulted in the destruction of twenty-four thousand of their number.

About thirty-nine years before this, God sent them Manna from heaven, and quails in abundance : he also caused the rock to issue water to quench their thirst : yet after all this, when Moses was called up into the mountain with the Lord, they soon disbelieved God, and concluded that Moses could not direct them, even by the path that God lighteth. Instead of standing still to see the salvation of God, they try their own strength, and manufacture a God and worship the image rather than follow the angel. "Behold, I am an angel before thee, to keep thee in the way, and to bring thee into the place which I have prepared." Ex. 23 : 20. Depending upon the work of their own hands deprives them of three thousand of their number.

The church at Pergamos was commended for not denying the faith amidst many grievances, yet says Jesus by the angel : "But I have a few things against thee." Your being faithful in all the ordinances is well ; you have held fast my name ; it is right. Antipas was my faithful martyr, who was slain among you, where Satan dwelleth. But I have a few things against thee, because thou hast there them that hold the doctrine of Balaam. They who seduce my people, and teach them to reach into another kingdom." ("My kingdom is not of this world." John 18 : 36.) They who teach my people to leave my kingdom and eat things sacrificed unto idols, to the God of the world. Therefore, "repent ; or else I will come unto thee quickly, and will fight against them with the sword of my mouth."

Christ's kingdom is yet flourishing, and especially in the United States, among the forty million inhabitants ; yet her number is small compared to that of the world. Notwithstanding all this it (Christ's kingdom) is "Mighty through God, to the pulling down of strong holds," if the carnal weapons are not used. God the Father, has highly exalted us, and permitted us to know that he has a remnant left, and is sending embassadors in "Christ's stead to have men reconciled to God."

When the prophet Elijah was threatened by Jesebel, he fled to Beer-sheba and left his servant, but went on a days journey in the wilderness, and sat down under a juniper tree, and there desired death. He had been very jealous for the Lord God of hosts: and felt that he was the only one who had not bowed his knee to the image of Baal. He knew not of the seven thousand whom God had reserved. But when we see the wickedness of the wicked, and that under the name of religion, bowing to doctrines the commandments of men, we may feel God's mercy sensitively in not being shut out from company as was Elijah; not only in the enjoyment that we have in meeting in the Sanctuary of the Lord, and greeting each other, but we have church organs to bring us weekly melodies of the refreshing seasons in the brotherhood. We hear from the pen of our brethren, and many of our sisters, of God's work, of soul's entering the service of the Lord's Christ, beside the cheering counsel and healing balm. I have witnessed (where the COMPANION makes its weekly visits) brethren making their way to the post-office, when they would see the mail carrier coming, and would return, reading the welcome news it brings. There are also brethren who are not selfish, and want their brethren and friends to be benefitted as they have been, and have labored to have them circulated, labored so far as to take their own money and send to pay the subscription on others, and collect afterwards as best they could. With all this, when resting on the "rock," by the law and testimony would say : "But I have a few things against thee." Because thou hast opened to such as say—To arms! To arms! Come brethren take the carnal weapons and fight against liquor. Moses went up into the Mount, but returned in forty days, he said that God would raise up a prophet like unto him. We have been waiting long since the men of Galilee saw him ascend ; he tarries too long ; we have been walking by faith longer than forty days ; we want sight. We will call the dramshops hell holes, other denominations call them by this name. It is rather black, but we have as much right to useit as others. They are at going to the fight ; they have a form of godliness, we will call them christian friends, if Jesus did say "They are least in the kingdom of heaven." We will accompany them, and give whiskey a wound if we must strike with perishable material. God said to our fathers that he would go with us to the end of the world. He said that the rulers were ministers unto us for good, but we are not satisfied with the laws they make; and as for this Jesus we wot not what has become of him. We have received the mark in our foreheads (idea) and we will also receive it in our hands. (Put to action) We have a number of brethren that have jewels, we will make a calf and bow down to the image.

My dear brethren have you forgotten your kingdom? Know ye what kind of spirit ye are of? Have you not come out from among them? "No man having put his hand to the plough, and looking back, is fit for the kingdom of God." Luke 9: 62. When the natives of the eastern continent cross the Atlantic and remain in the United States a certain time, they are then adopted, and permitted in truth to say: "This country is our mother." After they take the oath of allegiance here would they have a right to go back once a year and help to make laws from whence they came? We answer, No. We, brethren, had gone out of the way and were "of our father the devil," or the world, and it was necessary that we left the kingdom of the world, and returned to the author and bishop of our souls. Having returned, let us not go back to the weak and beggarly elements. When we were "baptized into Christ we put on Christ." Gal. 3: 27. Now if we vote we must throw off Christ. "Be ye not unequally yoked with unbelievers: for what fellowship hath righteousness with unrighteousness? and what communion hath light with darkness?" To become a qualified voter you must be initiated by oath or affirmation thus: You must solemnly swear or affirm on the holy evangely of Almighty God that you will answer all questions put or asked you. Officers vary in this, some will say you do now affirm before the eyes of an all-scrutinizing God, others ask brethren to hold up the right hand while the affirmation is being read or repeated: and what we have to lament is that brethren sometimes yield to such ignorant or base officers, when our government does not demand it. Brethren swear not: answer yea or nay when asked without the name of Jehovah attached, when necessity demands it.

The children of the law were compared to valleys spread forth, as gardens by the river's side, as the trees of lign-aloes which the Lord planted, and as cedar trees beside the waters, for beauty, (Num. 24: 6,) and as the unicorn for strength, but the children of the Gospel to far more beauty and terror. "Fair as the moon, clear as the sun, and terrible as an army with banners. Cant. 6: 10. God the Father married Israel. "Now when I passed by thee and looked upon thee, behold, thy time was the time of love; and I spread my skirt over thee, and covered thy nakedness: yea, I sware unto thee, and entered into a covenant with thee, saith the Lord God, and thou becamest mine." Ezek. 16: 8. Israel played the harlet, and Judah her sister, was treacherous, so they were divorced. "And when I saw, when for all the causes whereby backsliding Israel committed adultery, I had put her away, and give her a bill of divorce." Jer. 3: 8. The Father's love passing all knowledge, promises a new contract, "Not according to the covenant that I made with their fathers, in the day that I took them by the hand to bring them out of the land of Egypt: which my covenant they break, although I was an husband unto them, saith the Lord." Jer. 21: 32. The author of this covenant came in flesh and blood and courted for his bride. He was full of love; have we given him our heart? Are we betrothed? If so he will rejoice in meeting us. "And as a bridegroom rejoiceth over the bride, so shall thy God rejoice over thee." Isa. 62: 5. God did not intend to deceive his prophets, and show them things in visions that shall never come to pass; and this vision, as well as all others must be realized.

This should suffice: but I will mention the prospect of giving the deathblow to king alcohol. The Borough of Shippensburg in Cumberland Co., Pa., procured the passage of "Local Option," from the Legislature, and the legal voters decided by a large majority that no licenses should be granted. This act of the Legislature was unconstitutional, and a party being desirous of selling the fluid, applied to the Court of Quarter Sessions for license in the usual form and obtained it, which showed the legality of their proceedings. The Legislature unawed by this, passed a general law, at its last session, giving to all the counties the right to vote upon the question, pro or con. Thus applying the principle: "Local Option." Where a majority of qualified voters says no license; no license shall be issued in that county for 3 years, except for medicinal and mechanical purposes. The privilege of selling liquor in the United States is not permited or prohibited by State authorities, but by a power that is paramount to State Legislature. And as their attempt proved a failure in the borough of Shippensburg, it will also prove a failure in this, if I understand the constitution of the U. S. As the constitution gives no state the right of "Local Option." But if such power was vested in them, what would be accomplished? Licenses will be issued to sell liquor for medicinal and mechanical purposes, so that you will have the poison floating tantamount to if not worse than before. Every advantage will be taken as was some years ago, when the Legislature passed a law prohibiting nine pins, the alleys were never torn up, but they added one more pin; hence ten-pin alley. Again where a rumseller was prohibited from selling liquor by the pint, quart or gallon, he had a tin made three feet long holding exactly a pint. His purchasers bought it by the yard. In Pittsburg they are devising similar plans now. One is to transform his place into a mammoth billiard saloon, with sideboards containing refreshments between each table. The charge will be fifty cents per game, and the players will be allowed full liberty to revel among the refreshments. Another purposes to inaugerate a series of tri-weekly entertainments, composed of musical and gymnastic exercises, at which there will be a gratuitious flow of drink. Another segar seller will sell a five cent segar, he will make no present but he who pays fifteen cents for one from the same box will be given a drink.

Brethren we have no power but in prayer. God has certain laws and these fixed laws cannot be nullified. The law of impenetrability, two bodies cannot occupy the same space at the same time. If we have the love of God shed abroad in the hearts we will "take no thought," or be over anxious for the government of our land in time to come: at least not enough to become contaminated with the world. "Blessed is he that readeth, and they that hear the words of this prophecy, and keep those things which are written therein: for the time is at hand." Rev. 1: 3.

Secret Prayer.

"But thou when thou prayest, enter into thy closet, and when thou hast shut thy door, pray to thy Father which is in secret, and thy Father which seeth in secret, shall reward thee openly." Matt 6 : 6.

God is the only selfsufficient being in the universe. His existence is unoriginated, and therefore necessary and eternal. He is emphatically styled by St. Paul the blessed, or happy God. He is ineffably and inconceivably happy, in the enjoyment in himself. His happiness is all his own. This is a universably acknowledged truth. Even authors in order to find out what properties to attribute to God, pictured in their imaginations all such qualities as they conceived essential to happiness, and rejected all others. But the state of man is peculiarly a state of dependence. He is not his own, he derived his existence from God. And it is in him he lives, moves, and has his being. Hence arises the necessity and propriety of prayer which is the native language of dependence. Prayer is a duty rendered sacred by antiquity. A duty that has been practiced in all ages, and sanctioned by all the excellent of the earth. But, that there is moral obligation binding man to pray admits of no controversy. His origin, his situation, his nature, and his necessities, all serve to remind him that prayer is his imparative duty, and his inestimable privilege. But what is prayer ? What is the meaning of the term ? What qualifications are necessary to enable a man to pray aright, acceptable to God, and benificially to himself ? Plain as this duty may appear to be, erroneous notions are commonly entertained concerning it. Prayer, it should be recollected, is not mere speech ; it is not the language of the lips; words alone, however well chosen, and adapted to express the sentiments of the mind, do not constitute prayer. This people, saith God, concerning Jews, draw near me with their mouths and with their lips do honor me, but have removed their hearts far from me. And if the heart be not engaged in prayer, all the words we can utter are no more than rude, offensive sounds, in the ears of the Almighty.

As a proof that prayer is the language of the heart, we cite the case of Hannah, of whom the inspired writer says, Hannah spake in her heart, only her lips moved, but her voice was not heard. Eli, who stood by, thought she was drunk, and said unto her, How long wilt thou be drunken. Put away thy wine from thee ; and Hannah answered and said, "no, my Lord, I am a woman of a sorrowful spirit ; have neither drunk wine nor strong drink, but have poured out my soul before the Lord." The expressions used by David, and recorded in the book of Psalms are strikingly descriptive of the real nature of prayer : "Hear the right, O Lord, attend unto my cry, give ear unto my prayer, that goeth not out of feigned lips." Psalms 17 : 1. "Unto thee do I lift up my soul." Psalm 25 : 1. "Unto thee lift I up mine eyes, O thou that dwellest in the heavens." Psalm 123 : 1. From these passages, and many others that might be quoted, it will be seen, prayer is an immediate address to the Deity. The love of fame has been nominated the universal passion. It must be admitted that it is natural to man in his fallen state, improperly, and idolatrously, to desire the esteem and applause of men, and more frequently than we are aware, that evil mixes with our good works, and renders unacceptable to him that searcheth the hearts, our spiritual sacrifices. But in the secret exercises of religion, we are not so liable to be under the influence of evil, or even mixed motives. Hence the solemn cautions and exhortations delivered by our blessed Lord, to his hearers on the mount : "Take heed that ye do not your alms before men, to be seen of them." Our Lord, from whose judgment there is no appeal, decided on the motives by which the persons alluded to were induced to perform, in public, those acts of worship which properly belong to the closet, and took occasion from thence to give admonitions and advices, most salutary. Let it not be inferred, however that private exercises of devotion are to supercede those which are public. Each has its proper place, order and use. Secret prayer is a solemn transaction between God and the individual who performs it. Retired from the world, secluded, for the time, from the society of men, he is in audience with the Deity.

The advantage of a proper place for such a solemn exercise. "Enter into thy closet (saith the Lord) and when thou hast shut thy door, pray to thy Father who is in secret." Some indeed have understood this in a metephorical sense, as though our Savior had directed his followers to be serious and devout, and to enter into the closet of the heart, which are the most inward recesses, and retiring place.

An habitual spirit of prayer and devotion is of the utmost consequence. But that is not the plain meaning of the words. By the closet is to be understood some private place, and to shut the door is to offer our secret prayers in as private a manner as possible, so that God alone may be witness to the solemn transaction himself, and as it is not probable that Daniel, who was so sensible of the necessity and advantage of prayer, that rather than omit it, for one day, subjected himself to the frightful penalty of being cast into the lions den, had his stated times for prayer, and that the men who sought his ruin had obtained informatien respecting those times. Now when Daniel knew the writing was signed, he went into his house, and his windows being in his chamber toward Jerusalem, he kneeled upon his knees, three times a day, and prayed, and gave thanks before his God as he did afore time. "Seven times a day do I praise thee." Psalms 119 : 164. "Evening, morning, and noon will I pray and cry aloud." We pass over other examples which might be collected from the sacred writings.

Cornelius, the pious Roman captain, was praying at the ninth hour (i. e.) three in the afternoon. While we admire the grace of God in such persons as before mentioned, let us follow our great exampler, the Lord Jesus Christ. He often withdrew from company and prayed alone. When he had sent the multitude away he went into a mountain apart to pray. Matt. 14 : 23. Matt. 26 : 36, 45. He withdrew himself into the wilderness and prayed. Luke 5 : 15. In the morning, rising up a great while before day, he went out and departed into a solitary place and there prayed. Mark 1 : 35. On another occasion he went into a mountain to pray, and continued all night in prayer to God. He hath thus left us an example, we should follow in his steps.

Previous examination is an excellent preparative for the holy exercise of secret prayer. Hereby we become acquainted with ourselves and our spiritual state before God. We are made sensible of poverty and our need of Divine help. But there are many excuses for the neglect of secret prayer.

Among the excuses which men are accustomed to make for their neglect of prayer, is their ignorance of its nature. They know not how to pray. It is a practice to which they never habituated themselves, and they know not what to say, even if they were to make the attempt. But why, it may be asked, do you not know how to pray? Were prayer a secret or a mystery, which required strong intellectual powers to comprehend, or were it necessary for you to consult skillful teachers, or practice a tedious course of study to understand how to pray, then there might be indeed some shadow of plea for your conduct.

Let us now apply this, what we have been speaking so much about, namely prayer. Have we a father who can supply our wants, then let us see how we will approach him. First we learn where to find him. Then we appear in his presence, and make our wants known unto him; and after we have made our wants known unto him, he will supply our wants. Before we approached him, he might have known our wants; and just so with our heavenly Father. Listen at his promises: "If ye shall ask anything in my name I will do it." John 14: 14. "Now unto him that is able to do exceeding abundantly above all that we ask or think, according to the power that worketh in us." Eph. 3: 20. "Ask and receive, that your joy may be full." John 16: 24.

Have we a friend? How will we approach this friend? We will consult our wants and after we fully understand the nature of our wants, we draw near to him whom we have but confidence in, and may be he will be indisposed to help us; but not so with that friend who sticketh closer than a brother. He who is always ready to do good, who is always waiting to hear those that call upon him. Where there is a heart to pray, there is a God to hear and answer prayer. "Call upon me in the day of trouble and I will deliver thee." And another excuse that may arise is: "I know not where to meet him." Where did Adam meet him? In the garden. Where did Jacob meet and wrestle with the angel until the break of day? is an example that we should not be so easily discouraged, when we do not get an answer directly. Pray and wrestle, and toil, until we do receive a blessing. What did David say about the presence of God? "Whither shall I go from thy Spirit, or whither shall I flee from thy presence? If I ascend up into heaven, thou art there; if I make my bed in hell, behold thou art there. If I take the wings of the morning, and dwell in the uttermost parts of the sea, even there shall thy hand lead me, and thy right hand shall hold me." Psalm 139: 10. Where did his disciples meet him? On the sea. And after he had ascended up into heaven, and promised to send his Spirit, where did Paul and Silas meet him? In prison. He is an omnipresent God. Then may we be encouraged to pray always, with all prayer, giving thanks unto God. And has not God given us a book which teaches us to pray, and what to pray for? It furnisheth language suitable for prayer, sets before us examples of prayer, and gives us encouragement to pray; and what more can we desire?

Again, some persons say what a dislike they have to it, for which they have no relish, to which they have no attachment, and in the practice of which they have no enjoyment. They seldom if ever pray, because they have no heart to pray. In the pursuits of earthly objects and the managements of their secular concerns their hearts are all alive. But why, it may be asked, have a dislike to prayer? Does it create no enjoyments? Does prayer possess no attraction? Does it not promise us pleasure? So far from this being the case, you cannot conceive a happier creature upon earth than a praying man. One that draws near to God and who feels that God draws near to him. Out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh. By the fruit you shall know the tree. If our hearts are right we have a desire to pray. May we not be of those characters spoken of. When we draw near to God, may we draw near with our whole hearts, in sincerity.

Things That are Coming.

Manhood will come; old age will come, and the dying bed will come. And the very last look you shall ever cast upon your acquaintance will come; and the agony of the parting breath will come; and the time when you are stretched a lifeless corpse, before the eyes of weeping relatives will come; and the coffin that is to enclose you will come; and that hour, when the company will assemble to carry you to the church-yard will come; and that minute when you are put in the grave will come; and the throwing in of the loose earth, into the narrow house, where you are laid, and the spreading of the green sod over it,—all, all, will come upon every living creature who now lives. And in a few little years, the writer who now writes, and the people who now read, and hear, will be carried to their long homes, and make room for another generation. Now all this, you know, must and will happen. Your common sense and common experience, serve to convince you of it. Perhaps it may have been little thought of, in the days of careless and thoughtless, and thankless unconcern, which you have spent hitherto; but I call upon you to think of it now; to lay it seriously to heart, and not longer to trifle and delay, when the high matters of death and judgment, and eternity are thus set so evidently before you. And the tidings wherewith we are all charged;—and the blood lieth upon each ones own head, if we do not listen to them. The object of my writing this is to let you know what more things are to come. It is to carry you beyond the regions of sight and of sense, to the regions of faith, and to assure you in the name of Him who cannot lie, that as sure as the hour of laying the body in the grave comes, so surely will also come the hour of the Spirit returning to the God who gave it. Yes and the day of final reckoning will come; and the appearance of the Son of God in heaven, and his mighty angels around him, will come; and the opening of the books will come, and the standing of the men of all generations before the judgment seat, will come; and the solemn passing of that sentence which is to fix you for eternity, will come.

The Balm of Gilead.

"Is there no balm in Gilead; is there no physician there? Why then is not the health of the daughter of my people recovered?" Jeremiah 8 : 22.

This language has reference to the Jews of old, but is also applicable in this age of the world. We learn that the Jews, like many people in the present day, turned with violence against the counsel of their God, and the everlasting truth. And their hearts were filled with idolatry, and craftiness, and they were guilty of the most detestable deeds of fornication. Though they soon became diseased, through their abominable lechery. It is true, their hearts were prone to wander from the fold of their God. However, the lewedness and wickedness of their hearts, brought such a powerful disease among them, that their most learned, and skillful physicians were unable to alleviate their disease. Nevertheless, we learn from Sacred History, that this "balm of Gilead" was a tree that God let grow upon Mount Gilead, and it bore much gum. So valuable was this gum, that it was sold for twice its weight in silver, and the leaves of this tree were also used for soothings. And those who were diseased, and procured of this gum, were healed of their loathsome disease. However, we find, there was another sore distress sent among the Israelites, for their murmurings against God, and against Moses, for delivering them out of Egypt into the wilderness. God and Moses both became very much displeased at their murmurings. And the Lord said: "For behold I will send serpents, cockatrices, among you, which will not be charmed, and they shall bite you." However, the fiery serpents came and bit many of them, and much people died. "Therefore the people came to Moses, and said, we have sinned, for we have spoken against the Lord, and against thee; pray unto the Lord that he take away the serpents from us." "And the Lord said unto Moses, Make thee a fiery serpent, and set it upon a pole: and it shall come to pass, that every one that is bitten, when he looketh upon it shall live." Nevertheless they looked upon the serpent and were healed. Farther, we find, as "Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, so shall the Son of man also be lifted up." "And whosoever believeth on him shall be saved." The Son of man has now become the healing balm of all the nations of the earth. He is the tree, and his commandments are the gum; and his words are the leaves, and they are good for doctrine and reproof; they are soothing to the soul when all our earthly hopes are blighted; yes, they will cast a brilliant ray of light upon our path, that leadeth us to immortal glory.

Boys Listen to This.

True as the gospel is the following, said by Robert Collyer of Chicago:

"It is true that the working, successful men of to day were once poor, industrous self reliant boys. And the same thing will be repeated—for from the ranks of the hard working economical, temperance and preserving boys of to day, will emanate the progressive prominent men of the future.

"Every man doing any sort of work in Chicago to-day, was raised a poor man's son, and had to fight his way to his place. Not one of them, as I can ascertain, was a rich man's son, and had a good time when he was a boy. All boys should grow as strong as a steel bar, fighting their way on to an education, and then, when they are ready, plunge into life with that traditional half-dollar and a little bundle tied up in a red handkerchief, as I have known great men to start.

I tell you that in five and twenty years, when most of us that are in our middle age have gone to our retribution, the men of mark in this country will not be the sons of those whose fathers can give them all they wish for, and ten times more than they ought to have, but will be those who are brought up in farmhouses and cottages, cutting their way through the thickest hindrances of every sort; and all the brown stone houses of this metropolis will be as nothing to bring out the noble man."

The Charm of Life.

There are a thousand things in this world to afflict and sadden—but oh! how many that are beautiful and good! The world teems with beauty—with objects that gladden the eye and warm the heart. We might be happy if we would. There are ills that we cannot escape—the approach of disease and death; of misfortunes; the sundering of the early ties, and the canker-worm of grief—but the vast majority of evils that beset us might be avoided. The curse of intemperance, interwoven as it is with all the liaments of society, is one which never strikes but to destroy. There is not one bright page upon the record of its progess—nothing to shield it from the heartiest execration of the human race. It should not be allowed to exist—it must not. Do away with all this—let wars come to an end, and let friendship, charity, love, purity and kindness mark the intercourse between man and man. We are too selfish, as if the world was made for us alone; How much happier would we be were to labor more earnestly to promote each other's good. God has blessed us with a home that is not dark, there is sunshine everywhare—in the sky, upon the earth—there would be in most hearts, if we would look around us. The storm dies away and a bright sun shines out. Summer drops her tinted curtains upon the earth, which is very beautiful when autumn breathes her changing breath upon it. God reigns in the heavens. Murmur not at a being so good and we can live happier than we do.

Wordsworth says that the meanest flower so completely captivated his mind by its unutterable beauty that thoughts crowned on him too vast for expression, too deep for tears; and at the feet of the man whose artistic capacities have received not cultivation, and in consequence are somnolent and lethargic, there lies an undiscovered world more valuable than that which meets the superficial glance and having more numerous and deeper sources of plesure.

Beauty and utility go hand in hand in nature.

Pride.—God crowns with mercy, says Jenkyn; but a swollen head is not fit to have that crown put upon it.

A proud man, is seldom a grateful man; for he never thinks he gets as much as he deserves. When any mercy falls, he says, "yes, but it ought to be more. It is only manna as large as a coriander seed, whereas it ought to be like a baker's loaf.

True religion shows its influence in every part of our conduct; it is like the sap of a living tree, which penetrates the most distant boughs.

RURAL VALLEY, PA., March 15th, 1873.

BROTHER HENRY:—

On Thursday evening we commented on the first chapter of Paul's second epistle to the Thessalonians. We endeavored to show, and we think with some success, that they who do not obey the gospel are under the same condemnation as the unbelieving are. It is a fixed fact, that without faith it is impossible to please God; whatsoever is not of faith is sin;" and "he that believeth not shall be damned." So also the Apostle declares, "that the Lord Jesus Christ shall be revealed from heaven, in the glory of the holy angels, in flaming fire, to take vengeance on them that know not God, and that obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ; who shall be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord and the glory of his power." This vengeance, banishment, and destruction pronounced against the ungodly and disobedient, is the same as the condemnation of the unbelieving. It is therefore, necessary to study the scriptures carefully, that we may know what is required therein, and then it is necessary for us to insure our salvation, to believe what is declared, and to obey what is enjoined.

On Wednesday evening, the 12th, our text was "Nehushtan," 2 Kings, 18: 4. Nehushtan means brazen, a piece of brass, and was the name given by Hesekiah, to the brazen serpent which Moses made. This was about 626 years after it was made in the borders of Edom. This brazen serpent had served a good purpose, when it was used according to the appointment of God; but it was idolatry in the Children of Israel to preserve and through superstition, burn incense to it. Hence Hesekiah did that which was right in the sight of the Lord, when he brake it in their presence, and, in derision, called it, "Nehushtan"—a piece of brass. We then dwelt upon its use and abuse, and afterward upon that which it typifies; namely, "As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of Man be lifted up, that whosoever believeth in should not perish, but have eternal life." John 3: 14, 15.

On Thursday evening, we spake from the text, "The Spirit and the bride say come, and let him that heareth say come, and let him that is athirst come, and whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely." Rev. 22: 7. We feel assured that many in our congregation saw themselves as sinners, and felt that the Spirit and Church of God were faithful in their efforts to secure their conversion and regeneration. They also felt that, if they remain impenitent and are finally lost, it will be only because they would not accept of salvation—because they would not partake of the water of life which is offered to them freely.

On Friday evening, the 14th, we spake of the blessedness of the dead, who die in the Lord. The good order which has prevailed, and the earnestness which has been depicted on the countenances of our hearers, persuade us to believe that the good Lord is operating upon their hearts.

We purpose to continue the meetings until the 18th inst., when we expect to be relieved by brother Jesse P. Hetric. The weather has been somewhat unfavorable, and the roads in bad condition, but our congregation has been large, and still increasing.

Your brother, as ever,
J. W. BEER.

We have the sad intelligence of the death of a little niece, daughter of our sister Elizabeth, residing at Clover Creek, Blair county, but have not the particulars.

Death is in our midst; on every side he is taking our friends away, some times coming very near home. Nevertheless, the Lord has been very kind unto us, in preventing his visits as frequently as in some less fortunate, but much more deserving families.

At Berlin, Pa., on the 20th of March, of galloping consumption, sister MARY A. MEYERS wife of Wm. H. Meyers, and daughter of brother Ephriam and sister Barbara Cober; aged 21 years, less one day.

She was buried on Sunday, the 23d, in the family burying ground, about a mile and a half from the town of Berlin.—Funeral services by the editor.

At least some of our readers will remember the marriage notice of the above parties, published in the second number of this volume. On the 2d of January we were with the family, at what was reall a marriage feast; now, so soon, we are called upon to mourn with those who mourn. This we could only for the sake of the living, for we feel assured that as for our departed sister, it is better with her.

We wish that this dispensation of Providence may be a an admonition to all young people, not to delay making preparation for death, on the plea of their youth. Things are verily as uncertain with you as they are with us of more advanced age. Make yourselves ready for heaven and happiness, and death will not be unwelcome at any time.

A Novel Religious Ceremony—A Child Baptized Without Water.

Charles Vosey, of London, has introduced a service for "Dedication and Consecration" of children, in lieu of baptism. The ceremony was performed in that city, on the 3d of November, and is thus described:

"Yesterday afternoon, a well-dressed congregation filled St. George's Hall. Laughman Place, the numbers being due to the public announcement that the services of dedication benediction of children would be performed for the first time, being a substitute for the ancient ceremony of baptism. On examining the platform and round about, (reserved seats) it was plain that there was but one child there to be dedicated and receive a benediction. At the left side of the reading-desk a highly respectable looking young couple, and on their left a friend, in her arms a fine male infant, apparently some months old. God-father and god-mother there were none, and the party stood and knelt by themselves, somewhat apart from the occupants of the front seats. All eyes were naturally turned upon them, but the parents did not cease to pay the utmost attention to their devotions.

When the usual hymns were sung and prayers said, the Rev. C. Vosey descended from the platform, or stage, and taking his place in front of the parents of the child, commenced the Order of Services for the Dedication and Benediction of Children, composed by himself, and performed yesterday for the first time.—It should be stated that it was after the reading of the second lesson that the service began. The latter began with an exhortation, in which occurred the following passages: The father and mother of this child now present, desire us to join with them in giving thanks to the Lord and giver of life for His precious gift to them, for all His mercy in supporting them under their anxieties, and for granting them a happy issue out of much pain and sorrow. They have brought this child into the congregation of those who love the Lord, and trust Him, that we may with one accord, make our prayer on his behalf, that he may grow up in health of mind, body, and estate, and be a blessing to his family, and to the country at large. * * * * * * By this, our solemn service, we would, as it were, dedicate and consecrate this infant's SOUL and BODY to the service of God. Then followed prayers for the parents and child, with responses from the choir.

After the singing of an hymn, Mr. Vosey turned to the father and mother, and asked, "what is the name of this child?" (the name was inaudable). The congregation stood all this time, and here the 'Order of Service' prescribes: the minister shall take the child in his arms, and say certain words "in the name of the congregation." Accordingly, Mr. Vosey took the infant, and resting it on his left arm, said, 'we receive this child, naming him, at the hands of his father and mother, and have with one accord solemnly dedicated him to the service of Almighty God, our Heavenly Father. * * * * May God hear our prayers and make this child a brave soldier of the Truth and of every righteous cause. The whole congregation responded amen, the little fellow crying, not very loudly, all the while. The benediction came next. Mr. Vosey addressing the infant by its newly acquired name, said: "We give thee welcome in the name of the Lord; the Lord bless thee and keep thee, the Lord mercifully encompass thee with joy and peace. The eyes of the Lord be ever upon thee to give thee courage under temptations, and to cheer thy heart in the day of thy sorrow, &c." At the conclusion of the Te Deum, the congregation said amen.—Mr. Vosey gave back the child to its parents. The ceremony closed by singing, 'Glory to God in the highest, followed by a hymn of praise and thanksgiving from the Revised Prayer Book.

We have copied the above extract from the Pittsburgh Dollar Leader. Truly we can take the privilege of heading this, "On the other side of Jordan," believing that it best tells the fact, that now, as well as anciently, men can become insane about anything, when that weakness makes them feel exceedingly good. The first proper and God-ordained baptism (dipping) was by John Baptist, in the River Jordan. That heaven-sanctioned action was supremely good for all intents and purpose, preparatory for the reign of Heaven upon all God-fearing men and women, who were capable of exercising their minds about the word of God. Infants were not embraced in the mission of John Baptist. Their duty then, as well as now, was to obey their parents in all things, and this is the first commandment of promise. This being well observed, gave them knowledge, enabling them to come to a warning Herald—to flee from the coming wrath.

Now, John's baptism was God's baptism, and Christ came to do his Father's will, so that John's baptism was Heaven's baptism, and Heaven's baptism was Christ's, and Christ's baptism was, by reason of necessity, in symbol, Apostolical baptism; and these three concurring testimonies of God, the Father, Son and and Holy Ghost constitute the powerful evidences to repenting sinners. What is requisite for a full and clear Christian baptism? John, Christ, and the Twelve Apostles, all of one mind, and in one place, were triune baptists, at least when they got down into deep water. In the second and fifth centuries sprinkling and pouring men and infants began; in the sixth and tenth once dipping became common; and now, in the nineteenth century, Nov. 3d, 1873, baptism by talking to a baby, began.

A Terrible Disease.

A terrible disease is raging in Scott Valley, California. We do not feel that we are competent of doing this subject justice; but as there is no other person speaking for this valley, I feel it my duty to say, through your columns, that the people of this valley do not prospect all the time for gold. They have come to the conclusion that they are sick, and they had better prospect one day in each week for a physician. Your respected brother J. B. Sharratts has tried to cite them to a little work in print, that will explain the disease, and also point to the physician that can cure. Since the little work has been so diligently sought for and studied, we see the effects of this disease abandoned by a great many. We contend that the effect causes the disease, and that is the effects of sin. The only organized church in Scott Valley, is the M. E. Church. Quite a number have been added to this Church recently, and there are a great many others that we believe are fit subjects for baptism, that cannot endorse the faith and practice of the M. E. Church. I must say that this church has accomplished a great deal of good in Scott Valley.

Although Scott Valley lies in a high altitude, and is said to be the most healthful valley in the State of California, where all kinds of produce is raised. Still people do not always live here.

We have had a very mild, pleasant winter. Have been plowing most of the time. Stock has done well without feeding, consequently we do not murmur and complain as some do that have written to me from the older states. Some complain of hard times. We have no reason to complain of hard times and low prices. Our prices are good, and if we want more gold we can go to the hills and gulcher and dig it out. We feel glad that we have been content with the few thousand bushels of grain, and what surplus stock we have to spare, to take the coin for it, without resorting to the hills to take out a fortune in a few days, as many do. We have a healthy climate. We have pure, cold water, we have fruit of different varieties; we have vegetables of all kinds. Still we have that disease which is so prevalent all over the land.

A Terrible Fire.

Brother Henry:—

Permit me to inform your readers of a terrible fire that took place in our neighborhood on Saturday night, the 15th inst. The particulars are about as follows: The house and barn of brother Robert McFarland was entirely destroyed by fire. At the first sight of the fire, the barn was wrapped in flames. The family seeing that nothing could be done at the barn, set to work removing furniture and things from the house; but the devouring element soon overtook them, and nothing more could be done, but to look at the destructive flames devouring the buildings, once occupied by the now sorrow stricken family. The fire occurred at about 2 o'clock at night, and the wind blew at such a terrible rate, that it swept all as it went. Old residents say they never knew the wind to blow harder.—The things saved from the house were few, and the loss of beasts was heavy indeed. The amount of stock that burnt was 7 head of horses, 7 head of cattle, and 7 hogs, besides a great deal of hay, grain, farming implements, &c. Brother Robert is a man with a family of six children, and in moderate circumstances. He has been driven out of house and home, and almost destitute of clothing, and all the stock he has left is one horse. The amount of dollars worth lost, I cannot tell, but suffice to say it was heavy indeed.

Brother Henry:—

By the request of many brethren and sisters, I inform them where I have located. We started from Indiana, where we had lived five years, and journeyed southwestward, and stopped in Franklin county, Kansas. We met with many of our acquaintances here, and we are well pleased with the country. We have enjoyed good health since we are here. There is an organized church here, and some seventy members, and the ark is moving on slowly. We would say to our brethren and sisters, that there is room for many more, who wish to come West. Now, I will say to the many among whom I have labored, and whom I love, let us be steadfast, immovable, ever abounding in the service of the Lord, that we may meet in our Father's kingdom, where we can dwell together, nevermore to be separated.

My address was Walkerton, Ind.; it is now Centropolis, Kansas.

George Barnhart.

Chambers Valley, Va. March 3rd, 1872.

Brother Holsinger: There is a little flock of brethren and sisters in this part of the country, 14 in number, under the care of brother H. P. Hylton, of Floyd county, Va. There were seven added to the brotherhood here, by baptism, since a few of the brethren have settled here, nearly five years ago. There have two brethren and one sister died, of those who settled here. We have no settled minister here. The brethren who preach for us come upwards of 30 miles. We commonly have meeting every three months. I do not write this for publication, I simply thought I would give you a small sketch of our small number living here. I think if we had some ministering brother living convenient, so that we could have preaching oftener our number would soon increase. Yours in brotherly love.

Samuel D. Rothrock.

Dear Brethren: As there was no meeting here to attend, I have read the Companion through to-day, and now I am tired and lonesome, and so I will write to you.

We moved from Illinois. I like this country well, as far as I have seen. There is good water, and more timber than I expected to find. The soil is good, and is very healthy. We have had a very nice winter here. There are good prairie claims here yet, and if any of the brethren or friends want to get a home, I think they had better come here. I would like to have some of them move out here, so we could have meetings oftener. We moved here last fall without much money, and I find it very hard to get provisions for my family until I can raise something, as there is no work to be had here, and if any of you feel like helping me some, and will send me a little money, it will be thankfully received, and I will pay it back as soon as I can. As we are all one in Christ Jesus, for the Lord has no respect of persons. He has said all that call upon my name in truth and sincerity, I will never leave nor forsake them. If any one wishes to send me any money, send it in a registered letter. I hope you will all pray for me, that I may hold out faithful in the good cause, and that we may all meet on the shining bank of sure deliverence, is my prayer.

Alfred Stowell.

Salem, Jewel Co., Kansas.

Brother Holsinger: We hope our Virginia Brother will not be discouraged. We know that partiality is not acceptable in the eyes of the Lord; but as we read there was a Judas among the twelve apostles, we cannot expect all of our brethren to be pure. We must often think of our old brother Paul's tribulations and perseeutions, and that of false brethren, too. James 2; 2, 6. "But ye have despised the poor. Do not rich men oppress you, and draw you before the judgment-seat?" "But if ye have respect to persons, ye commit sin, and are convinced as transgressors." "If ye fulfil the royal law, according to the scriptures, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself, ye do well."

Margaret Anglemyer.

New Paris, Ind.

Sister Carrie Holsinger, Colerain, Nebraska, says: "This climate seems to be very mild and pleasant There is not much rain in the Fall, which makes it healthy. People here think that this climate is excellent for persons having weak lungs. The air is remarkably pure. I think it would be benificial to your health, if you would come out here, and spend a season with us, and preach for us awhile. We need a missionary here very much. Please do send one over here into Macedonia. If you know of any Brethren anywhere in this State let us know. We know of no members here excepting ourselves. We live four miles from Colerain, on the Denver and St. Joseph R. R. We live in Filmore county, near the Thayer county line.

Brother Henry: Please allow me to say that the District Meeting of northern Illinois, for 1873, will be held, the Lord willing, with the brethren Cherry Grove branch, Carroll county, on Monday, 12th of May. We hope the meeting will be well represented.

OTT, COOS, CO., OREGON.
January 26th, 1873.

Dear brethren and sisters: It had been a long time since we had been taking the COMPANION, but last week we received one. Oh! how gladly it was received, and the contents read with care and interest. It does my heart good to hear from so many dear brethren and sisters, from so many different parts of the United states.

We left Ontario, Boon Co., Iowa, on the 24th of April 1872, and started to seek us homes in the far distant Oregon, which we have found. I think I can say we are entirely among strangers, as there are only three families of us, and we have not met with an other yet, that we had ever seen before we came here. But through the mercies of God I can say that we have found the strangers kind friends and neighbors; All through our travels we met with kind and loving people. We hardly ever asked a favor without it being granted. We thank them for their kindness, and may the Lord bless them.

We have had a very nice and pleasant winter so far. The grass has been green all winter; and some field flowers bloomed all winter. It has not been cold worth mentioning, and very little rain, to what I expected we would have. We think this is a healthy country. For fear of being too lengthy I will close, by asking the prayers of all the brethren and sisters in our behalf. From your weak sister, in the bonds of gospel love. ANNA BARKLOW.

Middle Indiana District Meeting.

The District Meeting of middle district of Indiana will be held in the Bachelor Run congregation, Carroll county, April 25th, at the brethren's meeting-house. Those coming from the north by railroad, will come to Logansport, and take the Crawfordsville road to Ino, quarter of a mile from meeting-house. Those coming from the south, will take the Logansport and Crawfordsville road and stop off at Ino as above. A general invitation extended to all.

To Brother J. L. Kittinger.

DEAR BROTHER: I saw in the C. F. C., that you are living in New York, and that you had sent a letter to me while on a mission, at Skowhegan, Maine, that we should call and see you, on our return; but your letter came too late. I would have been happy to see you in that great city, so far from our native homes. May the Lord keep you from danger, temporal, and spiritual, that if we see eachother no more under the sun, that we may keep our lamps trimmed and burning that when the Master's trumpet shall sound, we may meet him with joy having our title clear to mansions in the sky. I also read, in C. F. C., number 7, that you think much good could be done in New York, if a church was organized there, by the Brethren. I will tell what I heard say, that when the brethren and sisters were on the cars, going to Annual meeting, there was a New Yorker watching the brethren and sisters, with surprise, seeing their long beards, hair parted in the middle of their heads, hanging down to their shoulders, and the sisters with white caps. After a little one of the brethren started a hymn, and all began to sing. So the New Yorker, with his high-top silk hat, sat up to one of the brethren, saying, "What does all this mean? Where are all these people from? and where are they going too? What is their faith, and what do they preach? The Brother's answer was: "That they preach the old evangelical and apostolical doctrine." He said, "They have made me think that the apostles are risen from the dead, Come to New York, and preach for us. We will have it published in the Newspapers, and we will raise for you, a thousand dollars, the first night."

Repentance and Conversion.

I would like to say a little through the C. F. C., to all the ministers of the Gospel, through the entire brotherhood, to all those that write to the COMPANION. Dear brethren, I would like very much, if you would always write upon the most interesting subjects, such as repentance and conversion. I must say some dear brethren and sisters, write very interesting. What a blessing it is, that we can hear from our brethren through the entire brotherhood. If I could write like some dear brethren, O how would I pass my remaining days, in writing to the COMPANION. Now brethren, let us hear from you, with all the weight, and all the power, that is given you, from on high, is the desire of your unworthy brother. E. J. FADELY.

BROTHER HOLSINGER: Please announce the District Meeting of eastern Pennsylvania. It will be held the Lord willing, with the brethren in the West Connistoga congregation, at the house of brother Joseph Pfautz, Lancaster county, half a mile from Rothsville station, on the Reading and Columbia Railroad, on Thursday 15th of May, 1873. We will meet the day before, about 4 o'clock, at the said house. Brethren coming by Railroad, stop at Rothsville station, where there will be conveyance to take them to place of meeting.

DIED.

We admit no poetry under any circumstances in connection with Obituary Notices. We wish to use all alike, and we could not insert verses with all.

On Thursday, March 6th, near St. Clairsville, Bedford Co., Penn'a, ROSANNA BLOUGH wife of brother Noah Blough, aged 38 years and 22 days. The subject of this obituary was a member of the Lutheran Church for about nineteen years. In her departure the Church has lost a worthy and faithful member, society an ornament, the children a pious, affectionate mother, and the husband a cheerful, devoted wife. But we sorrow not as for those for whom we have no hope.—The loss that has been sustained by us all, in this sad bereavement, is her eternal gain. Two of her children preceded her to those glorious mansions above, and seven are left to mourn the absence of a dear mother.

A large concourse of people followed her to her resting place. She was buried in the Presbyterian cemetery, at St. Clairsville, the services being conducted by her pastor. The occasion was improved from the words, "Having a desire to depart, and to be with Christ, which is far better." Phil: 23. In addition to the sad bereavement occasioned by the death of a loved one, our sympathies are aroused, also, in behalf of the present affliction of the family; for while I am communicating this sad intelligence, the father and three of the children are attacked with diptheria, two being in a critical condition. May the God of mercy smile graciously upon this afflicted family, and may the means employed for their restoration to health prove efficient.

JOHN H. ZINN.

At Benavola, Washington county, Md., March 7th, of consumption, our friend, JONATHAN EMMERT, son of our much beloved brother, Leonard Emmert, aged 29 years, 6 months and 6 days. Brother Emmert made choice of the first Psalm, first three verses, for the funeral text. Our friend was a very interesting man; he spent his whole life in learning, and teaching school. He took sick during the winter, while teaching high school in New Jersey. He returned to his father's as soon as he could, and bore his affliction with patience. Funeral discourse by brother David Long, J. Harp, J. Mitchel, and the writer.

ANDREW COST.

In Galien, Michigan, on March 2d, of spinal, or spotted, fever, friend DANIEL RHOADES, in his 38th year. He was a son in-law of Bro. John Miller, near South Bend, Ind., where he was brought, 20 miles distant, for burial. The funeral was largely attended on the 4th. Services by Bro: D. Sturgis.

He leaves a kind wife and five children.

C. WENGER.

In the Lawrence county branch, Lawrenceville, BENJAMIM A. FRITCHAY, departed this life on the 23rd of December, 1873, in his fourteenth year, also WM. FRITCHEY, departed this life on the second day of January, in his 22nd year. Sons of friend John G. and Lutiela M. Fritchey. Hence within ten days two brothers were laid side by side in the silent grave. The boys had made no profession preceding their sickness. Oh what a solemn warning to all. Disease brain fever. Text, Ecl. 12: 7. Funeral by J. Hart and the writer.

J. B. ALLENSWORTH.

In the Middle Creek branch, Somerset county, Pa., March 12th, brother JOSEPH MEYERS, aged 69 years 5 months and 2 days. Funeral services by Elder Tobias Blough, John C. Schrack and the writer, from 2 Corinthians, 5: 10, 11.

JACOB D. MILLER.

Near Leon, Decatur county, Iowa, December 28th, 1873, ELIZA ANNA, daughter of brother Jacob, and sister Katy CASTER; aged 3 years less 19 days. Disease, croup; Funeral services by the writer, followed by Elder S. A. Garber. Text, Luke, 18: 16.

LEWIS M. KOB.

In the Plum Creek congregation, on the 12th of December 1872, our much beloved brother PETER KIMMEL; aged 33 years 2 months and 8 days.

The subject of this notice was a faithful deacon of the church over 6 years, always at his post and discharging his christian duties in a proper manner, as far as God gave grace, and his bodily strength would permit. By his chaste conversation and christian department, together with his kind persuasions and earnest pleadings with those about him, we believe he was instrumental in the hands of God in winning some precious souls to Christ. He was afflicted more or less for about 9 years; sometimes very sorely afflicted with shortness of breath. He was affected about 3 years with inflamation of the lungs, when hemorrhage of the lungs took place, and from that time (we believe) consumption set in, till finally death relieved him, as above stated. He leaves an affectionate wife (sister in the Lord) and two little girls to mourn his loss. But not without hope, for he died in the triumphs of a living faith and a glorious immortality beyond the grave, where pain, sickness and sorrow are felt and feared no more. We truly feel to sympathize with the bereaved widow and friends: may God be a kind husband to the widow, and a rich Father to those two little orphans, is our prayer. He had selected the 5th chapter of 2 Cor. to be used at his funeral, which was complied with, by the writer, and the 9th to 11th verses (inclusive) taken as a ground for some practical remarks.

JACOB KELSO.

In Palestine congregation, Feb. 21st, ELIZABETH HOLINGER, daughter of brother Daniel and sister Rebecca Holinger; aged 23 years 5 months and 17 days. Died of consumption, after a long and protracted illness, which she bore very patiently. She was a member of the United Brethren Church. Funeral services conducted by the brethren; to a large and attentive audience, from 1 Peter, 1: 24.

SAMUEL BAKER.

In the Rock Creek branch, Whiteside county, Ills., on the 16th March, after a short illness, sister MARY WATERS, wife of brother Jacob Waters; aged 48 years and 18 days. She leaves a sorrowful husband and three children to mourn her loss. The funeral was attended to by a large concourse of people and relatives. Occasion improved by Elder Jacob S. Hauger and the writer, from Amos 4: 12, latter clause.

The Christian Family Companion. Is published every Tuesday, at $1.50 a year, by Henry R. Holsinger, who is a member of the Church of the Brethren, sometimes known by the name of "German Baptists," and vulgarly or maliciously called "Dunkards."

The design of the work is to advocate truth, expose error, and encourage the true Christian on his way to Zion.

It assumes that the New Testament is the Will of God, and that no one can have the promise of salvation without observing all its requirements, that among these are Faith, Repentance, Prayer, Baptism by trine immersion, Feet Washing, the Lord's Supper, the Holy Communion, Charity, Nonconformity to the world, and a full resignation to the whole will of God, as he has revealed it through his Son Jesus Christ.

So much of the affairs of this world as may be thought necessary to the proper observance of the signs of the times, or such as may tend to the moral, mental, or physical benefit of the Christian will be published, thus removing all occasion for coming into contact with the so-called Literary or Political journals.

Subscriptions may begin at any time.

Death.

I have selected a single word for a text. It is not a strange word, nor a disputed word from a foreign tongue, with ambiguous definitions, but a plain Anglo-Saxon word quite familiar to us all, and one that concerns every individual on the face of the whole earth. For no man on God's footstool can deny the existence of death.

Many people have an abhorrence of death, and will say, "O, don't talk about death, it is something I dread!" This is no strange expression for a sinner, since every sinner who will reflect but a few moments on his latter end, (and most of them do,) will shudder and grow pale at the thought of death and the judgment. There is an instinctive dread and fear of death, to a greater or less extent, in the heart of every sinner. Nor is it any wonder. Even the infidel and the skeptic who had spent their lives in blasphemy, revelries and debate, tauntingly calling into question the word of eternal truth, and sneering at the simplicity of the gospel, have an involuntary dread of death when the final hour is near.

Death is sometimes personified and honored with titles, as the "King of Terrors;" "The pale Messenger," and "the enemy of all flesh."

"Death has feigned evils nature shall not feel;
Life, ills substantial wisdom cannot shun."—Young.

Since this world has become a vale of sorrow, a lazaretto of pains and diseases, it is a great blessing to mankind that their sufferings need not endure forever: but that death entered into the world to terminate the sufferings of this world.

Another poet exclaims,

"O death! the poor man's dearest friend,
The kindest and the best."

Again Young says,

"Death is the crown of life!
Were death denied, poor man would live in vain,—
Death gives us more than was in Eden lost;
This king of terrors is the prince of peace."

When I ask what is death? The general answer will be, it is dying, expiring, ceasing to live. But is this the right answer? It must be, according to another poet who exclaims,

"What is this that steals across my frame?
Is it death? Is it death?
If this be death, I soon shall be,
From every pain and sorrow free."

The cessation of life, the separation or dissolution of the soul and body, is generally called death. But is this the scriptural meaning of death? What does the apostle say? Why he says, "the wages of sin is death." Now if death be the wages, the reward or punishment for sin, would people die, receiving these wages, who did no sin, or repented of their sins? If the cessation of life be the wages of sin, how could our children die? Sin is the antecedent and death the subsequent. How could the subsequent follow where there is no antecedent? How could there be an effect without a cause? It will be readily seen that in this case death has a different meaning from the dissolution of soul and body, or from merely ceasing to live, because those who are "dead in tresspasses and sins," can not at the same time be alive, and at the end of their earthly career, after their dissolution, receive the wages of their sins, which is death. If death be merely considered dying, or expiring, as the wages of sin, it must be conceded that the sinner, only must die or expire: and the Christian who has been purified from all sins by the blood of Christ, need not die at all, and hence could remain in the body. But, even Christ who had done no sin, expired on the cross, and gave up the Ghost. He had not sinned that he should receive the wages of sin; though he tasted of death for every man, it was not for his own sins, but for the sins of the whole world. And though he tasted of death, he did not receive death as his wages, even for the sins of the whole world. But he overcame death, and put the wages of sin under his feet, so that he could wield his scepter over them as King of kings and Lord of lords.

Again the apostle says, "Death reigned from Adam unto Moses, even over them who had not sinned in the similitude of Adam's trangression." Now this death here spoken of cannot be merely a cessation of this natural life, because this kind of death—expiring death—is reigning still. But there was a death which Adam received as the wages of his transgression and disobedience. I will say more of this as we get on farther. Again, the apostle says, "To be carnally minded is death, because the carnal mind is enmity against God. But to be spiritually minded is life and peace." To be carnally minded is not the dissolution of soul and body, and yet it is death. How can that be? Is the carnal mind the wages of sin, if the wages of sin be death? When a person is carnally minded, he is dead in tresspasses and sins, how then can this carnal mind be the wages of sin? It will be seen that the carnal mind has a being, it is in a certain condition, it has an existence in enmity against God. And this state of being—this condition of existence, whether in the body or out of it, is death. It is death because it is in enmity against God. God is a spirit and his worshippers must worship him in spirit and in truth, which they only who are spiritually minded can do. When Adam came under the influence of the Devil, he became carnally minded, and disobeyed his Maker. He lost that spiritual mind which God gave him, and became carnally minded like the devil is, and that was death. "For in the day thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die." This was an immutable decree. But Adam listened to the Devil. He believed him more than he did his Creator; he ate of the forbidden fruit. Then poor Adam felt ashamed, he knew he had incurred the displeasure of God, and his guilty heart told him that he was in a condition at enmity with God. And this condition of mind, this state of existence of mankind in general, continued during the reign of Death from Adam unto Moses. When a constitution, a platform, or hand-writing of ordinances of better things was instituted. Though it was only a shadow of good things to come, it contained the moral basis of redemption, for the law was spiritual. Rom. 7 : 14. In answer to what is death? I will say in conclusion; it is a guilty conscious state of existence of a never dying worm in enmity against God, either in the flesh or out of it. That is death, the wages of sin.

Walking in the Light.

We read in the first Epistle of St. John 1 : 7: "But if we walk in the light, as he is in the light, we have fellowship one with another, and the blood of Jesus Christ his Son cleanseth us from all sin." Now what is it to walk in the light? According to my knowledge, it is nothing else than to obey all his commandments, and live a holy and upright life. I have said, we must obey all his commandments, but perhaps some one will say, if a person keeps some of the commandments, they are still walking in the light, without keeping all what he has commanded; but I would differ with such, for I am satisfied that we walk either in the light or in darkness. For instance we take the natural day or light, and darkness or night, to illustrate the matter. Now is there any one that travels, who can at the same time travel in light and in darkness? No, I think not, for he must either travel in day time or in the night, for he could not travel in day and night at the same time. Now I think it is just the same in a spiritual sense, for we are either walking in the light, or in darkness; we are either followers of Christ and do his commandments, or we are followers of the wicked one, and obey not the Gospel; for I do claim that it is just as possible that we can walk in day and in the night at the same time, as it is to walk in the light, and willfully transgress some of his commandments.

But there are some professors of religion, in our days, who, if you say anything about keeping the commandments, they will tell us that we "expect to be saved by our works; but the blood of Christ will cleanse us from our sins, and all the commands are only outward ceremonies and they will do us no good. If we have the testimony in our hearts that we are the children of the light, that is all that is required." But if walking in the light is to keep his commandments, why then we have no promise that the blood of Christ will cleanse us, unless we are willing to obey the whole Gospel. If we obey all his commandments then we have the promise and his promises are yea and Amen.

Christian Evidences.

Friendly reader, I would like to call your mind to a very important point which belongs to our holy religion. As we hear much said about experimental religion, and the evidences of the same, it is truly a matter of the greatest importance to have the proper evidence. But the great point is, from whence can we obtain them, and how do they affect us?

While we were in our sins we were "aliens to the commonwealth of Israel, strangers to the covenant of promise, having no hope, and without God in the world." But those who were afar off were brought nigh, by the blood of Christ. It is not sufficient, however, for us only to be brought nigh; for the connection between Christ and the believer must be so entire, that it may be truly said of us, we are in Christ: Hence, the Apostle teaches, "If any man be in Christ he is a new creature. For as many of you as have been baptized into Christ have put on Christ." Thus we understand that we must first come to Christ, and this we can only do, when we exercise an evangelic repentance, and a living faith, forsaking everything that is sinful and contrary to the teaching of the word of God; and becoming willing to believe and obey every requirement of that word." Then we are ready to be baptized into Christ, and thus to put on Christ. It is then that we have the promise of the gift of the Holy Ghost; for Peter said, "Repent and be baptized every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ, for the remission of your sins, and you shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost." Then it is that the Spirit bears witness with our spirits, that we are the children of God. And not only this, but the written Word also bears witnessto the fact thatwe are the children of God. Hence, says the Apostle "See ye have purified your souls by obeying the truth." Thus, by believing and obeying the truth, we are brought into Christ, and now our Christian race commences. It is necessary that we now heed the language of Christ, when he says to the believing Jews, "If ye continue in my words, then are ye my disciples indeed." Thus we see that it is necessary for us to take heed to the word of the Lord, and obey from the heart, the form of doctrine delivered to us, and not only obey, but abstain from everything that is forbidden in the Gospel, and walk upright with a pure heart, fervently, so that our light may shine, and the world see that we have passed from death unto life. Having passed from death unto life, that new life will bring with it new duties which must be faithfully performed, and in the performance of those duties we still give evidence that we are the children of God; for John says, "Hereby we do know that we do know himif we do keep his commandments." And again, John, referring to the same idea, says, "Hereby knew we that we are in him." From the foregoing we learn that there is a legal way to come to Christ, and this is all taught in the word of the Lord. Thus, when we follow the legal teachings of that word, then we have a right to claim the promises of God, given in the word. For God cannot fail to fulfill his promises, if we perform our part, and if we realize the promises, then we will know that we have passed from death into life.

Persecution.

BY J. R. HEPPEN.

"They that will live godly in Christ Jesus shall suffer persecution." So the Word tells us, we believe. This has been the testing point of all true believers ever since the Savior first came into the world, and it is plainly understood that persecution is a part of the christian's inheritance. Yet how many there are who fail to follow Jesus in the narrow way. They imagine the way is too narrow, and that Jesus is a hard Master. They know that he was "despised and rejected of man; a man of sorrows, and acquainted with much grief." He was despised, and men esteem him not, but resort to some fashionable church in order to find a noble, may I say aristocratic Jesus; but seek in vain. The despised Jesus trod the lonely path, the narrow way; and yet how many poor, faint-hearted ones, fail to follow him. They had a true description given them of the way. Jesus did not deceive them, when he first appeared unto them, and commanded them to follow him. He came not in disguise; he showed to them his wounded side, and pointing upward to the cross, and said: "If any one will come after me, let him deny himself and take up his cross (not during meetings or lovefeasts only but) daily, and follow me." We cannot take the advantage of our fellow man, during the week, and be Christians on Sunday. No; God is not mocked. The Savior said even more than this: "If they have persecuted me, they will also persecute you." Persecution began, and you unwilling to leave your case in the hands of God; forgetting for a time that the very same power that brought Jesus safely through, is also able, and will bring you through. I often find myself where nature would prompt me to answer quickly, but grace triumphs. I "keep still," and God gets the glory. Unless God has taken the natural out of our heart, and given us the supernatural, we will find it very hard work to "keep still," especially when misunderstood or misrepresented. Is it not true, that it often requires more of the grace of God to keep still, than it does to talk or write. Then in the hours of temptation, "keep still:" "In your patience possess ye your soul." Wait patiently on the Lord, and the promise is, "You shall renew your strength." If persecuted for righteousness sake, we shall be happy, for the spirit of glory and of God resteth upon us, and we are enabled to count it all joy when we fall into temptation, knowing that with the temptation, God will make a way for our escape. Let us trust in God he is faithful.

Good Luck.

Well, now, little girls and boys, I will talk a little while with you. I suppose that the little folks are pretty much, in some respects, like they were when I was a little girl. Myself and playmates always had much to say about good luck. In all our little undertakings we wished good luck, but we did not really know the meaning of the term; or in other words, we merely desired good luck, and thought it came of itself, without any effort of our own. But long since I have learned better. I will tell you that I have learned that good luck has an intimate friend, so intimate that we will call her the mother of good luck. This mother's name is "Diligence;" and, children, if you would have "Good Luck" for your constant friend, you must not fail to make the acquaintance, very early in life too, of its excellent mother, Diligence. So you see it is necessary to acquaint with one if you would with the other. They are closely connected, so much so that they are never far apart. And if you desire the assistance of one, you are compelled to become acquainted with the other, in order to obtain your desires. So now, be good children, and study this short lesson, that I, through the permission of our editor, commit to you; and perhaps I will talk to you some time again.

Obedience.

"Not every one that saith unto me Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven; but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in heaven." Matth. 7: 21.

In the time of Christ, and during the ministerial labors of the apostles and those commissioned by them, it was necessary for them to labor and devote much of their time to convince the people that Jesus Christ was the Son of God; That the fallen sons and daughters of Adam should believe on him, as the true Messiah, which was predicted by the prophets should come into the world, and through whom all nations shall be blessed. And it seems, in those days, when the apostles were successful in convincing them that Jesus was the promised Savior, it required but little labor to persuade them to comply with the Savior's teaching, and do his commandments.

But in this age of the world, at least in this our country, it would seem unnecessary to use long and elaborate arguments to convince men of this truth, for we can scarcely meet with any one (except Jews) who do not confess that Jesus is the Christ. But what labors to persuade them to do his commandments, and comply with his teaching. The idea and belief that "faith alone" is sufficient, is entertained by many, and zealously promulgated by not a few, and are continually crying Lord! Lord! which has brought the Christian world into such a state, that it requires labor, arguments and persuasions unequaled in any age, since the world began, in order to convince them of the soul purifying power "in obeying the truth," and of the great importance of doing the commandments of God, as we find them given in the gospel of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ.

It is the aim of every one, when he makes a profession of religion, to enter into the kingdom of God. Now our Savior, in the language heading this article, gives us plainly to understand what is necessary for us to do, that we may finally be admitted into his everlasting kingdom. He says, "He that doeth the will of my Father which is in heaven." That the gospel is the will of God, we presume no one doubts. Then having the will of God before us, and we thank the Lord that he has not only made known his will, concerning us, but in such a way, and in such language, that we all may read and understand. That none need be ignorant of the great plan of salvation. Then let us accept it, and receive it as "the power of God unto salvation," "the sword of the Spirit," which is the Christian's weapon, and "is quick and powerful," and which will enable us to "come off more than conquerors through him that loved us." But merely to know the will of God, though we may read it much, study it well, and believe it all, does not constitute us "Sons of God," and heirs of the kingdom. We then only have the power, or privilege "to become the sons of God." John. 1: 12. Jesus came into the world, not only to make known but to do the will of his heavenly Father. He says, "For I came down from heaven, not to do mine own will, but the will of him that sent me." John 6: 38. It was his meat and drink to do his Father's will. In all his doings he did the will of God; was obedient in all things—obedient even to the death of the cross. And when he had finished the works given him to do, while here in the world, he ascended upon high, and is seated on the right hand of his heavenly Father, "highly exalted," and "has given him a name which is above every name," "whom he hath appointed heir of all things."

Now in order that we may be heirs and joint heirs of him, we must be very near related to him—must be adopted into the same family of which he is the "Elder Brother." "For whosoever shall do the will of God, the same is my brother, and my sister, and mother." Here we learn, by doing the will of God (the gospel) we are made near relatives to our Savior, so near that God will own us as his adopted children, and has promised all his faithful adopted children joint heirship with his own dear and beloved Son. We must therefore endeavor in all things to pattern after our Lord, in obeying the will of God; have the same mind that was in Christ, and led by the same Spirit, which shall lead us into all truth. "They that are led by the Spirit, they are the sons of God." Thus the apostle says, "Beloved, now are we the sons of God." And again "all things are yours." But "he that saith, I know him (the Lord) and keepeth not his commandments, is a liar, and the truth is not in him." We may say Lord, Lord, cry much and cry loud, like a so-called preacher not long since, who prayed that God should give him a voice like thunder, that he might cry mightily to God. But with all this, if we are not willing to obey the Lord, and do the things which he says, I fear we shall fail to be known of the Lord, in that day. The Lord said: Why call ye me Lord, Lord, and do not the things which I say?" "For I have not spoken of myself; but the Father which sent me, he gave me a commandment, what I should say, and what I should speak. And I know that his commandment is life everlasting; whatsoever I speak therefore, even as the Father said unto me so I speak." John 12: 49, 50. Now read 15 verses farther, and we learn what the Savior did, and what he said. "If I then your Lord and Master, have washed your feet; ye ought also to wash one another's feet. For I have given you an example, that ye should do as I have done to you." Here we behold the Savior doing the will of him that sent him, in the humble performance of washing his disciple's feet. And here it is we hear him saying to his disciples—his true followers as his heavenly Father, commanded him to say, and so he spoke, and commanded them, "that they should do as he had done to them. Yet in the face of all this, many who profess to be disciples of Christ, object and say, "non-essential," "not necessary." Well, Peter first thought so, but the Savior told him the consequence, and then he immediately was willing to comply. And what can our modern objectors expect but the same consequence, if they do not comply? But says one, "It was only to wash the filth and dust off the feet, and that we do." Do you? Do you wash one another's feet when you wash feet to take the filth off? But what is the argument? The disciples had been about three years with the Savior, and during all this time they were ignorant of knowing how to wash the filth and dust off their feet, that the Savior in that last night he was permitted to converse with them, before his crucifixion, had to wash the dirt off their feet, to show them how, and give them an example, that they may know how to keep their feet clean. Is this what the Savior said, and are we so to understand him? This is casting a stigma of disgrace upon the apostles, and is enough to cause angels to weep, at such perversions of Holy Writ.

Well says another, "It was only to teach humility; if we are only humble enough to do it, that is all that is necessary." Well, show me thy faith without thy works, and I will show thee my faith by my works." "Faith without works is dead." Christ washed the disciples' feet, and gave an example. If washing the feet was to end there, there would have been no need of an example for washing the feet. But if it was to be perpetuated, and practiced among his disciples, an example was necessary, and he gave us an example, not only of humility, but also an example of washing the feet; and said, "do as I have done to you." The very fact that Christ give his disciples an example of washing feet, in that doleful night of his betrayal, is proof that it was to be practiced among his disciples. But as it was in the days of Moses, so it is in this our nineteenth century. The Lord is still provoked at the cry "non-essential." Let the doom of Korah, Dathan, and Abbiram be a solemn warning to all who obey not the commandments of the Lord. Though the earth no more opens her mouth, yet the heavens shall rend to reveal the Lord "in flaming fire, to take vengeance on them who know not God, and obey not the gospel of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ." But why need I write? They have Moses and the prophets, yea evangelists and apostles, if they believe not them, neither will they believe "though one rose from the dead." So I will close, as I begun, in the language of Jesus: "Not every one that saith unto me Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven, but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in heaven."

The Master's Call.

The Master is come and calleth for thee. John 1: 38.

She to whom these words were addressed, was, at the time she recieved the summons, sitting in her sorrow, mourning over the heaviest loss of her life. Lazarus was in his grave, and Mary was desolate. She had not even the heart to go and meet the Lord, as Martha had done; she could sit in the house and weep. But Jesus loved her, and would not leave her comfortless. He had come a long journey, with a great purpose on his mind, and he knew how soon Mary's tears, and Martha's trouble, were to be turned into praise and joy. But first he must comfort them; and his immortal words to Martha, and the tears he wept with Mary, have opened streams of comfort for the sorrowing sisters and brethren of our race, which shall never cease to flow till God wipes away all tears. "The Master is come." Mary had but one Master, and her whole love and service were devoted to him. Happy are those who in joy or in sorrow can sing:

"Jesus my Lord: I know his name,
His name is all my boast."

The name of the Master was a talisman to arouse her at once from her weeping. "He whose I am, and whom I serve, shall not need call me twice." Sorrow cannot over master one whose Master is the Lord. It is a delightful thought to the Christian that while he is a son, he is also a servant. He looks up to God with the filial love and confidence of a child, but he looks up also, "as the eyes of servants look into the hand of their masters, with a look in which love is combined with reverence, and godly fear with devotion and willing heart-service.

"The Master is come." Mourner, can you feel that One your Master, even Christ? And can you, in your affliction, realize that not only sorrow has come, but blessed are they that thus mourn, for they shall be comforted. The Master not only came, but he called for Mary. Sorrow individualizes God's dealings with us, and makes us feel that he knows us, one by one, and calls us one by one. Many a heart that knew him but afar off in the day of prosperity has heard his voice and owned his call in time of trouble. When the voices of the world are hushed around us, then is the time for the still small voice to be heard. The Lord knows the number of the stars; he calleth them all by name, and he knows his people also, and calleth them also by name in the secret of their hearts. Oh bereaved one, listen to his voice when the yearning comes over you for "The touch of a vanished hand,

And the sound of a voice that is still."

The Master calls in various ways, and for various ends. Some he calls to repentance: others he awakens to a sense of the realities of life and death, heaven and hell; to some his voice is one of awful warning or faithful rebuke, and to others it is a call of grace and forgiveness. He called for Mary however in order to comfort her; and sweet indeed was the message, that led her to find at his feet, healing for all her wounds. There is no grief too deep for him to fathom, no sorrow too great for him to heal. "Come unto me," is the call by which he invites all the weary and heavy laden; and when he calls, it is to give them rest.

Why is It?

Dear Sisters, in a short mission of love through parts of Iowa, in Jan., I saw many (or nearly all) of the single sisters, and of the married ones, not a few, coming to the house of worship, without the proper covering on their heads. Why is it so, dear sisters? Will you answer? "Produce your cause, saith the Lord; bring forth your strong reasons, saith the King of Jacob." Isaiah 41: 21. Perhaps some of those sisters will be ready to adopt the language of an eminent minister of the Disciple church, in reference to the salutation of the kiss. It was, (says he) a practice in the apostolic church, and is a positive command, and nothing but pride, and corruption, which has crept into the church, has ever brought it into disuse." Is that the cause? Is that the reason? If so, we will take silence for consent; if not produce your strong reasons, and perhaps, by permission of Divine Providence, and our brethren Editors, we will give the subject farther notice, in due time, and perhaps associate with it, the duty of Elders, in reference to this very important, and sacred ordinance.

ROOM IN HEAVEN.

Rev. 21, 16, "And the city lieth foursquare, and the length is as large as the breadth; and he measured the city with the reed, twelve thousand furlongs. The length and the breadth and the height of it are equal."

There are some who never think of heaven. In their mind a thought of the better country would starve for very loneliness. Others think of it occasionally, when the voice of sweet music steals upon their ear, or Providence or the preacher lifts them above earth. But when they do think of it, how poor and meagre their thoughts: to them it is a narrow circumscribed spot in the universe, a small piece just large enough for their Church, but too small to admit within its pearly enclosure, even the good beyond their communion. Such were not the views entertained by John when, on the lonely Isle, he saw, in grand panoramic view, the heavenly city,

John was in the Spirit on the mountain of holy contemplation, and he had a delightful conversation with one of the royal surveyors of the heavenly country. He says ver. 15, "And he that talked with me had a golden reed to measure the city, and the gates thereof, and the walls thereof." The idea he gave us, is, that there was solidity, firmness, durability, and strength, all combined with indescribable beauty, surpassing grandeur and infinite glory.

The city, as he saw it, was in the form of a magnificent cube, of vast dimension. The surveyor had the golden reed, and measured the city in presence of his visitor. It was 12,000 furlongs (stadii) long, and 12,000 furlongs broad, and 12,000 furlongs high. The length, and the breadth, and the height of it are equal.

Here is absolute uniformity, a thing long talked of and prayed for, but something not to be realized on this side the heavenly home.

In this cubic from the new Jerusalem recalled somewhat the form of the far-famed old Jerusalem, on its escarpment above the valley of the Kedron.

In this view of the great city we are quite in harmony with the rabbinical books. I need not occupy room with quotations.

In almost every other theory proposed great violence is done to the Greek text. In this interpretation the sense is natural and the grammatical construction respected.

We take the passage as it reads, "12,000 furlongs," which, when reduced to feet and cubed, is 948,938,000,000,000,000,000,000 cubic feet.

The half of which we reserve for the throne of glory and the heavenly court. Half of the remainder I reserve for the angel's thrones, dominions, principalities, and powers.

Half of the remainder I resevre for celestial gardens of heavenly fruits and flowers. Half of the remainder for shady bowers and lovely parks. Half of the remainder for the golden streets and walks, and the remainder, or one thirty-second of the whole, I divide into rooms of (20) twenty feet square, and ten feet high, of rooms we have 7,413,578,125,000,000,000,000.

Then I suppose that this world was populated as at present with say 900,000,000 of human beings, and that there generations passed away every hundred years, is that allowing $33\frac{1}{3}$ years for each generation, and that at the close of the seventh thousandth year, the trumpeter of heaven would proclaim that "time be no longer," and that earth's population would all be brought home to the city of God.

I also suppose that in the universe of our Father there are (800,000) eight hundred thousand world's like ours existing under the same circumstances, and for the same term of years as ours; each having the number of inhabitants as our own, and each inhabitant obedient to the universal "come."

Take all these multitudes of human or created beings, and the heavenly home the angel measured for John and for us, dear reader, would afford (49) forty-nine such rooms as are measured above for each inhabitant of all the 800,000 worlds, and leave more than four millions of cubit feet yet unsurveyed. "And yet there is room." Oh, how true it is that in "my father's house there are many mansions."—Guide to Holiness.

Thankfulness.

To be thankful implies the reception of a favor. When we really appreciate a favor, how ready we are to return feelings of gratitude to the person who bestows it. When a child petitions its parent for something it wants, if its wishes are complied with, how its heart swells with gratitude; this intelligence is indicated by the sparkling eyes of the little family jewel. When we receive acts of kindness, gifts, &c., how ready are we with a "thank you," "much obliged," &c., to the bestower. When the young man is about to leave home, has been a dutiful son, the father bestows him a beautiful house, with what feelings of thankfulness does the son accept this earthly boon. By strict economy prosperity may be his, and the storms of adversity shall never assail him. Thus we feel thankful to our earthly benefactors, and often when we see them, think of their benevolence, and bestow new feelings of gratitude on them. For an application of this, ever through life we have received precious gifts from our Heavenly Benefactor, and have we returned our thanks to him? We look back over past lives, we remember His goodness has attended our steps all through the journey of life, have we been grateful to Him and blessed his holy name? He has borne with our sins, till we were made willing to forsake them; are we now working faithfully in his cause? He has promised us a home in heaven through all eternity. Are we looking forward with joyful anticipation to that blessed time when we shall obtain the blessing and renew our gratitude to him? Sinner, the Lord is still gracious and full of compassion—is still waiting for your return Oh, do not put him off, but come and obtain the blessing—the pardon of your sins—live in his service, die in his name, that we may all live as one common family, and when death comes, all enter into those heavenly portals, where all is peace and happiness, where we all can surround God's dazzling throne, and again return unto him our thanks for the victory over death, hell and the grave! Thanks be to God for pleasing prospects, and to His name be ascribed all honor and praise forevermore.

Have You Ties in Heaven?

Ask the old man, whose silver hairs tell of the joys and sorrows of fourscour years, and see the dim eye light up with holy light, as by that question you have touched the mysterious chain that binds him to thoes who once made his pathway bright.

He will tell you he is" only waiting till the shadows are a little longer grown" ere he greets them midst strains of heavenly music. Go on, dear old father! He whose commandments you strove to obey amid the cares of life will soon say, It is enough: "let the poor pilgrim go home."

Ask the man of the world, who, day by day, week by week, toils and sweats for treasure on earth—ask him if he has no treasures in heaven, "where moth doth not corrupt." A shadow crosses his brow—not lest his earthly treasures "take to themselves wings and fly away," but at the memory of jewels which were once lent him from the "treasury of God ;" but now, that they have been taken from him, too often thought of them, amid his desires for gain, only as lambs of his flock that had been rudely torn away by death, and his thoughts of them are in the grave where he saw them laid. Man of the world, they are not there : they have passed the portals of death, and are now in Christ's school. Each day, as you strive for worldly honor, wealth and distinction, they are growing more lovely under their gentle Teacher.

Ask the man of God, whose holy calling it is to tell the glad tidings of salvation to a dying world—a smile sweet as a breath from heaven plays o're his face as he tells you angel hands have long been twining ties by which he is "upward drawn to God."

I asked a pale mother, who had felt much of poverty's sting and drank the bitterest dregs of sorrow's cup if she would not rather "sleep that sleep that knows no waking" than to have to toil so hard for her daily bread ? Not yet she said if the Lord is willing. I have children in glory, where none can "molest nor make afraid ; but I have, too, children on earth, and the hand of temptation is ever grappling for them. By the grace of God, I want to see them all dedicated to the Lord, and then I can say, "Come quickly, oh Lord !" Good mother in Israel, yours is a holy work ; and though you carry it on in patient silence, and no eye save the All-seeing One sees you, though no words of praise fall on your ear, great and glorious will be your reward when the last trump shall sound and you shall meet your children in peace and sit down with them in glory.

Is it not a "balm to the soul," when weary in the walks of life—when our sympathies are driven back by uncongenial sentiments, and sick viewing "man's inconstancy of man," to turn and listen to the whispering from the spirit land, which tell you of friends in heaven ? Though many years have fled since they left you, and all that remains of the form that once blessed our fond gaze may be a pile of dust, yet we know they are "up yonder" waiting for us. May be the flowers of spring have never yet bloomed on their graves, and our hearts are yet sore from the lashings of its emotion, that seemed like great waves of the ocean when the "Storm King" is abroad, yet the soul, wrapped in darkness as it is, has "Glimpses bright through vistas dim, though earth her vision mars,

Of a beauteous home in a world of light beyond, beyond the stars."

Are we all living so that the ties we now have in heaven will one day be more closely united ? or must they be severed in the great "day of reckoning," and we receive the sentence to depart without one thing to divert us from our torments not even for a moment ? Let each one turn and unlock "memory's casket," and see if it contains any jewels gathered from this life that are pure enough to sparkle in "a crown of rejoicing.

A word to Young Christians.

You have consecrated your lives to the service of Christ. You feel and admit that you cannot do too much for him who loved you and gave himself for you. You regret, perhaps, that thus far, you have done so little, and you intend in future to show commendable zeal. It is a noteworthy fact that many professed Christians have such a regret and intention and yet permit years, crowded with golden opportunities, to pass unimproved.

No man will accomplish much for Christ, who does not seize the present opportunity. The command is "Go work to day in my vineyard." The obeying that command implicitly, instead of making resolutions to obey it pretty soon, makes all the difference between a useful and a wasted life.

Those who are going to work tomorrow, are no help to the Master.

How much you may accomplish if you have a strong desire and firm resolve to work today for Christ ! Do you to ask, " How shall I begin ?"

Make a new and entire consecration of yourself to the Lord Jesus. Ask pardon for past remissness, and tell him how much you desire to honor him by being a faithful servant. Ask him to make duty plain, and help you to perform it.

Be watchful over your conduct. If you would be a successful worker, it must be seen of all that you are walking worthy of your vocation. Yield to no temptations of the world that will damage your character or impair your influence.

Go to your pastor yourself, and tell him how ready you are to help him and ask him to designate work of you. With you as his helpers in Christ Jesus, all the waste places in your vicinity may be cultivated, and many sheaves gathered for the Lord of the harvest.

You all can participate in the blessed work of advancing the cause of Christ. It is not for young men alone , it is equally for the young women Not a few pastors can testify that the sisters in the church have rendered them even more efficient help than the brethren- It is but little the pastor can do without the hearty co-operation of the friends of Christ ; with it he may expect large and blessed results. "He that reapeth receiveth wages." " They that turn many to righteousness shall shine as the stars forever and ever"—Southwestern Presbyterian.

Christ at the Table—I was in John Falls' Orphan House, in Weimar, one evening, when one of the boys had said pious grace : "Come, Lord Jesus, be our guest, and bless what thou hast provided," a little fellow looked up and said : "Do tell me why the Lord Jesus never comes? We ask him every day to sit with us, and he never comes !"

" Dear child, only believe, and you may be sure he will come ; for he does not despise our invitation."

"I shall set him a seat," said the little fellow ; and just then there was a knock at the door. A poor frozen apprentice entered, begging a night's lodging He was made welcome—the chair stood empty for him. Every child proffered his plate ; every child was ready to yield his bed.

The little one had been thinking hard all the time. "Jesus could not come, and he sent this poor one in his place—is that it ?" said the child.

"Yes dear child—that is just it," answered Falls. "Every piece of bread and every drink of water that we give to the poor, or the sick, or to the prisoners for Jesus' sake, we give to him. 'Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me.' "

An hour of triumph comes at last to those who watch and wait.

Infidelity.

Fools in their hearts believe and say,
That all religion's vain
There is no God that reigns on high,
Or minds the affairs of men.

From thoughts so dreadful and profane,
Corrupt discourse proceeds,
And in their impious hands are found,
Abominable deeds.

Their tongues are used to speak deceit,
Their slanders never cease,
How swift to mischief are their feet,
Nor know the paths of peace.

Such seeds of sin, that bitter root,
In all their hearts are found,
Nor can they bear diviner fruit,
Till grace refines the ground.

For the COMPANION.

A Talk at Home.

Come, dear wife, take this seat close by me. I desire to say something to you. We are very lonely circumstaneed now. We have left friends and relations, brethren and sisters, and many kind friends and have settled ourselves among strangers. Yet there is another thing that I desire to talk about. We have no meeting now, you know, and brother Holsinger said in his "word of encouragement" to us, that in the absence of a preacher, that we should choose a text, study upon it, and preach to ourselves. Very well; let us try to preach a little to night; or rather let us talk a little. Preaching is rather too hard for us, as we are both young in years, and younger in the cause of our blessed Master. So let us only talk a little.

This is the third anniversary of our married life, so we will say something in regard to our duties to one another. My theory of life is that it is a school, of mental and moral developement. That God intended that each soul should pass under a series of influences, whose office it should be to evolve all its faculties, and soften and harmonize them. To this end he has laid upon each a sweet necessity, to adopt the ordinances that he has contrived.

When I speak of necessity, I do not mean compulsion save in a limited sense, compulsion entirely consistent with individual election. Thus I believe that there is a very material portion of mental and moral developement which can not be gained outside of the marriage relation; and to bring men and women into this relation, he has given them the sentiments of love, and the desire of personal possession, and this desire is made so strong, that it may hardly be resisted, so that all shall choose to be joined in the conjugal relation. Thus the strong are softened by the weak and the weak are invigorated by the strong. And the influence of men and women upon each other becomes the most powerful agencies for their mutual growth. Then we need not inquire into the cause that has brought us together. But as we cast our eyes back, let us see if there are any shadows in the past; if there are not, we are certainly on the right road; but if there are let us in the future try to shun them, for God has intended that we shall live happily together. We have but one life to live, and no amount of money, or influences, or fame, can pay us for a life of unhappiness. We can not afford to be unhappy; we can not afford to cherish a single thought, to harbor a single desire, to gratify a single passion, nor indulge a single selfish feeling, that will tend to make this union anything but a source of happiness to us. So it becomes us to understand each other. It becomes us to resolve that we will be happy together at any rate, or that if we suffer it shall be for the same cause, and in perfect sympathy. We are to understand that we "twain are one flesh," identified in objects, desires, sympathies, fortunes, positions—everything. We are to know no closer friend. But I have nothing to say against you. No, thank God, outside of our misfortunes, our life together has been a pleasant one. But human character by a wise provision of Providence is infinitly varied, and there are no two individuals in existence so entirely alike in their tastes, habits of thought, and natural aptitudes, that they can keep step with one another over all the rough places in path of life, so there must be a bending to one another. We must help to bear each others burdens, and do it willingly.

But again. As we set out with bright anticipations for the future, let us cast our eyes on the past. Have we in all our joys, in all our misfortunes, and in all the visissitudes comunon to this life, acknowledged God the author of them all? Have we acknowledged him supreme in all things? When death came into our midst, and snatched our little Clara, our first born, and tore her from our embrace, and then our dear little boy the last that God has given us, and when we had expected to fill the vacancy of the first, he too was taken. Can we, I say, acknowledge God the author of all this? Yes: it was his work. He giveth and he taketh away again. But now, if the question should be asked, when these little lives have become a thread of gold, running through all our experience, if we regret that they were born? We answer, No. The sweetest and truest couplet, that the Queen's Laureate ever wrote, tells the story on this point—:

"Tis better to have loved and lost,
Than never to have loved at all."

But ah: dear wife, I see that I have touched a tender cord—a mother's sympathies. But why weep for those dear children. God has taken them, and I believe that he will take care of them for us. But why, I often ask, does God take those little buds, that have just begun to open their beauty to the sunshine? Why snatch them from us, when in them we had placed such hope? A hope that is natural to all mankind. A hope that they should be with us through this life, and that when the evening of life should come with us, that then we would still have have some one to look to for consolation. But, I often console myself, with these thoughts, that one great design with him is that we, knowing that those dear ones are with him, might be constrained to fight more valiently, walk more faithfully, and be more zealous in the good cause, that we may at last get home to those dear ones, and the blessed savior. God desires to save us all. And now, although we are lonely, although we are separated from the church, and the influence of many kind friends, yet let us not forget that God is here as well as there; that he sees our every action, and will hold us accountable for our conduct in this life, in a coming judgement day. Then it becomes us to watch, lest we enter into temptation, and to check the first step that may lead us from the path of duty. For I am sometimes made to shudder when I see how easy we are to be led astray. How cunning Satan is in devising his plans, and how easy it might be for us to loose the great object designed by our dear Savior—a home in heaven. But I have a preventative to all this. It is prayer; so let us daily say "lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil." Let this be our refuge, our hope.

But I will close. Life is before us, not earthly life alone—but life—a thread running interminably through the warp of eternity. And while I wish we may have many joys and all healthful delights, I do not wish that no pains come upon us, no care oppress us, no toil weary us, no sorrow swim in our eyes, no temptations beset us. but I wish that we may bear what God puts upon our shoulders, and bear it well. I wish that no one may have reason to chasten us over much But we can hardly expect to grow strong without trouble, or sympathetic without sorrow. It was necessary that the only true human life that ever lived should be made "perfect through suffering," and it would be strange presumption for us to think that we can be made perfect without it. I wish that we may have many years upon this earth—as many as will minister to our growth and happiness—for life is a sweet as well as great and wonderful thing. And when in the evening of life the golden clouds rest sweetly and invitingly upon the golden mountains, and the light of heaven streaming down through the gathering mists of death, I wish us a peaceful and abundant entrance into that world of blessedness, where the great riddle of life, whose meaning we can hardly comprehend, will be unfolded to us—the quick consciouness of a soul redeemed and purified.

The Covering.

"For this cause ought the woman have power on her head, because of the angels." 1 Cor., 11 : 10.

This is a subject which has caused much contention in the churches, and yet remains undecided in the minds of many persons. "The head of every man is Christ, and the head of the woman is the man, and the head of Chsist is God," says Paul to the Corinthians. Head : to lead, to direct, to act as leader to.—This subject seems to have direct reference to the ruling members of the church. God is the supreme ruler of the Son, the Son of every man, the man of every woman, officially. Jesus is the mediator of the new covenant, and he has committed the word of reconcilliation to his ambassadors. The elders of the Church are lead by the direction of Christ; but the offieial women of the Church, such as the "elect lady and her children," 2 John 1 : 1, being led by the directions of the elders of the Churches, they only act as rulers, and for this cause they ought to have power on their heads, because of the (elders) angels. Some members think that Paul had refference to the angels in heaven, but we think that he had reference to the angels in the Church, as we find in Revalations, 1 : 20 : "The seven stars are the seven angels of the seven churches." We think if the laws of heaven were judicially applied to, with the spirit of meekness, it would save many a soul from death, and hide a multitude of sins. This power cannot be imposed upon the sisters as being leaders, only at such times when they lead in prayer, teaching, if "prophecying" means teaching. But says one, "we ought not to suffer women to teach." Paul says, 1 Tim., 2 : 12, "But I suffer not a woman to teach, nor to usurp authority over the man." If a woman will attempt to lead in teaching or prayer, without power on her head she is usurping power that does not belong to her, and will bring reproach upon her head, on this account because she is to be shorn, "even that is all one, as if she were shaven." She could depend upon it that if she would not cover her head that she would have to be shorn or shaven, and she was already condemned, as if she had her hair cut off. Long hair is, or was, an honor to a woman, because it was a token of her modesty, and the power, or covering that denotes power, a signal of her subjection.

We do not believe that there is any scriptural authority, for the elders to dictate for the sisters what the covering is to be composed of, as long as the sister's covering remains within the limits of modesty. Paul treats of a voluntary humility : "Which things indeed have a show of wisdom in will-worship and humility, and neglecting of the body; not in any honor to the satisfying of the flesh." Col. 2 : 23. We cannot be volunteers as to the means of worshipping God, but we ought to worship him in spirit and in truth, or in the spirit of truth. Our admonition to the sisters, one and all, be ye followers of the leaders of the Church, as far as they follow Christ.—"Let not our adorning be outward, or external, of plaiting the hair, and of wearing of gold, or of putting on of (costly) apparel; but let it be the hidden man of the heart, in that which is not corruptible, even the ornament of a quiet spirit, which is in the sight of God of great price." The outward adorning will all corrupt in the grain, but that inner man, the meek and quiet spirit, is a germ that will never corrupt, but will be quickened at the sound of the last trump, and will be clothed with immortality, "and death will be swallowed up in victory."

Your affectionate sister,

ELIZABETH LEEDY.

Wages for Preachers—But.

BY S. M. MINNICH.

In current volume of the C. F. C. No. 3, in attempting an answer to the question what Paul meant by saying, "I robbed other churches, taking wages of them to do you service." I said that Paul meant, while he labored for the Corinthian church, other churches paid him wages, and it seemed like robbery to him to preach for the Corinthians and receive wages from others. I also said that every Christian minister who faithfully preaches the gospel, ought to be paid wages.

To this, brother Laudon West, in C. F. C., March 4th, kindly says that, "A plain answer was given, to which the scripture will give sanction." Good for that, I thought ; a coadjutor in the work. Seeing the next sentence commenced with a but, "what does this mean," says I. But! But what the scriptures teach that ministers ought to be paid wages, but. One would think there was no call for a but to excuse us from obeying a Bible teaching. But how wonderfully but does change our ideas. But now hear him : "Perhaps all the preachers on this round earth need no other support than their two hands." The brother ought to harmonize this with his "very plain answer to which the scriptures will give sanction."

The brother asks, "Do you look upon preaching the gospel as a business by which we can obtain a living?" I do not. There is not one minister among the Brethren, from Maine to Oregon, or from the Canadas to the Gulf, that has received wages sufficient for the support of himself and family. Preaching is not a business by which we can obtain a living by depending on the Church. But I believe, brother, that an earnest minister, who is powerful in word and doctrine, and will trust God and teach the Church their whole duty, to God and man, can make it a business by which he ought to obtain a living.

Ministers who possess wisdom and wealth, can make preaching the gospel a business ; but the poor cannot, if the Church believe and practice that "all ministers on the round earth need no other support than their two hands."—For a minister who has denied the faith and is worse than an infidel, would be a poor preacher to edify the church or save sinners.

You seem to think only ministers should forsake houses and lands, wife and children, and lay up treasures in heaven, and that the laity may have their houses and lands, and lay up their treasures on earth, I suppose. You think no one has a right to expect pay for doing his duty. I think every one has a right to expect the wages promised, when he does his duty, and those only who do their duty can expect pay.

Think no one ever went to meeting and refused to preach unless they were "paid in money for it?" Therefore, think your admonition unnecessary.

You write, brother, as if our Church was pressed down, in consequence of the taxes levied upon it for the support of the ministry. Time forbids my adding more at this time.

Faith and Works.

THEY are the two oars of a boat. Row with the right oar alone, and the boat describes a useless circle on the water. Row with the left oar alone, and it merely goes in the opposite direction. But use both oars with equal force, and it moves swiftly and evenly forward.

Faith and works : they are the two wings of a bird. Using but the right wing, the bird flutters helplessly on the earth. Using the left wing alone there is the same result. But plying both with equal vigor, it plumes its flight heavenward.

So faith alone, or works alone, distract the soul—bind it in helplessness to the earth, or turn it in idle circles ; but give faith and works in equal strength, and movement is uniform. "What God has joined together let no man put asunder."

The devil's clock is ever too fast or too slow ; to the young he saith, "Rejoice in your lusts and passions ; gulp down the pleasures of this life ; there is time enough." The older he endeavors to drive to dispair, saying, "The door of mercy is shut ; it is too late ; there is now no hope."

Christian Family Companion.

DALE CITY, Pa., April 8, 1873.

RURAL VALLEY, Pa., March 20th, 1872.

Our last report ended with Friday evening, 16th inst. We were then conducting a series of meetings at the Cowenshannoc meeting house. Our last meeting at that point was last night. The meetings were well attended, and a good interest was manifested throughout. We feel assured that many good impressions were made, and fondly hope they may be lasting. We, however, were not permitted to see any immediate fruits of our labors, except that the brethren and sisters who were in attendance were revived and encouraged, and we thought, too, that we could see conviction on many faces.—

There was little unusual or striking during the meetings; save that, on Sunday, an old sinner in the neighborhood, who had thought it more important to attend his saw mill than our meetings, took offense at a slight allusion we made to him while we were answering the excuses which sinners frame for rejecting the offers of salvation. We are sorry that he took offence, but glad that the Lord preserves us from the power of such lions.—It is indeed a source of sorrow, that al most every neighborhood has one or more such characters, who not only refuse to enter in themselves, but are a hindrance to such as would. It is also strange, that persons can live to old age in religious sections, with pious relatives, who pray and labor for their eternal welfare, and yet they will persist in living in sin. The love of God, the condescension and sufferings of the Savior, the operations of the Holy Spirit, the prayers of the church, all fail to move them to feel, to consider, and to choose the greatest good.

On Thursday evening, 13th, rain prevented us from meeting the appointment. There was, however, but little disappointment, as there were only a few there.

On Wednesday evening brother J. P. Hetric was to be in attendance, but for some cause, unknown to us, he failed to come. We were in hopes that he would continue the meeting, and so made appointments for ourself in another quarter.

We are now at father's (Jacob Beer's) where we aim to rest a few days; and then, on Saturday evening, commence a course of meetings at the Baptist meeting house, not far distant. For the satisfaction of all who feel interested, we will say that our health has much improved.

Money Wanted.

During the present month, we will send out statements to the amount of about two thousand dollars, with earnest appeals in each one for the payment thereof We hope that in every case we will have a prompt and a willing response. This credit system is very severe on us. It is forcing us to pay heavy interest bills, and thus is eating up all our profits. For instance, brethren order Hymn Books, and compel us to wait six to twelve months for the pay. On a dozen of Hymn Books, we have about seventy two cents, out of which we must pay express charges for getting them here, putting them up for our customers, and for the use of the money invested.

Will not all those who receive our statements, give them their immediate attention, and if found correct, at once remit us our dues? Please! We have heavy bills to pay during April.

Drafts or checks preferred. Money orders (on Somerset, Pa.), or registered letters, are also safe means of transportation. No money at our risk unless sent by one of the above means.

Please do not put off paying our bills until the Annual Meeting, as we must have money to get ready for the meeting. Send it right now, won't you?

Tune and Hymn Books.

We are again out of Tune and Hymn Books, but are in daily expectation of a new supply, when we shall be able to fill all orders now on our books. The work is well received wherever it has been properly examined. Price $1 25, single copy, postpaid. Ten dollars a dozen, by express, at purchaser's expense.

Answers to Corresponsdents.

E. G. ZUG: We have no account of it. We have now entered his name.

MARY LAWYER: Your name was overlooked. We now send you back No's.

A. CRUMPACKER: According to our books, the Harps were sent March 1st.

D. BROWER: $1.90 will square accounts.

JACOB HILDEBRAND: We prefer the cash system, but will fill an order for you if you wish it. Please let us know.

H. S. JACOBS: You have a credit of 90 cts.

SUSAN SHICKEL: Please inform us where you wish your paper changed from, and we will cheerfully do so.

BROTHER HOLSINGER: Query 31, Annual Meeting, 1872, adds to a former order, "We re-adopt the answer to the minutes alluded to, and consider that any brother, who suffers himself to be elected and serves in such office (legislator) as that alluded to, cannot be retained as a member of the church." Let every soul be subject unto the higher powers. "For there is no power but of God: the powers that be are ordained of (or ordered) of God, for he is the minister of God to thee for good. Rom. 13: 1, 4 This subject is now somewhat delicate, as it was adopted by Annual Meeting; but it is still open to an honest investigation. If this government is ordained of God, reason inquires why are good, or God's people excluded from working in his own institutions? Or in other words, if his people are excluded and none but the wicked are allowed to rule and pass laws, could it be called "of God?" And would they be the "ministers of God to thee for good?" When the righteous are in authority, "the people rejoice; but when the wicked beareth rule, the people mourn." Prov. 29—2.

This subject may not have been thoroughly studied or investigated, but it now stands on the minutes of Annual Meeting, and is open to the gaze of the world, that had been looking upon the Brethren with admiration; some because they are thirsting after righteousness, and others because they are jealous of our devotion. We must believe that there is no person so blind in this land of Bibles, that willfully seeks the destruction of his own soul; but is rather seeking an entrance into the family of God. There are many looking towards the brethren with an eye single to their salvation, who can read the gospel and understand it as well as we can. But here comes now one of the minutes of Annual Meeting, hurled forth by sectarian newspapers, and scattered to the uttermost part of the earth, that a brother will be excommunicated if a grateful people should admire his goodness so much as to elect him to the legislature When a man is a real Christian he possesses all the qualities that an intelligent and honest community, will admire in a legislator. I wish this not to be understood to criticise the action of the Annual Meeting. The order of the brethren is to obey the gospel, and when they come together at Annual Meeting, they act on such questions as are differently understood, and when the question is decided, the meaning is, that such is the construction of the gospel. But may not a decision be sometimes erroneous? It must not be said that the New Testament is now obstructed, and we cannot go into it, to find what its contents are; simply on account of such a decision. Let us see what it says and teaches on this subject.

If this restriction did not exist in the apostle's time, it does not now. In the first place, were persons refused admittance, because they were rulers? "There came unto him a centurian." "For I am a man under authority." But Jesus said of this man: "I have not found so great faith, no not in Israel." Matth. 8: 5, 9, 10. Also Matth. 19: 18. "There came a certain ruler and worshipped him." (Jairus.)

It is not positively said that these were disciples, yet they were surely converts, and we may conclude they were disciples, as they were highly approved.

Next comes Nicodemus; he was a ruler of the Jews and a master of Israel. It is also not positively stated, that he was a disciple. It is not only the conspicuous part that he took in Christian matters, that we know him to be such, but historians tell us that Gamaliel was his uncle, and that after he received baptism, the Jews beat him, and would have put him to death, but for his uncle's sake; They however deposed him from his dignity as senator, and excommunicated and drove him from the city. Here excommunication was on the other side.

Next witness after Nicodemus, comes Joseph of Aramathea. "When the even was come, a rich man, of Aramathea named Joseph, who also himself was Jesus' disciple." Matt. 27: 57. "Joseph of Aramathea, an honorable counsellor, who also waited for the kingdom of God." Mark 15: 43. "And behold there was a man named Joseph, a counsellor, and he was a good man, and a just, (the same had not consented to the counsel and deed of them) who also himhimself waited for the kingdom of God." Luke 23: 50, 51. "And after this, Joseph of Aramathea (being a disciple of Jesus, but secretly for fear of the Jews.) John 19: 38.

Still other witnesses: Acts 8: 27, "And behold a man of Ethiopia, an eunuch of great authority." Also Acts 10: 1. "There was a certain man in Cessaria called Cornelius, a centurion."

Some of these officers may have been only military, yet they were government officers. Military were instructed to do no man any violence. But most of these were civil officers, and the highest grade that could be allowed to the Jews, as they were under the Romans. And counsellors were the highest officers tolerated (except high priest) being the same to the Jews as senators and representatives to the legislatures. The secrecy of Joseph and Nicodemus could only have been to continue in their dignity as senators. The centurions spoken of were Roman officers, and therefore required no secrecy. There is no Scripture that any of these subjects had to renounce their lofty positions. Such a conclusion would only set up men's own peculiar notions, in place of Gospel; A folly that the Catholic's have first inaugerated, and is followed up by a good many others. There is no doubt in the fact that Nicodemus and Joseph were counsellors and disciples at the same time. The action of Annual Meeting on this subject is not envied by other denominations. The Pope who is so eager to domineer over the whole earth and bring temporal power under his despotism, would hail with joy if a few more denominations would withdraw from participating in the government, and let him walk triumphantly into the same. Where would then be the coveted liberty found only in this American land. Its laws matured by a Roman dictator, would soon wipe out the Brethren. To pray for those that are in authority, and expect an answer for that we pray for, without doing something to accomplish what we pray for, when it is in power, would be like praying for our daily bread, and expect to receive the same without sowing wheat, and do the necessary work to get bread. "My kingdom is not of this world." This quotation is used by the advocates of the minutes refered to, but in what way it justifies this conclusion is more than I can understand. Christ does not deny the necessity of a temporal law. "I came not to destroy the law." "Who made me a divider among you?" There are none that claim that his kingdom was temporal. When he perceived that they would take him by force, and make him a king, he departed "into a mountain." That business was left for God's ministers. Paul knew that, and we can rely upon his construction of the truth. By giving constructions too narrow, we might easily blunder into the error spoken of by 2 Peter 2: 10, and despise government or dominion.

It is also said that man is too easily corrupted, to risk sending a brother to the legislature. Who then can be trusted? Brethren are allowed to vote, not only for a brother, for it would be rather inconsistent for a brother to vote for a brother one day, and the next day meet in council and expel that brother voted for by himself. This would be rather a bad omen, not trusting a brother in preference to the unconverted. This spirit that we mistrust others' honestly, is one of the greatest evils inherent to mankind. Many go so far as to say there are none honest. Like Diogenas, carry a lantern in the daytime through the city, to find an honest man. "Out of thine own mouth will I judge thee." Man is a more noble being than would warrant such a conclusion. Christ will not allow us to entertain such opinions of one another. See Matth. 6: 1—6. "Speak evil of no man," Titus 3: 2. Man often errs, but more for want of understanding than honesty. Let us look to our own hearts first and then the dishonesty in others will not look so huge. So with legislators, their corruption is probably more fancy than reality. "They are the ministers of God to thee for good."

In Memoriam of Jonathan Emmert,

Departed son of Elder Leonard Emmert.

I would feel indeed recreant to duty, did I not raise my pen in feeble effort, in attestation of the virtues of the departed, and in fond memory of cherished friendship. On Friday the 14th day of March, we were among those who witnessed the last sad tribute of respect, paid by the large cortege of friends, and sorrowing relatives of the deceased. We had before us for the last time, the lifeless form of our dearly beloved friend, JONATHAN EMMERT—the sad evidence of premature decay. The last of all the vigorous ambition and energy that characterized his life, has expired forever. He who there lay before us coffined in the cold embrace of death, possessed an untiring and unrelinquishing ambition, which we verily believe was the primary cause of his premature death, superinduced by an overtaxed energy of mind, beyond his physical endurance. Some eight or nine years ago he entered Easton College, Pennsylvania, where by his great determination of character in close study and rigid confinement he was enabled at the expiration of the usual collegiate course, to graduate with honor to himself, reflecting credit upon the institution to which he was so fondly attached, looking forward perhaps to a long life and career of usefulness, in dispensing abroad the benefits of his acquirements, to his fellow man.

But God in the infinitude of his wisdom, for some cause only known to him, saw proper to lay the afflicting hand of his providence upon him, and after a short season of suffering and affliction he finally bids him come. He perhaps at first reluctantly relaxes the firm hold of his earthly affections, and by divine assistance concentrates them upon things heavenly and divine. He lays hold upon the one altogether lovely, powerful to save and strong to deliver.

With the doting affection, care, and comfort, of all who were near and dear unto him by the tender ties of nature, being administered unto him whilst approaching nearer and nearer the dark valley of the shadow of death—his imprisoned spirit begins to flutter for relief, to be uncaged from its tenement of clay, and fly for refuge and rest, to the bosom of his faithful Creator, whose broad and incomprehensive love induced him to give his well-beloved son to suffer and die the ignominious death of the cross, in order to restore fallen humanity to favor and fellowship with him, the God of our salvation. The culminating period was at last reached, and on last Wednesday morning, at half-past five o'clock Jonathan Emmert breathed his last. The jewel, that everliving principle in man, took its immortal flight, the tenantless casket was before us in confirmation of the truth so vividly expressed by the martyr of affliction, that, "Man that is born of woman is of few days and full of trouble; he cometh forth like a flower, and is cut down; he fleeth also as a shadow and continueth not." And, as the apostle has expressed: "For all flesh is as grass, and all the glory of man as the flower of the grass; the grass withereth, and the flower thereof falleth away,—but the word of the Lord endureth forever."

And may God grant that all who upon that occasion, looked for the last time upon the cold face of the departed, may cherish up in their hearts this inspired sentiment, that "It is not all of life to live, nor all of death to die," but after death the judgment.

And may we be enabled through the riches of Divine Grace, to make the significant appeal of old David, invoking the Lord to so teach us to number our days, that we may apply our hearts to wisdom, and to create in us clean hearts, and renew within us right spirits.

Fully appreciating the fact that wealth, distinction, and honor, with all the attributes of this life, must perish with our dissolution, we may leave some wholesome influence behind us, as a bequest, in the form of an exemplary life, well spent in usefulness to ourselves, God, and our fellow man, leaving upon the record of the past, some legitimate effort, that may be cherished up in fond memory of the departed, that may dispense its salutary influence over our survivors and lead them in the paths of rectitude, wisdom and piety.

As a model of strict moral integrity, and persevering energy of character, we commend all who knew him, to follow the beneficient example of Jonathan Emmert, left as a free will legacy to all who did know him but to love him for his virtues. Tho' he be dead yet he speaketh.

In reference to his spiritual and eternal interest, we can only say he died, professing confidence toward God. Through the riches of his redeeming love we leave him in the hands of him whose judgments are true and righteous altogether. Imitate his virtues, and if any one has recognized in him any faults, use your best efforts to evade them.

We tender our most heartfelt sympathy to his bereaved relatives, and friends, whose hearts have been so keenly lacerated with sorrow and anguish, and bid them lean confidiugly upon the strong arm of God's love and mercy, for that comfort and strength which cometh alone from him who is the Father of mercies, and the God of all comfort.

I love thy chastenings, O my God,
They fix my hopes on thy abode,
Where in thy presence fully blest,
Thy stricken saints forever rest.

May God in the infinitude of his wisdom, goodness, and mercy, bless and sanctify this afflicting dispensation of his providence, toward the advancement of his glory, and the edification, and finally the salvation of our immortal souls. Peace be to his ashes, and may the great God of love and peace continually rule and reign in our hearts, is my prayer.

Let us Reason Together-Isa. 1: 18.

DEAR BRETHREN.—Several articles have appeared in the C. F. C., on the question whether it is right for the Brethren to go to the polls and vote a no-license ticket, on the 21st of March. Evidently none of the dear brethren, writing upon the subject, wish to dictate to their brethren, but admonish them to think of this matter—weigh it well—consult reason, as well as the denying doctrine and principles of our Lord Jesus Christ. I wish to add a few words of serious thought. I have well weighed, dictated by reason, and, as I think, in accordance with the doctrine and principles of our Lord Jesus Christ.

In the first place, the question is not at all whether we, as Christians, ought to participate in the usual elections. Nor is it a question with us at all, whether we ought to vote license or no-license; but the case is stated simply thus: is it right to go to the polls, purposely to vote no-license? For I trust that we have no brethren who would think of going to vote for license, for continuing a soul-destroying traffic.

In the second place, let us examine the matter in a scriptural point of view. And here I would say, that the scripture is silent on many matters of duty, such as this is; giving us no definite decision on abstract subjects. There is danger that our zeal may lead us to a misapplication of it, or detached portion of it, so as to suit our peculiar views. Very often, too, we go out of our way, and wrest the scriptures to make them suit our purposes. I might apply some passages to enforce my views on this subject, but I could be met by those who differ with me, with passages that suit their taste; therefore, I prefer examining our subject, not so much in the light of many scriptures, as in the light of the general tenor of the gospel, and the example of our Savior Himself.

Did not our blessed Savior meet with, eat, and gladly aid publicans and sinners, and the most of men and women, that he might do them good? Did he, or did he not, avoid all places where sinners congregated? Did he ever fail to let his light shine, that his Father might be glorified? Did he ever publicly, or did he only privately condemn sin, or the promoters of sin? Did he, or does he now, expect his disciples to spread his gospel, bring men to repentance, and use their powers to save souls from everlasting death, or did he expect worldlings to be turned to him by the appeals and labors of their fellow worldlings? And when James (4: 17) attests that "he that knoweth to do good and doeth it not, to him it is sin," can he possibly mean that his injunction does not apply, when it puts us in close proximity to gross sinners? Of course he does not mean that we may do evil that good may come (Rom. 3: 8), but I take it that he means, that as we have opportunity we shall do good to all men (Gal. 6: 10), not seeking our own profit, but the profit of many, that they may be saved. Cor. 10: 12. That when we are thus engaged in our Master's work, the spirit of God and of Christ will go with us anywhere, everywhere, into the vilest dens of sin, if we honestly believe we can save a soul. It is not necessary, not likely that any one that lives in the spirit, bears about in the body the dying of the Lord Jesus (2 Cor. 18: 10), goes to the work in His name, will fall into sin, though he might fall into temptation, which is not sin; because, "greater is he that is in us, than he that is in the world." 1 John, 4: 4. He will be our shield, our exceeding great reward. Therefore, from this view, it seems to me it is clear, that our duty is plain, and that we are called upon now to deny ourselves, let our light shine, not considering whether we give cause for unfavorable criticism, or whether our choice may, or may not, please everybody.

Lastly, to consult reason, apart from scripture, if I see a fellow-being in danger from a burning house, and I might save his life by prompt action; but instead of rushing to his rescue, I fall upon my knees and pray for his deliverance, in the supposition that I represent the righteous man with his fervent prayer, and while I pray, the firemen, with their apparatus, with oaths, and other vile language, come on the scene, too late to save, am I justified in my course, by my notion that fire engines are worldly arrangements, and the men with them too wicked to mix with, and that my fervent prayer will be effectual? No, brethren, I take it that the effectual prayer is that which is supported by works.

But again, if I see a brother or sister enticed into any place of danger, of soul or body, am I not permitted to enter such a place, with the desire to save my brother, merely because it is the gateway of hell, and I may meet there those whose feet go down to hell? Anti license vote, we earnestly hope to rescue, not one, but many from temporal and eternal ruin bring them under the influences of the gospel, decrease poverty and crime, and cause the wilderness to blossom as the rose. Is it possible that our religion is so weak that we cannot do our duty, and that simply and alone on this question, without a fear of our skirts being soiled by being in contact for a few minutes, with those of the world, because their conversation is not to edification? We do not carry out this idea in our everyday life. We mingle with the world in store and shops, at public sales, where strong drink is sold; in taverns often, when business calls us there. We hear nothing to edification, nay more, we do not even reprove the sins that we hear and see. A great hindrance to the place of election days being now removed, since the bars are closed on those days, makes it safe, even for those whose appetites might be tempted, to go to their duty without fear.

Dear C. F. Companion:

Permit me to say a few words, after a long pause of apparent stupor and lifelessness, caused by disappointments, not of a carnal or temporal, but of a spiritual and moral nature. Being of a sanguine disposition, I perhaps had to be trained to moderation, hence my disappointments in getting help by the brotherhood to preach the gospel in this State.

The calls, however, being urgent from many places, I was aroused to double my diligence, and, with the assistance of a few brethren, sallied forth through the cold and storms of a northern winter to kindle the fire of the gospel in the hearts of the people. Our efforts were not in in vain. We had a series of meetings in seven or eight different places, and quite a number have been added to the little flock, and more will be in a short time, if the Lord permits.

We have opened new fields where the harvest is ready for us to gather the grain. But as there are so many harvesters out to gather into their own men-made garners, instead of the great granery of the Lord, it requires more force than we can muster. It is true several ministers have come to this State, but they are far away from us, and a vast territory falls to our lot. Bro. M. T. Baer and myself do all we can, but to travel by rail, and preach where there are only a few poor members, is too expensive, and when now and then some man or woman is moved to give us a dollar, we hardly feel justified to take it. We, therefore, go single handed, each one for himself, which makes us feel lonesome when we read of the brethren in the East holding "series of meetings," where from three to a dozen speakers are present. Nevertheless we are not dismayed entirely, when we read in the Bible what Jonathan and his armour-bearer accomplished. And, as in that case, when the noise was heard, the whole host rose to pursue the enemy and rout him. Perhaps when search is made for those who are missing in the camp, the missing ones will be found and assisted.

Now, dear reader, the real object of my writing is to encourage others of my dear brethren ministers, who are borne down with the weight of their burden for the Lord. Others that told of their labors and success through the press, have, in a great part, assisted us in the work, by stirring our minds in the Master's cause.

Brethren, you that give church news, need not be so particular always to state with whom you lodged or dined, though it is a satisfaction to them that are immediately concerned, yet it is not of general interest.

Bro. S. Thomas will accept my thanks for his poem on tobacco, and Moses Miller, in regard to alcohol.

The remarks by the editor on page 170 are very appropriate. In fact, I am either in good tune to read, or the reading is much improved, Occasional criticism I think will put writers on their guard, but sarcasm ought to be avoided.

A Proposed Visit.

Brother Henry: Permit me to say through the Companion, that I intend (the Lord willing) to visit the congregations in Juniata, Mifflin and Huntingdon counties, Pa., and if time permit, also Union county, providing they will have communion meetings at the above named places, prior to the Annual Meeting, allowing us time to return to the place of Annual Meeting, by Saturday the 31st of May.

Brother Wetzel says, he also expects to go to Lancaster, Lebanon, and Dauphin counties, at the same time; if they have lovefeasts. He exercises in the German language. Hope the brethren will inform us in due time, either privately, or through the COMPANION. If there are no feasts at the above named places, we will go no farther than place of Annual Meeting.

UNIONTOWN, PA., March 26th, '73.

BROTHER HOLSINGER:

The District Meeting of Western Pa. for the year 1873 will be held in the George's Creek congregation, of Fayette Co., at the Fairview meeting-house, 12 miles south-west of Uniontown, commencing on the 21st of May. Also communion at the same place on the evening of the 20th. Brethren going to the above meeting, by railroad, will stop at Uniontown, where they will be met and conveyed to the meeting. Those going by the Monongahela River will land at Sterling's Ferry, 2 and ½ miles from meeting and will be met and conveyed to meeting. By order of the church.

WM. MOSIER, Sec.

The Maine Mission.

The attention of the churches of the Eastern and Middle Districts of Pa., is hereby called to the "Maine Mission." Below I give extracts of letters in my possession, from which it will be seen that there still is a desire among the people in Maine, to have "the way of God expounded more perfectly." There are still other facts set forth in those letters, more encouraging than those given below, but of such a nature that I deem it not expedient to publish them; but will submit them to the meetings of both districts when in session, and whatsoever more may be obtained, during the intermediate time will be also laid before them. My opinion is, there is still a work for us as a church, to do, in those remote regions, that ought not to be neglected. But it requires sacrifice of the enjoyment of friends and home, which are just as near and dear to the minister, who goes, as to anyone else. And it requires means at the hands of the church; so that those willing to make said sacrifice, and approved of by the church, may be brought on their way: hence this appeal is made to the churches, to give the subject their prayerful attention. The letter under date Dec. 22nd, says: "There is still a hungering for the Word of Life. I often hear people say: I wish those ministers from Pennsylvania were here, to preach unto us the things pertaining to our everlasting well-being.

Same letter says: "All the people to whom I showed your letter, say to me; send him my best respects—tell him he must come back again, &c."

Under date of March 16th, the same correspondent writes as follows: after giving the result of another visit they have had since we left; he says: "But there are a number here that would be glad to see you, and hear you preach the word; and if you will write what inducements and encouragements you wish held out, I will make an enquiry and see if they can be given."

I have replied to the above enquiry and will give the result at the proper time.

BROTHER HENRY: Please announce in the C. F. C., that the brethren in McLean county, Ills, have appointed their love-feast on the 14th and 15th of June next. It will be held at brother John Y. Snavely's one mile north-west of Hudson, commencing at 10 o'clock on Saturday. A hearty invitation is extended to all the brethren and sisters, especially the ministering brethren. By order of the Church.

HENRY FORNEY.

BROTHER HOLSINGER: A few lines to the brethren east, who may desire to come West, to Iowa, especially to ministering brethren. There are 12 or 16 members here, in this county, and no speaker, and I think that there might be good done here if we had a speaker. The friends wish we could have meeting here by the Brethren. I think the chance is good for a church, and good chances to get farms, as land is yet cheap. Our address,

DIED.

We admit no poetry under any circumstances in connection with Obituary Notices. We wish to use all alike, and we could not insert verses with all.

In the Stony Creek branch, Logan county, Ohio, March 13th, AMANDA E. JONES, daughter of Alfred and Mary Jones, aged 3 years, 8 months and 16 days. Funeral occasion improved by the writer, from Job 19: 23.

In the same congregation, March 18th, ADA MILLER, infant daughter of Samuel and Elizabeth Miller, aged 1 year, 1 month and 5 days. Ada has faded away in the tender sphere of life. Man comes forth as the green foliage of summer, and fades like the autumn leaves. Oh, that man would consider his latter days before he resembles the autumn.

Funeral occasion improved by the writer, Job 17: 13.

MICHAEL SWONGER.

In the Mill Creek congregation, Adams Co., Ills., March 19th, our beloved brother and co-laborer in Christ, JOHN MCCLINTOCK, aged 65 years. His sickness was protracted, and his sufferings were very great, yet he was patient in his affliction, bearing up under it all with a great degree of Christian fortitude; so much so, that it is but seldom we find a parallel. He was worn down by disease, and weak in body, yet his faith was strong. His mind was clear and bright, without a cloud of doubt to dim his prospects in a blessed immortality. He had that faith that reaches beyond the vale, whither his forerunner, before him, had entered, waiting to welcome him home. He has been a member of the body of Christ about 25 years—the most of that time in the ministry. Like Moses, he was meek and retiring, always preferring his brethren to himself. Never manifesting an aspiring spirit, but in time of trouble would never flinch from duty, but manfully stood up for the right. His mind was strong, far-seeing, and clear. Slow and cautious, yet firm and true. In his death the wife, and sister, has lost a kind and loving husband, the children an affectionate father the Church her most prudent, and ablest counsellor, the community a good and peaceable citizen. In his departure we have sustained a loss that can only be known by those who realize it. He has gone to his reward, awaiting our arrival there. He requested that before his body was removed we should engage in singing, and read a portion of scripture, and pray. We made use of the 611th hymn, and read the last part of the fourth, and the first part of the fifth chapters of 2d Cor., with a few closing remarks. He was followed by many sorrowing hearts, mingled with a hope of a reunion, where sorrow, sickness, pain and death will be feared nor felt no more.

DAVID WOLFE.

Visitor please copy.

In Spring Run congregation, Mifflin Co., Pa., on Wednesday, March 19th, SALOME HEIMAN, youngest daughter of brother Michael F. H., and sister Eve E. KINSEL, aged 5 years, 8 months and 13 days. Funeral services by Elder Peter S. Meyers; from these words: "For the thing which I greatly feared is come unto me. I was not in safety, neither had I rest, neither was I quiet; yet trouble came;" Job 3: 25, 26.

Sallie, as she was commonly called, was an amiable little girl, and much beloved by all who knew her, most especially by the family; but her stay on earth was but short, and now she is an angel, and gone to dwell with her Savior, where we can all meet her, if we obey all of Christ's commandments.

S. W. BOLLINGER

In the George's Creek congregation, SUSANNA MOSER, wife of brother Daniel Moser, and first mother-in-law of J. Quinter, after an hour's illness. She leaves a husband and many friends to mourn their loss. She expired on Wednesday evening, the 26th, and was buried on the 28th.

DANIEL MOSER.

In the Waterloo congregation, Black Hawk county, Iowa, Feb. 7th, JOSIAH WELLER, in the 21st year of his age. He had been suffering for several years. Disease, white swelling. He suffered greatly for months before his death. Funeral by Bro. Ben. Beeghly and the writer, from 1 Thess. 4th chapter, latter part.

Also in the same congregation, March 17th, ELIZABETH WHIPKY, aged 75 years, 3 months and 2 days. She was a member of the Lutheran Church about 50 years. Funeral by the writer and brother Wm. Ikenberry, from Rev. 14: 13.

J. A. MURRY.

In Washington county, Iowa, Jan. 20th, CYRUS FARRIER, son of brother James and sister Mary Farrier, aged 6 years, and 10 months; disease, chilblain and gangrene. Funeral occasion improved by the writer, from Job 17.

Also, Jan. 23d, brother LEWIS KLINE, aged 71 years and 10 months. He leaves a sorrowing widow, a sister, and 6 children to mourn their loss. The children are all married, but they do not belong to the family of God. Funeral occasion by the writer, from 1 Cor. 15: 22.

STEPHEN YODER.

In the Milledgeville branch, Carroll Co., Ills., on the fourth day of March, after a short illness, brother JONAS PECK, aged 61 years, 5 months and 24 days. He leaves an aged widow, a sister, and 9 children to mourn their loss, which we hope is his great gain. All of said children are members of the Church, except one, and one daughter died a little over a year ago, who had also been a sister in the Church. He was elected to the office of deacon in the Elkhick congregation, Somerset county, Pa., from whence he moved to the aforesaid place, some years ago. His funeral was attended by a large concourse of people and relatives. Occasion improved by Elder Jacob S. Hauger and the writer, from Rev. 12: 13.

MARTIN MEYER.

Near Elderton, Pa., Feb. 28th, brother JAMES DOUGHERTY, supposed by some, who knew him longest, to be over 100 years of age. He died of old age and infirmity. We know of no surviving relatives. He was interred on the next day in the Brethren's graveyard. The occasion was improved at the time, from Heb. 9: 27, 28, by Bro. J. Kelso and the writer.

The Christian Family Companion. Is published every Tuesday, at $1.50 a year, by Henry R. Holsinger, who is a member of the Church of the Brethren, sometimes known by the name of "German Baptists," and vulgarly or maliciously called "Dunkards."

The design of the work is to advocate truth, expose error, and encourage the true Christian on his way to Zion.

It assumes that the New Testament is the Will of God, and that no one can have the promise of salvation without observing all its requirements, that among these are Faith, Repentance, Prayer, Baptism by trine immersion, Feet Washing, the Lord's Supper, the Holy Communion, Charity, Nonconformity to the world, and a full resignation to the whole will of God, as he has revealed it through his Son Jesus Christ.

So much of the affairs of this world as may be thought necessary to the proper observance of the signs of the times, or such as may tend to the moral, mental, or physical benefit of the Christian will be published, thus removing all occasion for coming into contact with the so-called Literary or Political journals.

VOLUME IX. DALE CITY, PA., TUESDAY, APRIL 15, 1873. NUMBER 15.

Shall I Stand the Test ?

When the Lord of hosts in mighty power
Shall try the hearts of the sons of men,
Shall I stand the test of the judgment hour ?
Shall I be prepared with the King to reign ?
When he calls his saints from east and west
Shall I be clothed as a wedding guest ?

Will my hands be clean, any my garments pure ?
Will guile be cleansed from my sinful heart?
Shall I leap for joy that my crown is sure,
Or shrink with dread at the word, "Depart"?
Shall I be clothed in a spotless vest ?
Shall I stand approved in the final test ?

All hearts shall quake in that trying day,
And trembling seize on the souls of men ;
The scoffing boast of the proud and gay
Shall be hushed by the cries for mercy then.
Shall I stand at last in the sinner's lot,
When the Judge proclaims, "I know you not"?

Shall I stand the test when the books are read
Where all my deeds have been written down ?
Will the Master place on my waiting head,
With a smile of approval, a starry crown ?
Or will sin be found in this guilty breast ?
Oh ! solemn thought, shall I stand the test ?

Shall I be too late when the Judge shall come
With the holy angels pure and bright,
To seal the guilty sinners' doom
And take his saints to their home of light ?
Shall I share at last in the scoffer's fate ?
Oh ! wretched thought, should I be too late !

Let my hands be clean and my heart be pure ;
Let my sins and guilt be washed away,
Let me bear the cross, to the end endure,
And stand the test of the Judgment day,
And pass with joy through the golden gate,
O God, forbid that I be too late !

The Creation.

Gen., 1 : 26-31. Golden text John 1 : 1-3.

It is always interesting to go back to the beginning of a thing. It must be strange for dwellers in one of the cities of the Western States, to reflect how very few years ago it was, that the first hut was put there in the middle of a trackless wilderness; and no less strange to visit Damascus, and wonder who founded, in the dim ages of the past, that oldest of cities: or to stand at the fountain head of the Mississippi, and to consider what that bubbling stream becomes. This might be profoundly impressive. A similar but far higher interest attaches to Genesis first chapter: "In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth." &c. This consideration may be usefully employed by our ministering brethren, to excite in the minds of the people an interest. It is important, however, to remember that it is the object of the Bible to teach religion, and not science; to tell us of God and our relations to him, and not to anticipate the discoveries of Astronomy and Geology. The primary design of the chapter, therefore, is not to describe the process and results of creation for their own sake, but through them to reveal the relation in which God stands to all created things. The distinction is an important one for teaching purposes. The attention of the people should be concentrated not so much upon what God made, as upon God himself, the Maker. For instance, here are four (out of several) things taught us in this chapter about God's creative work.

First. It was a creation. A carpenter about to make a chair requires two things: materials to work upon, and tools to work with. God had neither. Hence we see the immeasurable distance between his power and the very greatest power of man.

Second. It was a gradual work. He could have caused the universe to spring into existence perfect. This was not his way. Nor is it now. We ourselves grow almost imperceptibly from infancy to manhood. The christian life is a gradual growth—"as the shining light, shining more and more unto perfect day." The increase of Christ's kingdom at home and abroad is to us shamefully slow; but this is God's way.

Third. It was an orderly work. Animals were not made before the plants they were to live on; nor plant before the light, the air, and the earth, needed for their sustenance. "Order is heavens first law." Let all things be done decently and in order."

Fourth. It was done by word. There was no labor; "He spake and it was done." Here again we see the difference between God and man. Could the carpenter produce a chair by simply saying, "Let there be a chair?" Yet we, too, can do much by word. The centurion could say to his servant: 'Do this," and he did it. But this very power helped him to realize the greater power Christ. "Speak the word only, and my servant shall be healed." Health and sickness, ease and pain, joy and sorrow, life and death, were to him as one great army, marching at the bidding of the Lord of hosts. And so were the wondrous forces set in motion at the creation. The faith of the centurion reminds us that the Golden Text appointed for this chapter, points specially to the Lord Jesus as the Creator, as the true "Word of God," "without whom was not anything made that was made." Children or men more especially are too apt to think of Christ as beginning to live at Bethlehem. The text gives an opportunity for correcting this idea. It has been assumed in the foregoing remarks that the chapter will be on the creation generally, as the title intimates. But the passage for reading comprises only the account of the creation of man. If the teacher should prefer to confine himself to these verses, the following line of thought might be followed. God is holy, and kind, just and perfect. Are we so? If not—the best child will see he is not so in any adequate sense—we are unlike God. But this was not so at first.

We find (Gen., 1: 26, "After our likeness.") We are like a model or an image that has been broken or defaced: we must be mended or rather made over again, that is: created anew in God's image; which is percisely what is done with those in whom the Spirit works. Sec., 2 Cor., 3: 18; 5: 17; Eph., 2: 10; 4: 23, 24; Col, 3: 10; And just as, at the first creation without Him (Christ) was not anything made that was made, (as the Golden text says,) so it is in the new and spiritual creation: "Without Me ye can do nothing."

Pray Without Ceasing.

Too much stress cannot be laid upon the importance of prayer. Next to the duty of watchfulness, comes that of prayer. But it often happens that both may be practiced at the same time; and it is by prayer that we attain the disposition and power to watch. By prayer we obtain the blessing of God; and with this, every earthly blessing. Although many a hypocrite maintains the form of prayer, yet no Christian ever existed any length of time without this form. The more constantly, earnestly and sincerely we pray, the greater and more numerous our blessings. Prayer makes the darkest cloud withdraw. Neglect of prayer brings, first, a death of spirituality; next, worldly mindedness; next, forgetfulness of God, coldness, indifference to the work of God; next, enmity, hatred, covetousness, and every sin, and finally apostacy. Prayer overcomes sin and difficulty; strengthens faith, love, and every Christian grace; prompts to a putting on the whole armor of God; and sets a watch at every avenue of the heart and mind. Prayer unlocks the treasure-house of the word of God, and sets the soul travelling toward heaven; stimulates meditation, and anchors the soul, by faith, to the throne of God. Prayer should become a fixed habit of the soul: it should be continually rising from the soul, as the heat rises from the fire, always accompanied with thanksgiving and praise. Sisters should not pray except they have their heads covered. Paul says, "Every woman that prayeth or prophesieth with her head uncovered, dishonoreth her head; for that is even all one as if she were shaven." It is a pity that we must so often see our sisters with their heads uncovered, even waiting at funeral tables without their heads covered. Why, Paul says, "It is a shame for a woman to be shorn or shaven; let her be covered."

THERE is nothing so unwise as to trouble ourselves about possibilities. We may lay a thousand plans, waste time in revolving consequent events—even go on to imaginary conversation, and, after all, the occasion for them never occurs, and our plans are swept away like chaff before the wind.

The Crucifixion.

FROM THE GERMAN.

Seat thyself, my spirit lonely,
And behold this wondrous sight;
How thy God and King, thine only,
Hangs denuded, crucified.
Love unending, condescending
Left for you his Father's side.

Whether Jesus loves you truly,
At the cross you here can see;—
See how all their hellish tortures
Pierce his soul in agony.
Curse and anguish! see him languish!
Hear him groan so plaintively.

Now, his soul of God forsaken,
Unto death is troubled sore;
And his body hangs suspended,
Full of wounds and smeared with gore.
Patience all, and all endurance,
Are exhausted, suff'ring sore.

These, the fruits of my transgressions,
These, my Savior, trouble thee:
And this suff'ring's oppression,
To the deep should prostrate me.
These travail ngs for my failings,
Ought I feel eternally.

Though for me, thou hast defeated
Sin and Death, the powers of Hade':
God's design thou hast completed,
All his will thou hast obeyed.
Me forgiving—to the living,
Through thy death a way hast made

Oh! I sinful worm and earthy!
Jesus, didst thou die for me?
Shall thy foe he saved—unworthy!
Through thy blood atoningly.
I must, speechless, bow in meekness,
For this good, unworthily.

Soul and body, life and being,
All, thou gavest up for me;
Ought I, in return, not render
All I have and am to thee?
Thus I promise, as becometh,
To subscribe my heart to thee,

Jesus, I commend my spirit
Wholly now into thy hand.
Let me live for thee expressly,
Till this mortal life shall end.
Then admit me, out of pity,
To thee in the Fatherland.

Keeping the Commandments.

"If ye love me, keep my commandments."

When the above language issued forth from the lips of Christ, our Divine Redeemer, it was more fully directed to the apostles; but undoubtedly will apply to the followers of Christ, the persons who form the church militant. We are taught in the first and great commandment, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God;" for love is the fulfilling of the law: it is the first and great thing that God demands of us, and therefore the first and great thing that we should devote to him.

We are directed to love God as ours; which implies that we must have him for our God, and love him as our God, and that we will engage our love to him. To love God as ours, is to love him because he is ours—our Creator protector and preserver; for in him we have eternal life—in him we live, move, and have our being. Then "if ye love me keep my commandments"—the commandments of God, as delivered unto his apostles; which have been handed down from posterity to posterity until they have reached the followers of Christ in the present age; which throws them into the same relation with Christ, concerning the keeping of the commandments, as were the apostles in our Savior's time. We are commanded to be baptized for the remission of sins; to wash one another's feet, as our Lord and Master did, to show our humility, our desires to be humble, and our willingness to comply with the commands of Christ.

But it appears to be otherwise, with some persons, as it was in our Savior's time. Then some were so much concerned about their worldly affairs, that there was no time left to serve God. They were eagerly engaged seeking after wealth, honor, and self-reputation; saying, in their own hearts, "At some future day I will love God and keep his commandments." Ah! regardless soul, you may be in the prime of life; you may be as strong as the towering pine, that lifts his head high above the forest trees; that withstands the stormy blasts of winter, the howling tempest, and lives evergreen until the dawn of Spring, when the woodman's ax is laid to the root of the tree, and it is hewn down and falls a broken, helpless body to the ground. So is your life. Though you are strong and vigorous, sway a high and exalted scepter of honor above your fellowman, fearing no danger, dreading not the consequences of a once offended God until disease prostrates you upon a bed of affliction; then, oh! then, regardless reader, then will come thronging back upon your soul the misspent days of thy youth, the unregarded invitations of mercy, and the kneckings of the Spirit which thou hast so often rejected in days that are past. Then you would engage your love to God and say, "I will love God and keep his commandments."

Pause, gentle reader, let me point you to the bright morning star—the star of Bethlehem—the guide to our Savior, who gave his dear life for us. It will light you through every care in this wilderness of life. It will gild the dark and doleful gloom that will gather around you when you come to the valley of the shadow of death; and will bring you safely over the tempestuous river of death, into the promised and settled rest, to bloom in perpetual love, which shall abide forever in unfading brightness in the paradise of God.

WAITING.—Said a visitor at a country almshouse to a feeble, palsy-shaken old man—

"What are you doing, Wisby?"

"Waiting, sir."

"And for what?"

"For the appearance of my Lord."

"And what makes you wait for his appearing?"

"Because, sir, I expect great things then. He has promised a crown of righteousness to all that love his appearing."

Better have Wisby's hope than Victoria's sceptre; Lazarus' rags than Dives' purple. Better is poverty with piety than riches with perdition. —Heber.

We despise and discard a watch that never tells the true time; a ruler that will not enable you to rule a straight line; a portrait that is not faithful: so God will at the Judgment day dismiss from his presence "all liars."

For the Companion.

The Most Worthy.

"To the most worthy." These were among the last words of Alexander the Great. Shortly after he had shed those historic tears because his foes were all vanquished, he met an enemy that robbed him in nine days of all the glory that he had achieved in as many years. Death conquered the conqueror of the world. When asked to whom his vast empire should be given after his death, he replied, "To the most worthy."

This was a noble answer, but was the request complied with? Did the most worthy receive the crown? We infer not. As might be expected, many hands were stretched forth to grasp the glittering prize; and, in the affairs of this selfish and wicked world, worth does not always enhance success, much less does it insure it. The most unscrupulous are often the most successful.

But a kingdom has been promised by even a greater than Alexander that cannot be obtained by fraud. This kingdom is the most glorious of which man has ever heard. India with its treasures are nothing when compared to it. The "crown of life" will outweigh a million such as Alexander wore. He that is least in this kingdom is greater than the greatest of earth. Reader, are not these facts?

God who counts by souls, not stations,
Loves and prospers you and me,
While he values thrones the highest
But as pebbles in the sea.

Does it not, then, seem strange that man should be so eager to raise himself above his fellows, when he knows that soon he must lie as low as the poorest and meanest of earth? But strangest of all that he should do this in preference to attending to those higher duties which would, if performed, raise him far above all principalities and powers, making him an heir of God and partaker of that inheritance which is pure and undefiled and that fadeth not away. This heavenly inheritance is vastly superior to any earthly possession for the following, as well as for other reasons: It is more certain, safe and enduring, and will be enjoyed when our capacity to enjoy is much greater than at present.

It is more certain. Alexander could will his kingdom to "the most worthy," but more he could not do. He could not be his own executor. The most unworthy might inherit what was intended for the most worthy. But it is not thus with the Christian's inheritance. What God has promised to give the faithful, the faithful are sure to receive. Nothing can cheat them out of it. It is safe. Not so with earthly possessions. Here, there is continual danger from the destroying elements of nature and the hands of wicked men. There no moth corrupts, no fires or floods, no thief breaks through to steal.

It is enduring. Fifty years after Alexander's death, there was left to him, "neither name nor remnant, neither root nor branch." All his glory perished with him. The lips that praised him have long since been silenced, and will never praise him again. The cities that he conquered have crumbled to ashes and mingled their dust with his. But, on the other hand, the Paradise of God is as fresh, as new and as beautiful now as it ever was, and it will be the same yesterday, to-day and forever.

Our next question might be, what constitutes worthiness to reign as priests and princes in the kingdom above? Those are not always the most worthy who think themselves so. The Scribes and Pharisees deemed themselves worthy, but the Savior says, "If our righteousness does not exceed theirs, we cannot enter into the kingdom of heaven." Not he that commendeth himself is approved, but whom the Lord commendeth. On the other hand, those are often the most worthy who have the poorest opinion of themselves. Paul styled himself the "chiefest of sinners," yet he was regarded in the eyes of heaven as a chosen vessel of God. The centurion said to Christ: "Lord, I am not worthy that thou shouldst come under my roof." But Christ said of this same man, "I have not found so great faith, no, not in Israel." Faith is one of the grandest and most essential elements of worth in the sight of God. Without this it is impossible to please him. "By faith ye are saved, through grace, and that not of yourselves; it is the gift of God." But this faith must be a thing of life. Then it leads to obedience, another grand essential to acceptance with God. We must obey the gospel call. If not, we shall be like those who were invited to the marriage of the king's son. They were not worthy. How many at the present day choose the creatures of this world—a farm, a yoke of oxen, a wife—in preference to Christ

When Christ says "follow me," we should obey, and not faint by the way. "Remember Lot's wife." Our course must be onward, ever onward, and upward. "He that putteth his hand to the plow and looketh back, is not fit for the kingdom." We must obey the great commandment—we must love God above everything of a worldly nature, and be willing to make any necessary sacrifice for the cause of our blessed Master. "He that loveth father or mother more than me, is not worthy of me; and he that loveth son or daughter more than me, is not worthy of me; and he that taketh not his cross and followeth after me is not worthy of me." I would to God that we and all men might more fully realize the force of the foregoing words of the blessed Jesus, and live more in accordance with the great law of Love; and, then, at last, may we all be numbered with the faithful, few in Sardis, of whom it is said, "They shall walk with me in white: for they are worthy."

That Crown.

Man is come into this world to be a laborer in some way or other: an honest, true laborer, to engage in some honorable calling, and to follow that legally—a calling where either manual or intellectual labor is the order of the day. If it be manual toil, he must use the strong physical abilities with which he is furnished by the power that makes the requisition at his hand. If his labor is mental, he is required to make good use of the bright intellectual faculties, bestowed upon him by the One who will demand of him an account of his stewardship. And, unless we are idiotic, or impotent, it is expected of us that we perform our work in an orderly manner. The great Master has no idlers in his service: no sluggards, no lazy persons are recognized by him, but all are required to perform the part committed to their charge with neatness and dispatch.

When we engage in the various kinds of labor before us in the world, we are naturally inclined to scrutinize so as to discover what is, upon the whole, the most pleasant, and suits our inclinations; also we are quite anxious to know which, in the end will yield the most satisfactory reward; and, if we are wise in our choice, we look forward from the beginning for the end. But in the great, momentous life-struggle all are required to begin the same way, be exercised by the same Spirit, walk by the same rule, be governed by the same Spirit, and obtain the same reward—"A crown of Life." This is continually portrayed as an incentive to move all to action in the great cause before us. All Christians hope to obtain this at the close of the race of life. The rule is, "He that laboreth receiveth wages, but, he that will not work shall not eat." By this we see that very much depends upon our own personal effort in this life in obtainiug the reward in that which is to come. We all anticipate, when the end comes, and the Master tells the steward to call the laborers and give them their hire, to receive a crown of life. All a crown! How many there will be given in that day of great awards, in the evening of this world! but how many, at that time, be disappointed! How many that thought they would reap a reward of bright sheaves, with golden grains, will find nothing but husk and chaff! "Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord; shall enter into the kingdom of heaven." No crown! How sad the disappointment! Too late to try again, and all is lost!

All will be represented there. There will be the poverty stricken inebriate; there will be the wicked rich man. The built up moralist will be there. There will be the backslider, who made shipwreck of the precious faith of Jesus. The canting hypocrite will be there. There will be the lazy, would-be Christians. There will be the eleventh hour man. And there will be the man and woman who have borne the burden and heat of the day of Christian service. Many, very many, of those will not receive the crown. No labor done in the Master's cause. Many will be there, who have done a great amount of writing and talking, in regard to the ministry of God's blessed word, how it ought to be preached, and may be disappointed.

We hear some talk and see their writing in regard to the preaching of the gospel of Christ, from pure motives, with nothing in the heart but the precious love of Jesus to stimulate to action, spending days and weeks in the good work, while wife and children are crying for food to nourish, and raiment to clothe the body; while those who thus write and talk are sitting at home in ease, with plenty in either hand, and raise neither to feed the hungry nor warm the freezing—only the remark, that the faithful, self-denying minister of Jesus wins a great reward in heaven by his arduous toil; yet they, in ease and plenty here, hope, when they arrive at the end of their journey, to wear as bright a crown as he. We know that it is, by many, looked upon, that spending and being spent belongs only to the shepherd, while the flock is to yield him only a hearing ear, but no subsistance whatever; but in the end each one hopes to wear as bright a crown and as fair and white a robe as he. What if they were disappointed in the end? It is possible that such might be the result.

When Sabbath morning comes, some feel a little worn down from the labors of the past week, and they think it proper to stay at home; thinking that the pastor will, when he looks into their vacant seat, not miss them, or, may be, a slight headache, or some trivial indisposition, disqualifies them for a mile's walk or ride, and to listen to the word of God; but, on the other hand, fits them most admirably to remain at home and recline on a downy bed, or lounge, or a soft sofa, while some one else will fill the seat that should be occupied by them. The faithful Embassador may see their vacant seat in heaven, or the blessed Master may bestow the crown on some one else.

Little do we think that our minister, who is but God's mouth-piece, has been laboring all week just as busily as any of us, and is in just as great need of rest as any one else. And has he, we ask, been laboring so hard all week for filthy lucre? No, it is to gather enough of the good things of this world to keep soul and body together of that family he so dearly loves, and for which purpose you should have contributed, at least, a small portion of your superabundance. There, if this had been done by a number of the faithful followers of Christ, the minister might have had a few spare hours to have given to special reading, meditation and prayer, so as to fit him for the services of Sunday morning. But no, our crown is sure at any rate. The minister is a good, faithful soul; he'll be there, headache or not—no soft bed to recline on; no soft sofa for him to kill the sacred Sabbath hours on. No, nothing of this kind. He must go, the work is before him; no staying at home for him. No, if he does, all the members upon their first meeting upbraid him for his unfaithfulness. He must preach, and that, not a little. If he is not as fluent as an Apollos, and as deep in reasoning and as concisely to the point as a Paul, all will feel that they have not been edified to the degree desired. But we forget that he is daily doing the work of two persons, that of preaching and unaided maintaining a family. But, faithful, burdened minister, go on; you are daily adding stars to your crown of happy rejoicing, to be realized in the resurrection of the just. "They that be wise, shall shine as the brightness of the firmament; and they that turn many to righteousness, as the stars forever and ever."

Oh, that crown! if it could only be obtained without doing that which God demands of us, how many of us would wear it! But, no cross, no crown; no self-denial, and no robe of righteousness. The wise arrangement of God is the plan of salvation. has so ordered it as to make each one responsible for his or her part of the work. The burden of duty falls to each member of the body of Christ, so as to send, and give the laborer his hire, which he is worthy, so that the body sends laborers forth, by the authority of Christ, and the laborer, properly equipped, goes cheerfully, resolutely forth to the great work. The plan is a perfect one, and if any fail of the grace of God it will be their own fault. But we are all inclined to shovel duty, unperformed, upon another, when in reality we are in the fault more than any one else. If we all, congregations and individual members, had done the duty which we feel so justly belongs to us, we would not hear the cry so often, "Come and help us," and that call not responded to. We certainly are in the fault some how or other: either we, as churches, do not respond so as to furnish the means, or the board of Home Mission does not properly perform the work allotted to them, as stewards of the grace of God. Brethren how is this? Who is in the fault? Who is trying to win the crown, and who is not? There are noble spirits enlisted in the Home Mission cause; and we have seen their faces brighten as they performed their part, when duty was made known to them. We can say, go on, dear soldiers of the cross, old and young; if it does demand self-denial, you will obtain the crown of life at last. Jesus will bestow it with a kind hand and in good pleasure.

But neglecters of duty, continue so for a few days more, and the harvest will be past, the summer will be ended, and you are not saved. Stint the cause of Christ a few years more, if the Master permit you; curtail your own, and the usefulness of others in the service of the just One; hinder his cause, clog the chariot wheels of the gospel of Christ, by withholding your encouragement, and refusing to deny yourself of a few of the vanities of the world and pleasures of this life, and the day of grace will be over. Jesus will come riding in his chariot, the clouds of heaven. You cannot clog the wheels of that, for it will come on in its illumined pathway; amidst the earthquake's rumbling roar, while the starry heavens depart, the elements melt with fervent heat, and there is a consuming of the earth with all things that are therein, where then will be the rocks and mountains to fall on and hide you? Where will be the crown then to shield your head, in the day of dreadful calamity and fearful doom? "I also will laugh at your calamity, I will mock when your fear cometh." "Behold, I come quickly; hold that fast which thou hast, that no man take thy crown."

Make to Yourselves Friends—No. 4.

"And I say unto you, make to yourselves friends of the mammon of unrighteousness: that when ye fail they may receive you into everlasting habitations." Luke 16: 9.

The friends in the parable: who are they? We answer, they are the angels of God. No doubt all our intelligent readers agree with us upon this point; however, for the sake of stirring up your pure minds by way of remembrance," we will dwell upon this subject a while.

The Apostle Paul, in reference to the angels, asks the question, "Are they not all ministering spirits sent forth to minister to those who shall be heirs of salvation?" From this explanation of the Apostle, we infer, that the angels are ministering spirits. To this the prophets, the Savior, and the Apostles all assent. In Ps. 34: 7, we read, "The Angel of the Lord encampeth round about them that fear him, and delivereth them." An interesting circumstance is recorded in Acts 12: 1, 19, which we will present in this connection. At a time when persecution began to rage against the Church, the Apostle Peter was apprehended, imprisoned, and delivered to four quarternions of soldiers, who were commanded to keep him safely; intending, after certain days, to arraign him before the people.—The soldiers having received the charge, therefore, thrust him in the inner prison and bound him with chains. Two soldiers were stationed, one on either side of him, and the keepers before the door kept the prison. But the same night, when it was determined to have Peter brought up before the people on the following day, the Angel of the Lord visited him; and, although the prison doors were closed, and the keepers before the door kept the prison, the Angel entered. He touched Peter, and the chains fell off his hands. He said, "Follow me," and Peter followed; the Angel led him forth from his cell uninjured, and delivered him out of the hand of Herod, and from all the expectation of the people of the Jews.

We also invite the attention of the reader to the miraculous deliverance of the prophet out of the lions' den (Daniel 6: 22); and of Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego out of the firey furnace (Dan. 3: 28).

We are taught by divine revelation, that the angels are interested in the salvation of the human family, and take pleasure in the welfare of all. For example, when Christ, our Savior, was born, certain shepherds were in the field, keeping watch over their flock by night. An angel was sent to convey to them the good tidings; and when he had delivered his message, "The glory of the Lord shone round about them." "And suddenly there was with the angel a multitude of the heavenly host, praising God and singing, 'Glory to God in the highest, on earth peace, good will toward men.'" We are taught, that there is joy in the presence of angels, when sinners repent and turn to God. In Matt. 18: 10, we read thus: "Take heed that ye despise not one of these little ones; for I say unto you, that in heaven their angels do always behold the face of my Father which is in heaven." From this scripture, and others, we infer that every human being, as soon as he is called into existence, is favored with a life companion (guardian angel), who will accompany him from the time he draws the infant breath until his breath ceaseth to beat in death, unless prior grieved by willful transgression, when the guardian will leave him to grope on in his own way; his conscience will become seared, and he will be given over to a reprobate mind. Friendly reader, are you aware that there is one who keeps constant watch over you? and also keeps a strict account of all you say and do—of all your endeavor and adventure? Know this: if we strictly follow the dictation of that lovely monitor, we will have a friend to take charge of us when we fail—depart this life—a friend that sticketh closer than a brother, who will call a company of angels to convey our spirits "through the valley of the shadow of death," and see us safe on the "other bright shore," where no more tears will be shed, no more sighs shall heave our breast; for our loving Savior and Prince will "Lead us to living fountains of waters, and God shall wipe away all tears from our eyes." In connection with the foregoing, we call attention to another parable, recorded in Luke 16, where the Savior spake of another rich man, and also of a very poor man. The poor man (Lazarus) died, and was carried by the angels into Abraham's bosom (Paradise).

No doubt, we all desire to be favored with a happy departure out of this world. Then be dilligent, friendly reader, avail yourself of every opportunity of making to yourselves friends. The Savior in the parable commendeth the unjust steward; that is, he represented the conduct of the steward as being an example for the Christian, worthy of imitation. Reader, mark the commendation; for it is one of the dark sayings, yet full of light, life, and power to those who are able to comprehend it. The Savior commended the steward, because he had done wisely, and asserts, that "the children of this world are, in their generation, wiser than the children of light." The worldly minded are generally on the alert; they watch for, and improve every opportunity of making gain. For the sake of obtaining wealth, men will cheerfully endure hardship; they will rise early and retire late; they are not easily hindered by inclemency of the weather, but will speed their way through rain and snow, heat and cold, and for the sake of sustaining an earthly kingdom for honor and applause; or even for the sake of accumulating the shining dust of the earth, many have forsaken home and their friends, yea, hazarded their own lives. How vastly different is the general conduct of professors of religion! Well may it be said, "The children of this world are, in their generation, wiser than the children of light," when we see opportunities for spiritual improvement running to waste, like the golden fruit of an overburdened orchard, which is the case when we allow the many "Macedonian" calls to pass unheeded, or neglect the assembling of ourselves together when favored with privileges, or withhold a helping hand from the unfortunate and the poor, when we have the means of cheering the fainting pilgrim. It appears that we are very dull to discover an opportunity for increasing our heavenly treasure; and when we do see a chance for laying up treasure in heaven, oh, how slow we are to improve it!—This we must attribute, not to a want of a disposition of doing that which is well pleasing to the Lord, but to the want of instruction; and the fault undoubtedly must be attributed to the "watchman" (minister). It appears that we cannot contrive how these earthly goods are reduced to spiritual and eternal objects, neither do we cherish the idea, that a strict account is kept of every benevolent act we perform, while, at the same time, we read on the sacred pages, that even a cup of cold water given to a disciple of Jesus, will be had in memorial with the impartial Judge. We are assured that every dollar, yea, every penny we devote to the advancement of the gospel, and to the saving of souls, will add to our treasure in heaven; and when our warfare is ended, an abundant reward will be administered unto us for every effort we shall have put forth in behalf of disseminating the glorious gospel of our blessed Redeemer. Move forward, then, brethren; lay your shoulders to the wheel; assist in advancing the ark of the covenant to all the world. Let us not suffer any of the Macedonian calls to pass by unheeded, nor children in the West to famish for the want of the bread of life, when we have enough and to spare; being blessed with the means (men and goods), to supply all. In conclusion, friendly reader, be dilligent: there is something to do, for every one. If you are not in the possession of ten talents, you are at least entrusted with one.

"If you have not gold and silver
Ever ready to command,
If ye cannot to the needy
Ever lend a helping hand," you may, by your holy walk, and chaste conversation, influence others who are more able to engage in the cause of the blessed Master. You may win souls without the word (1 Peter 3: 1.), and thus "Make to yourself friends," and secure to yourself a mansion in the Father's house.

"If you want a field of labor,
You can find it anywhere."

Gambling.

While in our town, Lebanon, I had occasion to go into the office of Mr. G——, a man of influence, also of good judgment, and one who is loved by most good citizens. He was seated at his writing-table, when a little girl came in and asked him to take a chance to draw a prize. He looked at her and said sharply, "I do not gamble." When the little girl said, "But this is not gambling." He said, "Yes, it is; it is against the law. I tried it once and was caught at it; and I don't think I will ever do it again." He, however, asked her the price of a chance, which was only five cents. He almost pitied the little girl, who stood there in deep thought; thinking, perhaps, that they were doing good with it, for the benefit of the Sunday-school; and this man of influence pronounced it gambling, which the little girl was, perhaps, taught was one of the greatest evils of our country.

Rev. Brown, of the Baptist church said, "When a man is brought to the verge of bankruptcy, he gets up a gift concert swindle; enlists the sympathy of respectable merchants by purchasing goods, whose payment depends on his ultimate success; dazzles the public with glittering promises; draws out the little savings of servant girls, mechanics, and clerks, who dream of horses, and pianos, and watches, all for one dollar; fosters the spirit of public gambling, so that a multitude of smaller schemes of chance spring up all through the community."

Little do the people think how they throw their money away, or what a chance is worth in a drawing of five thousand tickets. We will take, for instance, the word Minrod on 6 cards, being one letter on each, and throw the cards confusedly in a hat. I am offered ten dollars to draw the cards in succession so as to spell the name correctly. The reader may be surprised if I say my chance is just worth one and seven-eighteenth cents.

Again, if we think a family of ten persons can seat themselves differently to dinner over three million times, we are almost lost in astonishment; and we incline to doubt whether there is not some mistake; and yet on just such chances as one to all these, gamblers constantly risk their money. Not alone the certainty of losing our money should prompt us not to engage in such a business, but the dishonesty of it, and what is worse of all, churches, Sunday-schools, and professors of religion engage in it under the garb of Christianity, in which the public spend their money; and even if they are the winners, the thing costs double and triple its value, and others, yes, perhaps, fifty, will lose where one gains. "Honesty is the best policy," is a miserable motto, if lived up to, simply in the spirit of its letter, but it palpably true. It is poor policy to palter with evil, yet we commend the fact to all whose conduct is measured by policy alone.

Pureness.

"Approving ourselves as the ministers of God, in much patience, in afflictions, in necessities, in distresses in stripes, in imprisonments, in tumults, in labors, in watchings, in fastings: by pureness." 2 Cor. 6: 4—6.

O Lord I bear an aching heart;
Ease me of sin, whate'er the smart:
Within, without, I would be pure:
Lord, hear my cry! Lord work my cure;
I know not all I ask is this,
But give, O give me holiness.

Wild is the tumult in my breast:
Oh! how I long for thy deep rest!
Behind thick clouds is hid thy face:
Thyself reveal and give me peace.
I know not all I need to this,
But give, O give me holiness.

O Lord! to dust my faint soul cleaves:
Rich is thy sowing, few my sheaves.
I own thy bounteous gifts, but mourn
My scanty and perverse return.
I know not all I say in this,
But give, O give me holiness.

O Lord! accept my stammering prayer:
Work in me, by what means so e'er.
The change I need: to sin I'd die,
That I may live with thee on high.
I know not all I beg in this,
But give, O give me holiness.

Break every earthly tie that binds,
Dispense each wildering mist that blinds
Search me, and try, and clean remove
Whatever shares with thee my love.
I know not all I speak in this,
But give, O give me holiness.

O Lord! I bear a weary heart!
All pierced with sin's imprisoned dart:
Thou Good Physician, work my cure—
Me purify as thou art pure.
I know not all I ask in this;
But give, oh, give me holiness.

It was a famous saying of Paschal that "The things that belong to men must be understood, in order that they may be loved, the things that belong to God must be loved in order to be understood."

Bury Me in a Free Land.

The following beautiful and touching lines were written by Stevens, one of the Harper's Ferry insurgents, a short time before his death :

Make me a grave where you will,
In a lonely plain or a lofty hill.
Make it among earth's humblest graves
But not in a land where men are slaves.

I could not rest, if around my grave,
I heard the steps of a trembling slave,
His shadow above my silent tomb
Would make it a place of fearful gloom.

I could not sleep, if I heard the tread
Of a coffle gang to the shambles led,
And the mother's shriek of wild despair
Rise like a curse on the trembling air.

I could not rest, if I saw the lash
Drinking her blood at each fearful gash ;
If I saw her babes torn from her breast,
Like trembling doves, from their parent nest.

I'd shudder and start, if I heard the bay
Of a blood-hound seizing his human prey ;
And I heard the captive plead in vain,
As they bound afresh the galling chain.

If I saw young girls, from their mother's arms,
Parted and sold for their youthful charms,
My eyes would flash with a mournful flame,
My death-paled cheek grow red with shame.

I would sleep, dear friends, where blooded might
Can rob no man of his dearest right ;
My rest shall be calm in any grave,
Where none can call his brother a slave.

I ask no monument proud and high,
To arrest the gaze of passers-by ;
All that my yearning spirit craves,
Is—bury me not in a land of slaves.

Growing Evils.

The country in which we live is noted for its rapid progress in agricultural and mechanical pursuits, and all branches of the same are becoming more fully developed. Its mineral resources are also becoming developed. Railroads and telegraphs belting the country through, are all designed for the benefit of the people of this boasted, free and civilized country. Educational privileges are numerous and of easy access. School houses and churches are dotting the country all over from the four points of the compass. Intelligence and wealth everywhere abound. Our nation is looked upon as the "Model Republic," and surpasses others in free institutions, strength, and in a great many degrees of excellency. Yet notwithstanding all her excellencies there are growing evils abounding within her limits that are destroying the very vitals of this great nation. Education, the nations interest, is being abused. Railroads which are piercing the country through from all parts, designed to propagate the people's interests at large, are falling short of filling their mission, and are mostly owned and directed by monopolies. Thus instead of benefiting all alike, is satisfying the craft of a few monied aristocrats. Manufacturers are monopolizing and govern prices at will. The nations officers of public trust, who have the care of the nations funds, are voting an increase of their already salaries, and heaping to themselves the mammon of this world, and many of them spending the same in riotous living. The great evil, intemperance, the venomous serpent of the still, is sneaking stealthily along throughout this free and once happy country fastentening its fangs and throwing its poison in the veins of its unhappy victims, producing so many evil results, murders, harlotry, &c., causing devastation throughout the length and breadth of our country. The unfortunate wife who binds herself for life to the inebriate, drags her life out in suffering worse than death, language fails to picture the sceneries caused by intoxicating liquors. Some of the states of this undivided land of sister states are now struggling to suppress the sale of this fiery fiend within the limits of their territory. We look forward with an eye of faith to the time when the major part of the nation will submit the decision to the vote of the people giving them the privilege to strike King Bacchus and so prostrate him that he will be forever unable to arise. Under the existing evils surrounding us what battling has the Christian to sustain his influence. Sin like a strong man armed unwarily strikes its victim and ruin is most invariably the result. We see the prosperity of the wicked around us; nothing appears to trouble them ; they prosper in the world, they increase in riches. We are led to think of the Psalmist David who seeing the prosperity of the wicked around him, exclaimed, "Verily I have cleansed my heart in vain." To think of these things it was too painful for him. "Until I went into the sanctuary of God ; then understood I their end." 73 Psalm. Fellow Christian despair not, though we are in the midst of evil let us pray to God to give us grace that we partake not of their evil deeds. They that overcome shall be made sons and daughters of God. Let our way here on earth be one of thorus, yonder it will be one of pleasantness. Are we despised and dishonored here ? Youder we shall be honored. Christ has promised us a seat at his table and he will gird himself, come forth and serve his faithful children. Though we shall pass through tribulation here, our crown will be brighter in eternity. Then let us be on our guard lest we become contaminated with those growing evils which surround us and lose our claim in the heavenly mansions above. Finally brethren be faithful, "instant in season, out of season." Let us watch and pray.

The Love of God.

Oh ! is any one so dead in heart, so blighted in mind or aspiration, as to be able to look at his divine love in the face, and not be won by it to better things ? Blessed, Blessed GOD ! Wonderful FATHER ! Compassionate CREATOR ! This mystery of his desiring our poor love should of itself be a life-long joy to us in our time of pilgrimage. It puts a new face upon the world. All things glow with another light. A feeling of security comes upon us like a gift from heaven and wraps us round, and the cold chill goes from our heart, and the dark spots are illuminated ; and we want nothing more now, nothing. Earth has nothing to give which would not be a mere impertinence after this desire of GOD. Our hearts are full. We have no room for more. This desire of God solves all the problems of our inner life ; for it at once calms us in our present lowness, and spurs us on to higher things, and the name of that double state, the calm and the spur—what is it but perfection ? God loves me. God desires my love. He has asked for it ; he covets it, he prizes it more than I do myself! I would fain tell the poor trees, and the little birds that are roosting, and the patient beasts that are slumbering in the dewy grass, and the bright waters, and the wanton winds, and the clouds as they sail above me, and that white moon, and the flickering, far-off stars, that God desires my love, mine even mine! And it is true, infallibly true. O God, thou art my God, because my goods are nothing unto thee! What shall I do? If I may not doubt this mystery, what can I do but die of love! O thou, who in the world above givest us the light of glory that we may bear to see thy beauty, give us now the strength of faith to endure these revelations of thy love!—F. W. Faber.

Mothers.

Some one has said that a young mother is the most beautiful thing in nature. Why qualify it? Why young? Are not all mothers beautiful? The sentimental outside beholder may prefer youth in the pretty picture, but I am inclined to think that sons and daughters, who are most intimately concerned in the matter, love and admire their mothers most when they are old. How suggestive of something holy and venerable it is when a person talks of his "dear mother." Away with mincing "mammas," suggestive only of a fine lady, who deputes her beauty to a nurse, a drawing-room maternal parent, who is afraid to handle her offspring for fear of soiling her fine new gown. Give us the homely mother, the arms of whose love are all embracing, who is beautiful always, whether old or young, whether arrayed in satin or modestly attired in calico. The dear old mother! Heaven bless them.

The Charm of Life.

There are a thousand things in this world to afflict and sadden—but oh! how many that are beautiful and good! The world teems with beauty-with objects that gladden the eye and warm the heart. We might be happy if we would. There are ills that we cannot escape—the approach of disease and death; of misfortunes; the sundering of the early ties, and the canker-worm of grief–but the vast majority of evils that beset us might be avoided. The curse of intemperance, interwoven as it is with all the ligaments of society, is one which never strikes but to destroy. There is not one bright page upon the record of its progess—nothing to shield it from the heartiest execration of the human race. It should not be allowed to exist—it must not Do away with all this—let wars come to an end, and let friendship charity, love, purity and kindness mark the intercourse between man and man. We are too selfish, as if the world was made for us alone. How much happier would we be were we to labor more earnestly to promote each other's good God has blessed us with a home that is not dark, there is sunshine everywhere–in the sky, upon the earth–there would be in most hearts, if we would look around us. The storm dies away and a bright sun shines out. Summer drops her tinted curtains upon the earth, which is very beautiful when autumn breathes her changing breath upon it. God reigns in the heavens. Murmur not at a being so good and we can live happier than we do.

Flowers.

There are certain kinds of fragrant flowers, that exhale their sweetness more profusely when night draws near than at any other time of day. When the dew-damp of evening falls upon them, or they are shaken by a gentle breeze, the surrounding air becomes filled with fragrauce. As the shades of evening increase, white flowers seem to receive a new beauty. When flowers of a dark shade begin to look dusky, the white ones shine with a new splendor. So it has been with some Christians, when the night of death drew near: when the shadows of the dark valley began to encircle them, and the death-damp to fall upon them, their faith and hope shone forth all the more brightly. While Stephen sat before the council that tried him for his life, his face appeared to those that saw him as the face of an angel. And when the anger of the council increased to such a height that they gnashed on him with their teeth, and as darker grew the shades of evening of life, so much the more brightly glowed his faith and hope, insomuch that he saw heaven open and Jesus on the right hand of God. When he, sore, bruised and tossed by the stones that were hurled at him, knelt down and prayed, surely there were some in that angry crowd on whose souls that prayer, filled with the spirit of forgiveness, descended like the fragrance of flowers, calming the turbulent passions and leading to repentance. Even yet that prayer has not lost its fragrance: it has been wafted over every Christian land, filling Christian's hearts with the desire to die with the same spirit.—"Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his."

"Two-Ten."

Mrs, Laura Curtic Bullard tells a story of Baroness Coutts, who, when shopping in Paris, was passed from one department to "two-ten." She was escorted from counter to counter, and every where these cabalistic words, "two-ten," were repeated by one clerk to another. Struck by the peculiarity of this refrain, she asked the proprietor, as she left the establishment, "Pray, what does two-ten mean? I noticed each clerk said it to the other in your shop." "O, it is nothing," he replied, "merely a password they are in the habit of exchanging." But Miss Coutts was not satisfied with his explanation. So in the evening, when the porter, a young boy, brought home her purchases, after paying her bill she said, "My boy, would you like to earn five francs?" Of course, he had no objection. "Tell me," said the lady, "what does 'two-ten mean; I will give you five francs." "Why, don't you know ma'am?" said he evidently amazed at her ignorance. "It means keep your two eyes on her ten fingers?" The mystery was solved at last. All the clerks of the Trois Quartiers had taken the richest woman in Great Britain for a shop-lifter?

Stretch it a Little.

A little girl and her younger brother were on their way to the store one windy, frosty morning. They were both poorly dressed, but the little girl had a sort of cloak over her. As they walked briskly along, she drew the boy closer to her and said: "Come under my cloak, Johnny."

"It isn't big enough for both," replied he. "Then I will stretch it a little." And they were soon closely nestled together. What a lesson! How many shivering bodies and sad hearts there are, just because people do not stretch their comfort beyond themselves!

For the Companion.

Explanation.

The scripture that brother Vandyke requests an explanation of, I think is, "Ye make him two-fold more the child of hell than yourselves." If we examine the scripture, the Savior gives us to understand, that he by no means approved the spirit that was prominent among those that professed to be the people of God. It is evident that they had lost the true character or spirit of God's chosen people. They neither went in themselves, nor suffered those that were entering to go in. The Savior censures them with the strongest language for their apostasy from the law, and in place, setting up their own laws and traditions. "For ye compass sea and land to make proselytes." Then to the query--"two-fold more the child of hell than yourselves." The Scribes and Pharisees were not the approved children of Israel. Their apostatizing is shown by their transactions. And consequently were not the proper ones to keep the ark of the Lord moving to receive the favor and blessing of God.—They were making very strong efforts, apparently, as we can infer, and likely went farther than their boundary extended. We understand those proselytes were from the heathen nations, and did not look for or believe in a Savior in their own nation. They were brought into the congregation of those pretenders of God's true people. who themselves did not believe the Savior, though they expected a king and ruler; and no doubt those Gentiles that never expected Christ, would be more vehemently opposed to him than those Scribes and Pharisees. The Savior saw the conduct of those converts towards him, as well as their hypocrites, as he terms them.

I think it is plain that those that were proselyted were more annoying to the Savior, and the cause he was about to establish, than the Jews generally. The inference we have in the words of the question is conclusive. Christ gave the true state of the two parties, as we may here term them, though they now seem to belong to one kingdom. "Two-fold more the child of hell than yourselves." It is understood from Christ's language that the conduct of those converts was not so commendable as their teachers'.—Christ was laboring to bring back those Jews to the weightier matters of the law, that they might be able to teach others right. The conduct most generally shows to what kingdom men belong. When the Church once begins to lose the true spirit, and get a proselyting spirit, regardless of the scripture, and make great pretensions, and enlarge the borders of their garments, then those that are brought in by the unlawful means, are in many respect worse than they were before, and worse than their teachers. These teachers may have been born legally, and little by little fell away into tradition, and not now willing to do according to the law.—Those brought under their influence are taught their traditions, which are only carnal, and consequently more ruinous to the holy cause of Christianity.

How To Cure a Cold.

Whenever any one has a cold, there are plenty who have a remedy for it. The Danbury [Conn.,] News says one of the citizens of that place had a severe cold, which he cured in the following manner:

He boiled a little boneset and hoarhound together and drank freely of the tea before going to bed. The next day he took five pills, put one kind of plaster on his breast, another under his arms, and still another on his back. Under advice from an experienced old lady he took all these off with an oyster knife in the afternoon, and slapped on a mustard paste instead. His mother put some onion drafts to his feet and gave him a lump of tar to swallow. Then he put some hot bricks to his feet and went to bed. Next morning an old lady came in with a bottle of goose oil, and gave him a dose of it in a quill. and an aunt arrived about the same time from Bethel with a bundle of sweet fern, which she made into a tea and gave him every half-hour until noon, when he gave him a big dose of salts. After dinner his wife, who had seen a fine old lady of great experience in doctoring, on Franklin street, gave him two pills of her make, about the size of an english walnut, and of a similar shape, and two spoonsful of home-made balsam, to keep them down. Then he took a half pint of hot rum at the suggestion of an old sea captain who lived in the next house, and steamed his legs with an alcohol bath. At this crisis two of the neighbors arrived, who saw at once that his blood was out of order, and gave him half a gallon of spearmint tea and a big dose of castor oil. Before going to bed he took eight of a new kind of pills, wrapped his neckin flannel soaked in hot vinegar and salt, and had feathers burnt on a shovel in his room. He is now thoroughly cured and full of gratitude. We advise our readers to cut this out and keep it where it can readily be found when danger threatens, but don't use it until all other remidies have failed.

Is there a Devil?

Henry Ward Beecher seems to have no doubt as to the personality of the Evil One, however it may be with others. Hear Mr. Beecher:

I have been very much struck with the prevalence of the deliberate predatory wickedness of men in Chicago. I have been surprised at the utter insensibility of some men to the vast and terrific suffering which existed there. There are a great many persons who say that there cannot be a devil, that God is too good to have such a monster in the universe. I have only this to say: that if there is not a devil, there are some very good materials among men to make one out of; and if God is too good to have a devil-in-chief, He is not so good but that He allows devils in detail. All the imaginations and fables of the monks put together do not equal or parallel the heinousness and deliberateness of the cruelty of the men who prey on their fellow-men under such circumstances as those creatures who follow the line of battle and stab the wounded soldiers that they may rob them of their money. You never see a great catastrophe that you dot no see these fiends in human form creeping out of their lurking-places to evince how wickedness can be,and how inhuman inhumanity can be.

Three Things.

"An uneducated man ought to know three things:—First, where he is—that is to say, what kind of a world he has got into; how large it is, what kind of creatures live in it, and how; what it is made of, and what may be made of it. Secondly, where he is going—that is to say, what chances or reports there are of any other world beside this; and what seems to be the nature of the other world. Thirdly, what he had best do under the circumstances; what are the readiest means in his power of attaining happiness and diffusing it. the man who knows these things, and has his will so subdued that he is ready to do what he knows he ought, is an educated man; and the man who knows them not, is uneducated although he could talk all the tongues of Babel."—Ruskin.

A SUGGESTIVE THOUGHT.—Suppose it were possible to convert all the men in a single place, and leave the women just as they were; I believe that in the second generation you would see little or no improvement—the great waves of conversion would have passed over that place and left but little trace. But suppose the reverse of this. Suppose all the women were converted, and the men untouched. I think I should be found right in saying that a large proportion would be Christian men and women, and an immense and permanent improvement would be found to have taken place. How is this? simply because God has entrusted into the hands of us women the nursery. the house, the moral influence, and the formation of the character of the rising generation.—People's Magazine.

Eloquence is the best speech of the best soul.—Emerson.

It is only by labor that thought can be made healthy, only by thougt that labor can be made happy.

A large mass of error is easily embalmed and perpetuated by a little truth.—Mackay.

Christian Family Companion.

DALE CITY, Pa., April 15, 1873.

Notes by the Way.

On Saturday evening, March 22nd, we commenced a course of meetings at the Baptist meeting house before referred to. The weather was very unfavorable, the roads were now almost impassable, and, in consequence, the congregation was very small.

On Sunday morning, at 9 o'clock A. M., we met with the kind people of that neighborhood to assist in organizing a Sabbath-school. They manifested a lively interest, and we hope they may succeed in making their school interesting; and that it may be the means of accomplishing much good in that vicinity. We feel certain that a united and powerful effort is needed there. We are sorry to say this, but observation, in connection with reliable information, forces upon us the conclusion, that some of the young persons in that section have grown desperate in sin. Even some who have their names enrolled as church members, show by their daring misdemeanor in and around the Lord's house, that they are in the gall of bitterness—in the coils of the old serpent—and that nothing but the grace of God, through his powerful word, made effective by the Holy Spirit, can ever rescue them. They are, indeed, a stigma upon the fair name they privately profess; and it is a burning shame for any society, bearing the name of Christian, to hold them in fellowship. We are happy, however, to be able to say that there are only a few such.

After the organization of the Sabbath-school, we endeavored to show the congregation the nature of the religion of Christ, and the use of ordinances. We think they were enabled to see these things.

We continued to hold meetings here, when occasion offered, and the state of the weather permitted, until April 1st. The attendance was small, but the attention and order (except that already hinted at) were truly commendable. We know that the kingdom of God had come very near to a few, at least.

On Tuesday evening, April 1st, we received a letter from brother Holsinger, calling on us, on account of circumstances which need not be mentioned, to return home a week earlier than we had intended. Both willingly and unwillingly we submitted, and made preparation to return home as soon as possible.

On Friday morning we bid adieu to parents and kindred, with but little hope of ever being permitted to meet with all again in this world.

After a prosperous trip we arrived safely at Dale City, on Saturday, 2nd, at about 12 . 30 P. M. Found the COMPANION FAMILY in usual health and spirits. During our short visit of about a month, some of our brethren, sisters, and friends were sick but had again recovered, others were still sick, and a few had died.

We thank the Lord for his preserving mercy.

The Brethren's Tune Book.

BROTHER H. :

In C. F. C., Vol. 7, page 539, you say you have examined a copy of the above work, and that it contains all the hymns in the Brethren's Hymn Book, but one, (No. 801). We also have examined the work, and find nine hymns not in the Tune Books. The following numbers: 112, 187, 275, 298, 300, 370, 702, 790, 107, are not in the Tune Book. We ask the reason why you said that it contains all but one, and why were so many omitted? Otherwise we are well satisfied with the Tune Book.

J. F. NEHER.

Salem, Ill.

REMARKS: We said it contained all the Hymns but one, because it was the understanding and bargain that it should, and because we had not yet learned otherwise. Upon examination now we find that there are more omitted, but still not all those named by brother Neher, for we find Hymn No. 370, on page 159, and Hymn 108 on page 53. We can give no good reasons for omitting Hymns 112, 187, 275, 300, 370, 703. That we regard as a mistake which must be remedied in future editions. Hymns 298 and 790, could not well be sung; nevertheless they should have been published for reading purposes.

Brother John Deihl ; I once read a comment, which satisfied me, in the Christian Standard, on Matt. 21: 22. The commentator said that in that age of the world, burial ceremonies lasted 30 days, and Jesus fearing the disciple would be drawn away from him in so long a time, bid him to follow him. The dead that were to bury the dead, were meant such as were dead in sin and trespasses.

Inasmuch as "all scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness, what can we learn in the scripture, written by Moses, Exodus the 11th chapter and 2nd verse ? Moses was commanded by the Lord, "Speak now in the ears of the people, and let every man borrow of his neighbor, and every woman of her neighbor, jewels of silver, and jewels of gold."

Will some one give an explanation on this scripture through the C. F. C?

Re-baptizing.

In answer to E. M. Benton, I would say, whatever views others may have concerning the re-baptizing of those twelve men, mentioned in the 12th chapter of Acts, I know not, but am willing to give my views. We know that John baptized many people, for there "went out unto him Jerusalem, and all Judea, and all the region round about Jordan, confessing their sins." John told them he was not the Christ, and that they should believe on him who should come after him, which was Christ. And when they saw him, "he had no form nor comeliness that they should desire him."—However, while some believed on him, others did not. Then on the day of Pentecost, when they saw the outpouring of the Holy Ghost, many of them believing, were added to the Church ; "for the same day there were added unto them about three thousand souls." But there were still some who had rejected the Son of God as the Messiah, who were still looking for another; one whom they would desire. Then some of those unbelievers having the baptism of John, continued making proselytes or converts, baptizing them unto John's baptism.—Next we must bear in mind that this thing occurred about twenty-five years after John's time ; and about eight hundred miles westward from the Jordan, where the people knew very little, if anything, about the gospel before Paul came there preaching. It seems quite plain from the narrative given, that the leaders or baptizers of those twelve men, were vagabond Jews, and if they knew anything about Christ, did not believe on him, but had rejected him, since it seems plain that those twelve did not know anything about Christ. But when Paul had preached unto them Christ and him crucified, with his glorious resurrection, they believed on him, and they soon saw that they had been baptized by unbelievers, and not in the name of Jesus the Son of God, who was the propitiation for their sins. They, seeing that their baptism was invalid, were then baptized according to the commission given to the Apostles by the Lord Jesus.

BROTHER HOLSINGER ;

We take this opportunity to write a few lines for the C. F. C. As we always like to hear church news, and to hear of the prosperity of God's cause, we think perhaps other brethren and sisters are just as anxious to hear such news as we are.

Brother Jonathan Swihart of Illinois, accompanied by brother K. Heckman, of the same place, paid us a visit on the first of March, and stayed until the 9th, having in all eleven meetings, resulting in receiving three into the church by baptism. So much for their labor ; besides, we think the church feels built up in general. We wish them God's blessing, and hope they may ever work for the upbuilding of Zion's cause, as they did while they were here. May God grant us grace sufficient for our days and trials, and inspire us with holy zeal, that we may, through the scoffs and sneers of the world, earnestly contend for the faith once delivered to the saints. "Blessed are they that do his commandments, that they may have right to the tree of life, and may enter in through the gates into the city.

J. W. GEPHART,
D. M. MILLER.

Bangor, Mich.

From Ott, Coos County, Oregon.

Inasmuch as I, with my family, moved to Oregon last Summer, and left so many brethren, sisters, and kind friends, that I love so dearly, I often feel like writing to all; but as that is impossible, I concluded to write and have it reach you all through the COMPANION.

First, we are all enjoying reasonably good health, have ever since here. Thanks be to the Lord for that blessing.

Again, we have much enjoyed ourselves since here ; meeting many kind and sociable people, with whom we could meet, in school-houses and under the large myrtle and fir trees, in the service of our Lord, who has led us along through all the dangers of life, bringing no marks of displeasure on us.

We have had a pleasant winter indeed ; the most pleasant, I think, I ever saw. We are much pleased with the country, but not because it is nicer than where we came from. Oh, no, it is much rougher : it is the most mountainous country I ever saw. But, brethren, you know we sometimes gather the sweetest berries from the most briery vines.

Some might ask what was my object in moving so far. I will tell you: it was to get to a milder climate. My health was poor. I had passed the storms of winter, over 20 years, in Illinois and Iowa ; having my arrangements, and they must be attended to, if possible. Brethren, you that live in a cold climate, you know all this ; and especially you that labor in the ministry. How often on Sunday morning do you ask, "Who will go along with me ?"One says, "I can't, I believe I can't."Another says, "It is too cold;"and another says,"Oh, stay at home ; there will not be many anyhow." The poor servant stands, listening to it all, but he still feels the responsibility resting on him. At last he says, "Well, I must go ;" and away he starts, through all the storm. The above has often been my experience. For the last few years I could not endure the winters there ; so I thought I would try to hunt a milder climate ; and we think we have found it. It is milder than we had expected to find it. The winter has been much like the month of May in Iowa or Ill. There is pasture all winter. Cattle and horses not in use do well without feeding. Hogs run in the woods and make their own living, often till they get wild. Cattle the same. You may go out any time in the winter and find flowers ; also frogs hopping around; snakes crawling around; bugs and ants and flies all in life. To give you a fair understanding of the mildness of our climate, I will state, last fall, I piled my potatoes on a pile, on an open porch, and they lay there the coldest nights we had this winter, not covered, and did not freeze. We had a few nights, last fall, that dried up the mud somewhat; since that we only had a few frosts. It is much milder west of the Coast Range of Mountains than it is east of them. We are down near the level of the sea, as we have four and five feet of tide water here, and only seven feet at the mouth of the Coquille River. We live fifteen miles from the sea; and, by the way of the river, it is probably 40 miles.

Suffer me now to change my discourse a little, and come to that which has been much resting on my mind since here. I know I have many brethren and sisters, that are in delicate health, that would be pretty comfortable, if the winters were not so severe on them, on account of such great and sudden changes. I am aware of the colds that delicate women are liable to take, every time they go out of doors immediately after coming from the wash-tub. I write plainly. I know it will not harm the noble, but will do the meek good if they only can understand. I am satisfied that I have many delicate sisters, who, if they were here, to get the fresh air of the great waters, and not be housed up in a close house, might live out their days with more satisfaction than they possibly can where the winter's are so hard. Again I have thought of those that are so lusty, that in Summer oftentimes hardly know where to get comfort, rolling and sweltering in the heat all night. I am satisfied, if they lived on the coast, they would have pleasant nights of rest, as there is a cold breeze from the ocean passing along making it so cool at nights, that a person will need a couple of good blankets over him. It is too cool for mosquitoes to trouble much. If we see any it is generally in the middle of the day. Brethren, these things would have been a satisfaction to me, therefore I think they will be to you.

Again, some wonder if snakes are very plenty and dangerous, as we have such great mountains. No, there very few, and those are not dangerous. We have plenty of bears, some wild cats and panthers, quite bands of elk. Deer are not as plenty as elk. Fish are very plenty indeed. The salmon come up in the fall and spring in abundance. Brethren, you who are fishers, if you were here, you never could exhaust this fishery.

There are some right good homesteads that can be taken; but they are going fast. Unimproved land is selling from five to ten dollars per acre; improved land, from eight to fourteen, according to improvement. Any person wishing to come here, will find it the easiest and cheapest way to come by railway to San Francisco; then take a vessel to Coos Bay coast. About seventy dollars for one passenger from Omaha to Coos Bay.

Now I have written about many things; a few things I want to say, and then close my letter. What brother or laborer in the vineyard of the Lord, may I hear saying, "The harvest is great and the laborers few." Brethren, when six or seven of you are at one time behind the table, think of us in the far west, the vast country where they have scarcely any preaching, and many requests for preaching, which we cannot attend to. Dear brethren and sisters, my prayer is that the Lord may be with you, and when it goes well with you, remember me.

DAVID BARKLOW.

Missionary.

"Therefore, they that were scattered abroad, went everywhere preaching the word." Acts 8: 4. The brethren in the West are scattered abroad. Have they not Gospel authority to go into the highways and hedges and preach, without waiting for the action of A. M.? Reading in C. F. C., No. 11, page 173, the resolution of the brethren in Southern District of Iowa, Monroe congregation, (where I have my standing,) I was made to feel happy; but when I came to where the resolution was lost, I cannot tell in words what a damper fell on my heart, being at this time 70 miles from the nearest brethren to my knowledge. This makes me feel the more need of the brethren going out to build up the waste places, that those who dwell in darkness may be brought to the light. Can the ten nays say with Paul, "I am clean of the blood of all men"? How many souls have gone to ruin this winter, while the brethren of Monroe, Jefferson, and Appanoose, are waiting for the A. M. to say, "Go." Has not Jesus said, "Go into all the world preach the Gospel to every creature?" Cannot three congregations decide such a plain command? or has the church lost its power? But the 7 yeas have done what they could; and when our Master will come to gather his children together, they will shine as stars in the firmament, and hear that welcome of, "Thou good and faithful servant."

HANNAH KNAUFF.

YORK SULPHER SPRINGS, PA.
Feb. 25th, 1873.

Brother Grabill Meyers. I am glad to hear that you are yet in earnest about the missionary cause. I suppose you remember that, in 1870, when the District Meeting was with us, (Upper Canawaga congregation,) the Home Mission was agreed upon. Now this district is not very large; and in this neighborhood there was no meeting-house, and but few members; but we thought that we ought to have a house to worship in. Some of the brethren, a few miles distant, thought it would not pay to build a meeting-house, because there were but so few members here. But we went to work, and had all the money subscribed that we could. The majority of the brethren here are poor; but they that could give, were liberal. Brother Trostle gave one acre of land and one hundred dollars in money; brother Biteman, one hundred dollars; and the rest was raised by small subscriptions, from one to twenty-five dollars, and yet we owe two hundred dollars on the house. But we suppose some of the members who thought this was not a proper place for a meeting-house, have since changed their opinion; they have confessed that the meetings here were a feast to their souls. We had a series of meetings here, commencing on the 26th of January and continuing until the 4th of February. We had nineteen meetings, and generally good attendance, considering the extreme cold weather. Brother Jacob Trostle, from Linganore, Md., and his brother, Levi Trostle, from Illinois, were here, and preached for us; and we pray that the Lord will reward them for their labor of love towards us. On the 2nd day of February, there were four added to the church, by baptism. This was one of the most solemn scenes I ever witnessed at baptism. The first one that stepped down the steps of ice, between the walls of ice, into the flowing stream, was an old mother, perhaps sixty years of age. She had a number of grown children to witness the scene, some weeping and praying. They thought it was too hard for grandmother; but she confessed that she felt happy, and that she now had the answer of a good conscience towards God. On the 23rd we had the pleasure of seeing two more, young females, added by baptism. Some more are inquiring about the good old way. In eight month's time we had eight additions to the church at this place. We hope the Lord will call some more to a sense of duty.

Now I would ask the question, would not the brethren of Altoona better first try and see what they could do towards buying or building a meeting-house, and if necessary, then apply to the church at large?

DIED.

We admit no poetry under any circumstances in connection with Obituary Notices. We wish to use all alike, and we could not insert verses with all.

Departed this life, sister HARRIS, wife of brother Jos. Harris, near Arnold's Station, Clay county, Mo, on the 5th of Feb. She had been ailing for some time. I have been acquainted with her for some eighteen months. From the account I had, she was fully resigned to the will of the Lord; but at the last, her affection for her children was so strong, that she could hardly part with them.—The last words she spoke were, "Oh, my dear children!" She leaves a husband, and, I think, 4 children.

G. R. HOLSINGER.

Kansas City, Mo.

On the 15th day of March, in the Sandy Creek branch, Preston county, W. Va., sister ANNE MUSSER, widow of brother Christian Musser, who died some twenty years ago. Her age was 94 years and 27 days. She was much beloved and respected by all that knew her. She lived with her youngest daughter, who is married to John Robinson, a Methodist preacher, a very respectable man. I visited our aged sister a few days previous to her death, and had some devotional exercises with her. She told me her departure was at hand, and she felt ready to go. Funeral services by the writer and brother Joseph Beckner, from 2d Timothy 6: 8.

JACOB M. THOMAS.

[Visitor please copy.]

Fell asleep in Jesus, in the Conemaugh congregation, March 8th, brother ELIAS REAM, aged 52 years, 3 months and 15 days. Disease, typhoid fever. Truly his days were few and full of trouble.—Two companions and twelve children preceded him, and he leaves a wife (a sister) and nine children to mourn their loss.—Funeral services by the Brethren, and the writer, from Job 14: 1.

Also in the same congregation, Feb. 16, PHILIP ALBAUGH, infant son of friends Samuel and Mary Albaugh. Occasion improved by the writer, from Matt. 18: 3.

WM BYERS.

Near Alum Bank, Bedford county, Pa., LILLY ANN SLEEK, widow of Samuel M. Sleek, who died exactly two months previous. She was the mother of thirteen children. She died without making any profession, neither did she lament.—Disease consumption. I would say to all, take warning, and prepare to meet your God, for we must all die, and if we are prepared it will only be an exchange of trouble for happiness.

C. S. HOLSINGER.

In the George's Creek Branch, of consumption, sister MARY ANN EWING, wife of brother Oliver Ewing. Mary Ann was truly a loving sister in the Church; was kind, humble, and peaceable in the Church, and so to all who knew her. Her last days were truly her best days. She bore her affliction well, in patience, hope, and true resignation to the will of Heaven. Few, perhaps, will leave better evidences, to make lasting impressions upon the community and the Church of her especial choice. We can deeply condole with brother Ewing and his dear family, who have sustained a heavy shock and a painful loss; but her loss is Christ's gain, and our loss is her gain; so we need not mourn as those having no hope. She leaves a kind father and mother, who may well long for her everlasting rest. Her husband retains only now memories of the silent past in the bosom of his once great enjoyment, in prospect to live, is now changed, in somber drapery, soon to moulder, and then a greater enjoyment, to meet beyond the grove, in glory.—Brother, arise to duty; follow Jesus.—Children, mother's smiles have faded in the distance, her sweet form and carressing tenderness have been wafted to a clime of the quiet rest of celestial sweetness. Keep her last words to you, and keep you all her memory, and give yourselves peace in a redeeming Lord.

Funeral discourse, Acts 2: 26, 27, by the writer and brother David Younce.

JOS. J. COVER.

In the Big Grove congregation, Benton county, Iowa, March 25th, MARTHA ELLEN FIKE, daughter of brother Christian J., and sister Francis, aged 3 years 11 months and 23 days. Disease, croup. Her affliction was short—only about 24 hours. Funeral services by the writer, and Joseph Fike, a River brother.

JOHN METZLER.

In Ephrata congregation, Lancaster, county, Pa., January 29th, 1873. Our old sister ELIZABETH KINSEY, aged 85 years 8 months and 1 day. Our old sister had been delicate and feeble-minded for some years. Funeral services by brethren S. C. Harley, Wm. Price, and I. W. Shirk.

In same congregation, February 17th, sister MARY HERSHBERGER, aged 84 years and 7 days. Disease may be termed old age &c. Was buried at Springville on the 21st. Funeral services by Jacob Reinhold and S. C. Harley.

In same congregation, in Lincoln, March 20th, sister POLLY SHIRK, aged 77 years 4 months and 2 days. Our old sister arose in the morning apparently in good health and went about her work, when she was suddenly overtaken by severe pain at the heart and suffered the most intense pain for 3 hours, when death came to her relief. She died in the hope of being received into the mansion of rest. Was buried at Springville March 24th. Funeral by brethren S. C. Harley, Wm. Price and I. W. Shirk.

In same congregation, March 28th, 1873, of debility and infirmity, our sister SALLY RATER, aged 81 years 10 months and 7 days. She was interred at SchoenEckSteinmetz meeting-house, on the 30th. Funeral services by brethren C. Bucher, S. C. Harley and Wm. Price.

Thus we see, in less than two months 4 of our old sisters passed from time to eternity. Soon will they be mouldering in their graves and soon forgotten. Ah yes! too soon we fear! Death's sickle is at work upon every side, and cuts low the old, young, rich and poor, the good and the wicked, and gathers them into the house of reservation. Those yet in life, still trudge along, unconscious of the danger; as though no danger was near. No God to fear! no judgment to await, and no hell to escape! O take warning ye blind and deaf! Rouse up and be at work, before it be too late!

LEVI ANDES.

Lincoln, Pa.

March 5th, in the Smith Fork branch, Clinton county, Mo., brother AUGUST BATCHER, aged 60 years 3 months and five days Funeral occasion improved by the writer, from Eccl. 9: 10, to a large and attentive audience.

C. L. HOBBS.

Died December 25th, in the Upper Canawaga branch, of Diptheria, LATURA TROSTLE; aged 5 years and 8 months. She was the daughter of brother Isaac and sister Mary Trostle. Funeral services by M. Bushman and J. P. Lerew.

Also in the same congregation, March 10th, brother JOHN F. FITZGERLS; aged 66 years and 11 months. Disease dropsy. Funeral services by J. P. Lerew.

In Beaver Creek congregation, Montgomery county Ohio, March 10th, sister HANNAH ARNOLD, wife of brother Samuel Arnold and sister-in-law of the writer. Her disease was rather a mysterious one, as the doctors were very much baffled about it. She had been ailing for about twelve months previous to her death. Her age was 51 years 11 months and 17 days. Funeral occasion improved by the brethren present, to a very large concourse of people, from John 14: 1—4.

Sister Arnold leaves a sorrowful husband, (a deacon) two sons and one daughter to mourn her loss; but we hope their loss is her gain. She raised all her offspring to maturity, two of which are married. She was buried in the Brethren's grave-yard near the residence of her husband.

Also in the same congregation and county March 19th, of consumption, sister HANNAH BRUBAKER, aged 37 years and 1 day. Funeral improved by brethren P. Nead and Daniel Miller, from the words, "Be thou faithful until death, and I will give thee a crown of life," the latter clause of the 10th verse of 2nd chapter Rev.

Sister Brubaker, was one of our plain sisters, and one who adorned the doctrine of the Savior by her walk and chaste conduct and examples of piety. She obeyed her Master's call in her early days; and lived and died a consistent member. Her chief desire was that she might be absent from the body and present with the Lord. Her mind was perfectly rational to the last moments of her life. A few hours before her departure she requested the brethren to meet with her in prayer, and anoint her with oil in the name of the Lord. Her request was immediately attended to. She leaves a kind husband, (a minister in the second degree,) and five children to mourn the loss of a kind companion and mother; but not as those who have no hope, for their loss is her eternal gain. She was buried in the Brethren's grave-yard in the above named church, where many sorrowful tears were shed.

The Christian Family Companion. Is published every Tuesday, at $1.50 a year, by Henry R. Holsinger, who is a member of the Church of the Brethren, sometimes known by the name of "German Baptists," and vulgarly or maliciously called "Dunkards."

The design of the work is to advocate truth, expose error, and encourage the true Christian on his way to Zion.

It assumes that the New Testament is the Will of God, and that no one can have the promise of salvation without observing all its requirements, that among these are Faith, Repentance, Prayer, Baptism by trine immersion, Feet Washing, the Lord's Supper, the Holy Communion, Charity, Nonconformity to the world, and a full resignation to the whole will of God, as he has revealed it through his Son Jesus Christ.

So much of the affairs of this world as may be thought necessary to the proper observance of the signs of the times, or such as may tend to the moral, mental, or physical benefit of the Christian will be published, thus removing all occasion for coming into contact with the so-called Literary or Political journals.

Be Kind to the Little Ones.

Be kind to the little ones; often they prove
Our teachers and monitors dear,
They teach us forgiveness, humility, love,
Thereby making duty more clear.

Be kind to the little ones; soon, ah! too soon,
Their faces, now joyous and glad,
Will, from contact with earth, gather sorrow and gloom,
And their visage look care-worn and sad.

Be kind to the little ones; soon they will leave
The old homestead for scenes that are new.
If cruel you've been, how sorely you'll grieve,
When pronouncing the sad word. Adieu!

Be kind to the little ones; death may, ere long,
Stamp his signet upon their fair brow;
Benumb their lithe limbs, and hush their glad song,
And yourself in deep anguish to bow.

Be kind to the little ones; treat them with care—
So innocent, lovely, and sweet!
We know that fit subjects for heaven they are,
If they die, in an infantile state.

The Scriptures. No. 6.

In treating the history of the authorship of the Scriptures of the New Testament, I shall for the want of space and time, bring it within the compass of two essays. Volumes however might be written on this part of the scriptures with interest and edification.

The New Testament was written during the latter part of the first century. Some authors however date back Matthew's Gospel as early as A. D. 37. But most of our modern church writers on the Scriptures, date the completion of Matthew's Gospel to A. D. 63 to 65.

The New Testament is composed of twenty-seven different books, and constituted the work of eight authors. The four Gospels were written by Matthew, John, who were apostles, and Mark and Luke, companions of the apostles. The "Acts of the Apostles" was also written by Luke. Of the epistles fourteen are contributed to St. Paul, one to St. James; two, to Peter; three, to John; and one to Jude. The Apocalypse, the great prophetic Keystone chart of the New Testament, is the work of St. John.

In the New Testament the Gospels claim our more particular attention; because in it we have a direct history of the Savior and many of his wise sayings, as they dropped from his blessed lips, verbatim et literatim. The word gospel signifies good news, or good tidings, as found in the language of the angel's communication of the birth of Christ to the shepherds. Christ commands his followers, "Repent ye and believe the gospel." His ministers he left the following charge, "Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature."

This seems to have been the burden of his soul, while sojourning on this stage of action; namely, to make known unto the children of men his heavenly Father's will, the gospel, the "good tidings of great joy which shall be to all people." Well might the apostle of old say, "But though we, or an angel from heaven, preach any other gospel unto you than that which we have preached unto you, let him be accursed." Also, on another occasion he says in one of his letters, "For though I preach the gospel, I have nothing to glory of; for necessity is laid upon me; yea, woe is me if I preach not the gospel." "For if I do this thing willingly, I have a reward; but if against my will, a dispensation of the gospel is committed unto me." From the above language and scripture quotations it evidently appears, that all men must obey the gospel terms of salvation, if they would obtain a right to the kingdom. Likewise on those whom the church sees fit to commit the ministration of the word, or whom "necessity is laid upon" must act. This well applies to the ministery of the present day, and I would here remind our silent, stay-at-home preachers, to remember that the same woe rest on them the apostle speaks of, if you "preach not the gospel," providing the Lord has entrusted you with one pound, the least given to his rational beings, because your usefulness in this world is thus curtailed and confined to one talent or pound of intellectual attainments, is no reason that you should bury what little you have, and so be of no consequence and use to the church, like a drone bee in the hive. Improve what you have, and by diligence and application, you will soon double, treble, yea, quadruple it, and thus fit and qualify yourself for the higher and responsible position you hold.

By noticing the Gospels collectively, it is impossible to go into detail in the history and life of the authors of the four gospels, since we have so little upon record. Suffice it, however, to say that Matthew was by profession a publican or tax gatherer; by religion a Jew. In regard to Mark, we read in the Acts of the Apostles, of "John whose surname was Mark." He had a sharp contention with Paul, but afterwards became his fellow-laborer. Luke was a physician, and also became a companion and fellow-laborer with Paul. John was the son of Zebedee; and brother to James, one the twelve apostles. He was also one the of the first to visit the sepulchre after the resurrection and called "that disciple whom Jesus loved." But above all, ye sons and daughters that have old and decrepit parents to take care of, if you please, take an example of the beloved disciple John, how he felt and manifested a parental care and guardianship for his distressed mother. Read the following, and take counsel. "When Jesus, therefore, saw his mother, and his disciple standing by, whom he loved, he saith unto his mother, woman, behold thy son! Then saith he to the disciple, behold thy mother! And from that time that disciple took her unto his own house."

The four gospels constitute a genuine and complete history of our adorable Redeemer, especially the first three, they being written in a comparatively short time from each other. Matthew wrote his gospel some years, probably, before Mark and Luke, which were compiled almost simultaneously. The first three were composed from about A. D. 50 to 65, while John's gospel was written about thirty years later. No doubt, the first three were more or less circulated among the christian converts, and in all likelihood, John had read them, before he wrote his gospel. This may account, in part, for the fact that he wrote so little of what the rest did, but dwelt largely upon the love of God and the divinity of Christ.

The harmony of the scriptures is a point on which I wish to call the attention of the reader in particular, especially the historical books contained in the four gospels. There is nothing of a conflicting nature found, when we come to strictly compare the different subjects upon which they all or in part treat. For the satisfaction and convenience of the reader I will refer to some of the subject matter on which all four wrote, and how beautifully and harmoniously they coalesce; in many instances conveying the idea in almost the same words. This is one of strongest evidences in proof of the divine character and authenticity of the scriptures. Other authors who have undertaken to record the biography of some noted personage differ, more or less, when they come to describe the minor incidents connected with the history of such a person, however much erudition they may display in delineating character. This is not so with the unlearned but inspired writers of the Scriptures. Among other things the four evangelists together treat upon each of the following subjects; namely, the ministry of John the baptist; the baptism of Jesus Christ; John the baptist in prison; feeding of the five thousand; Peter's denial; Peter's profession of faith; Christ's triumphant entry into Jerusalem; the cleansing of the temple; Christ's agony in the garden, Judas' betrayal; a part of Christ's trial, crucifixion, death, burial and resurrection. On the above point, the four gospels treat, all more or less. Matthew, Mark, and Luke corroborate in a great many instances; and frequently where one lacks the other two supply. Matthew and Luke treat upon a greater variety of subjects than any of the rest. But Matthew's account of Christ's sermon on the mount is fuller and more satisfactory than that given by any of the other parties.

Among the things recorded in the Gospels but once, are accredited to Matthew: The wise men from the East; opening of the eyes of two blind men; woes pronounced upon the cities of Galilee; parable of the wheat and tares; the hidden treasure; the pearls and net, the fish tribute money; the duty of forgiving; parable of the two sons; Judas' death and the guard at the sepulchre.

To Mark is ascribed the parable of the sower; the salting of fire, &c.; to Luke, the annunciation of the birth of John and Jesus; Mary's visit to Elizabeth; birth of John the baptist; the shepherds. The presentation of the infant Savior in the temple ; and his disputations with the doctors at the age of twelve years ; the widow's son at Nain ; fire from heaven ; the doings of the 70 disciples ; the good Samaritan ; Mary and Martha ; the Galileeans that perished ; "are there few that be saved?" Warning against Herod ; dropsy healed on the Sabbath day ; parables of the lost sheep, piece of money, prodigal son, unjust steward, rich man and Lazarus, unjust judge, and pharisee and publican ; how the kingdom cometh ; Zaccheus, contentions of the apostles and Christ before Herod.

John alone makes mention of the following : "The Word," water turned into wine, Christ's conversation with Nicodemus ; the woman of Samaria ; the nobleman's son ; woman taken in adultery ; the man born blind ; the good shepherd ; raising of Lazarus ; Christ's last discourse to his disciples found in the fourteenth to the end of the seventeenth chapter of his gospel : (in this discourse are found many things not recorded elsewhere) ; the side pierced on the cross after he had expired, also, is not mentioned by the other evangelists. From the above the reader can see at once that a great many subjects have been recorded for our learning, by the gospel writers, in the life and acts of the Savior. Of these one or the other has written and where two, three or more have written on the same theme they have corroborated each other in the same mind, as if actuated by the same spirit. The four gospels alone constitute a plain and infallible guide to the life and teachings of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ. No one can fully discharge his duty toward God and man, unless he makes himself intimately acquainted with this part of the scriptures of divine truth. It is the last will and testament of a dying Savior ; while the epistolary writings, &c., serve only as a suplementary part of the original will, as found in the four gospels.

Berlin, Pa. W. G. SCHROCK.

Answer to Brother L. G. Hyde.

"Whether the spirit of the righteous man rests with God, in an unconscious state until the resurrection, or whether it is in a state in which it comprehends, and enjoys a certain portion of happiness until the resurrection," &c.

The above query is asked by L. G. Hyde, of New Jersey, in C. F. C., No. 11, current vol., page 171. This question deserves our serious notice. I would refer the brethren to the following passages of scripture :

"To the general assembly and church of the firstborn, which are written in heaven ; and to God the judge of all, and to the spirits of just men made perfect." Heb. 12 : 23.

"I saw under the altar the souls of them that were slain for the word of God, and for the testimony which they held." "And white robes were given unto every one of them ; and it was said unto them that they should rest yet for a little season," &c. Rev. 6 : 9—11. "And it came to pass that the beggar died, and was carried by the angels into Abraham's bosom." "But now he is comforted." Luke 16 : 22, 25.

"For we know that, if our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens." 2 Cor. 5: 1—8.

I do not think it necessary to produce any more testimony, to prove the consciousness of departed spirits, however numbers of equally strong proof texts could be given. I think the candid seeker after truth, will be satisfied.

THE ARMY OF IDLERS.—It is estimated that there are one hundred thousand men in the city of New York who absolutely do nothing for their own support. These are in addition to thieves and other classes who live by their "wits" without pursuing any honest calling. They come under the comprehensible class termed "loafers." Only think what an army these men would make, and what results they might accomplish, if they would go to work. Why, there is physical ability here going to waste, which, if it were employed, would be sufficient to build five hundred miles of railroad in a year or, if it were directed to agriculture, might supply food enough for the city of New York ; or in the department of military affairs could conquer Mexico.

It is scarcely probable that any other community in the United States has so large a share of totally useless population. They would be sufficient to convert the whole state of Kansas into a garden within three months —if they were not too lazy—and might "drive the wolf" from the doors of half the humble homes in the nation, though, as they now are, their presence might be deemed a worse visitation than the gaunt wolf itself.

"Stylish."

RESPONSE TO J. L. W.

If ourselves are rigid wise—
Rigid righteous in our eyes—
Faultless, straight in every action,
Full of selfish satisfaction,
Wise men see our feeble arts,
Fruitless efforts, fits and starts—
See full well the rigid letter
Of the law makes man no better.
That the work of faith is love—
Love to man and God above.
Not words alone, but truth, indeed,
Gives now to brother who hath need.
Labor, treasure must be held
Servant here, by love excelled.
Rigid, righteous mammon-holder!
Rigid wise! our hearts grow colder
With the increase of our pelf,
With the dreadful love of self;
The rigid wise make no mistakes,
But rigid righteous miser makes.
Oh, selfish, selfish human glory!
See our Savior's sacred story
Finds not in all thine inmost aims
For God a heart. We need more gains.
Now are we rich toward our God,
And claim full pardon in His blood;
Because our money is all lent,
(We may afford another cent
At the coming council day,
And promote the cause that way).
Now, that will make, in all, this year,
About four dollars! Oh, 'tis dear,
Thus to give so much away!
Twenty thousand, anyway,
Is all we're worth. And maybe more
Is wanted next year than before.
Now we must be let alone
Till another year is gone.
Now we must work with all our joints,
And so succeed in all our points;
While we're in for getting cheap,
Let us not forget to keep.
Now stop and see, what can this be?
They want to paint the seats, you see!
No seats have yet been painted:
Bare pine wood, all untainted,
Tables and windows all the same,
We're ever pressed with aught but plane!
All to be painted inside!
This, you see is hurtful pride.
If all our mansions, fair and wide,
Are painted bright in and outside,
Who can tell our love in this?
At fault, or, at least, amiss!
Carpets, frescoes, and papered walls,
Comfort and ease when neighbor calls,
Grateful to owner and to guest,
Grateful in comfort and in rest,
Grateful to God for such blessing,
Comfortable homes possessing.
With the means which God gave us
Doth He comfort less and save us;
Adding to comfort and to beauty
Knowledge of law and of duty.
Now, consistency would teach,
That, so far as we can reach,
The Lord's house first should be adorned;
And when this duty is performed,
Then we show our love supreme—
High beyond all earthly scheme—
And first to God above, alone,
And not to fallen self at home,
Prove our faith by work of love,
If God or self we most do love:
Give self a house, so fine and warm,
And God a dingy shed or barn.
Thus we plod in devious ways,
And wonder at the critic's gaze.
Self-love, spring of all ambition,
Greed and gain, to all, perdition.
Riches and self-glory loving,
Pride of life in death a sting—
Of pride in life, and not in clothes,
Of stepping over humbler toes,
Self complaisant heritage,
Boasting of our parentage.
Wealth above our needful merits,
The church, by law, thro' Christ inherits.
Then it's clear that we must give
God his share, if we would live.
For a "stylish church" a brother yearns,
And to the beggared fleshpots turns.
No doubt, says Ananias,
Our good old way deny us.
We'll keep a part for self awhile;
A painted house has too much "style;"
Brethren never will permit,
In such stylish seats to sit.
Some are always money begging,
Always at our purses pegging;
I am tired of this giving—
Of this everlasting giving—
One can no other thoughts employ;
Oh, how it doth my soul annoy;
This is not covetousness,
This my brethren must confess;
I'm only careful now to save,
And for a "rainy day" to have;
Better for a thousand years,
For a thousand dismal fears,
Than to not quite enough provide.
This is prudence; who dare deride?
(Such prudence! 'tis but common
In such a way to manage mammon).
I may not to my brethren lend.
I know they do not freely spend;
But, if legal course we take,
But a single rigid shake,
Commotion, uproar, all's alive
Within the busy, dreaded hive.
So I hope to saunter out,
And for myself to look about;
But to seek a fair advantage,
With the world upon the rampage,
All my outside dues collect;
Fairer show—better prospect—
With better credit in the church,
Not one to leave me in the lurch.
This is best, I do opine,
For all the rest, for me and mine."
So Covetousness reasons on,
Seasons in and seasons gone;
And thus the world the church pollutes,
Religious fears and hopes imbrutes.
Sad, but true, as all men know;
Sent to give a timely blow;
Truly a friend, and not a foe,
To sister, brother, high or low.
Malice to none—love to all.
Sordid hate, forbidden fall.
"Live and let live," the Herald cries.
Give God the moment, as it flies;
Let faith on eagle's pinions rise,
And hoard your treasures in the skies;
So shall the church triumphant sing
Her anthems to our God and King,
In the bright forever land—
In the glorious Fatherland—
Celestial clime of liberty,
Forever in eternity.

Christianity and Woman.

Although man, socially, has been much benefitted by Christianity, woman is still more its debtor for social position.—"Husbands, love your wives, as Christ loved the Church," is a precept taught by the religion of Jesus, and conveys a right to woman unknown to any other system of ethics; the right to be loved with a pure, unselfish, heavenly love, even as Christ loved the Church and gave himself for it. Such a love the Christian wife has a right to expect from her Christian husband; and what more could she ask as a safeguard to protect her in all the trials of life? No infringement upon her inalienable rights, no abridgement of her privileges, can possibly result from such love. This law elevates woman to an equality with man in the true sense of the term, Her husband is to love her as his own life—the twain shall be one flesh—and who ever hated his own flesh?

No Christian husband can do violence to his wife, any more than he can do violence to his own person. And this position, assigned her by Christianity, is not only an improvement upon all former systems of ethics, in her favor, but is an entire reversion of them all. All others had degraded woman to the level of a chattel: the husband purchasing his wife for a stated sum, he valued and treated her accordingly.

To this, even ancient Greece and Rome, nations noted for their high attainments in civilization, have not been exceptions. The former, while in the zenith of its glory, legalized prostitution in its vilest forms. Lais Aspasia, Phryne, and other prostitutes were immortalized by the sculptors, educated in their academies, and honored by their greatest men, such as Socrates, Alcibiades and Praxiteles, while the wife and mother was confined at home, plunged in ignorance and chained in slavery.

The Romans stole their first wives from the Sabines; and as might was right with them in their political economy, so also it was, to a great extent, in their social affairs. The husband was the lord, and was vested with absolute authority over all his possessions. The right of life or death, sale or banishment of all his property, including his wife, his children, and his slaves—in fact, all were slaves—was accorded to the Roman lord.

If this was the condition of woman in the most civilized countries prior to the Christian era, what must have been her condition in countries less civilized? And in those countries of the present day, where the light of Christianity has not yet shed its benign influence, how debased and enthralled do we find the position of woman.

Passing by the shocking atrocities of the heathen, the burning of widows, &c., let us stop to examine those nations which boast a civilization, and challenge Christianity for comparison. China, with its boasted antiquity, the nation to which we are referred by a certain class of philosophers, as abounding in arguments against the claims of Christian civilization—the nation which claims the title of celestial for itself, applies the term barbarian to the rest of the world, let us inquire into the condition of woman in this land governed by the Confucian moralities. Here woman is regarded as an inferior being, bought and sold like a piece of land or a yoke of oxen. Polygamy has alway existed, and divorce is granted on the slightest pretext; and the well known custom of compelling her to contract and disfigure her feet, is said to have originated in the fertile mind of the disciple of Confucius, to compel his wife to stay at home. The birth of a daughter is considered such a calamity, that lamentations fill the house upon the event; and it is said that a Chinese gentleman considers it an insult to be asked how many daughters he has, and female infants are numerously destroyed.

The Mahommedan religion is considered by some as occupying a position between Christianity and paganism. Of the condition of woman among the Musselman, let the slave marts of Constantinople speak. The same sickly details of slavery and sensuality exist here as elsewhere, where the Christian religion does not shield woman and protect her.

Having taken a brief glance at the condition of woman in countries where the Christian religion is not known, let us next direct our attention to our own country. We are known among the nations of the earth by the proud appellation of Christian. Nevertheless, infidelity is infecting the land from ocean to ocean.—Satan has succeeded in introducing his soul-destroying doctrine among all classes. What he cannot do in direct opposition to the religion of Jesus, he does just as effectually under the form of religion.—Polygamy, divorce, adultery, promiscuity are all practiced in our Christian land, of religion. They all maintain their position openly, and flaunt their institutions defiantly in the face of the laws of God and man. Woman is maltreated and debased oftimes, in so-called Christian America. This does not argue that true Christianity does not afford her protection; but it does argue that, if she desires to be protected in her Christian privileges, and reap the benefits of her rights under the gospel, she can only be safe in submitting herself unto its teachings. How can she expect to be safe in the enjoyment of her rights under the gospel, as long as she does not place herself under its protecting wings? How can any woman, after considering the great benefits and privileges bestowed upon her sex by the gospel, consider the allying herself with the church of God secondary to anything, and especially that of forming a matrimonial alliance.—Yet we have reason to believe that not a few are thus casting away their glorious privileges, who will at the same time, ridicule the act of Esau selling his birthright for a mess of pottage, and denounce mother Eve for permitting the serpent to beguile her into the eating of the fruit.—Yet who is able to demonstrate wherein their actions are wiser, and their legitimate results less hazardous to themselves. The young woman, who considers the securing of a husband of greater importance than the seeking after the kingdom of heaven, is violating a plain gospel command, and is discriminating as unwisely in her choice as did either Eve or Esau; and on what principle of retributive justice can it be claimed that her violation and foolishness should not receive a corresponding recompense of reward?

We have shown what the invarible condition of woman is among those who are either ignorant of, or being acquainted with, disregard the teaching of the gospel of Christ. And does not a woman, who deliberately concludes that her chances of getting a husband would become impaired by becoming a follower of Jesus, virtually decide in favor of an ungodly husband? It is certainly very plain, that the man who would despise a woman because of her being espoused to Christ, would also disdain to recognize the Christian law of love and respect due the wife. When, therefore, such a woman reaps the bitter reward of her unwise choice, by finding, when it is too late, that she has placed herself outside the protecting influence of the gospel, she can only reflect that she has done so voluntarily. Shall woman thus voluntarily cast away her privileges and join the hosts of Satan, who would enslave her?

Many will not, and many will, seek first the kingdom of heaven, and are willing to forsake all for Christ's sake. Such have the assurance, upon the highest authority, that every desirable earthly blessing shall be added. For it is only by an unswerving devotion to a pure and undefiled Christianity, that she can be expected to be protected by that only religion that accords to her the place of a unit in society.

The Joy of Saving The Lost.

BY THEO. L. CUYLER.

In Mr. George Kennan's fascinating "Tent-Life in Siberia" is a very thrilling account of a search made by the author for a party of his lost countrymen on the Anadyr River. After a journey by dog-sledge for two hundred miles over drifted snow, they reached the spot where they conjecture the missing Americans to be buried away under the snow. Mr Kennan and his companion are well nigh perishing themselves from cold, which has sunk the mercury to fifty degrees below zero!

The feet of their poor dogs spot the white snow with blood at every step. One of the two brave explorers has already sunk exhausted on his sledge.

Suddenly, at midnight, Mr. Kennan hears a faint, long-drawn halloo across the wintry waste. It comes from one of his "Chookchee," who has gone in advance. He hurries to the spot, all the blood in his veins throbbing at his heart. As he comes up he discovers the Chookchee standing by a small black pipe projecting from a snow-bank. The lost wanderers must be under it. Thank God! Thank God! I repeated to myself softly, "says the heroic writer; "and as I climbed upon the snow-drift, and shouted down the pipe. Halloo the house!' I heard a startled voice under my feet reply, 'Who's there?' As I entered the snow-cellar, and seized hold of my long-lost friends, my over strained nerves gave way, and in ten minutes I could hardly raise my hand to my lips."

Reading the above thrilling scene in my friend Kennan's book, I found the tears stealing down my own cheeks in sympathy with the brave fellows who had periled their lives in order to rescue their lost friends from death and starvation. After concluding the narrative, which had almost the "lineament of a gospel-book," I opened my Bible and read this parable which Jesus spake:

What man of you, having a hundred sheep, if he loose one of them, doth not he leave the ninety and nine in the wilderness and go after that which is lost until he find it? And when he has found it, he layeth it on his shoulders rejoicing."

With this vivid scene of the siberian search fresh in my mind I read this exquisite parable with a new delight.

I seemed to see our Divine Shepherd starting off after the lost sheep. He knows the thickets or the quagmires into which the silly truant must have strayed. He may hear its bleatings afar off. He goes until he finds it. He does not beat it for straggling; but pulling it out of the mire, or drawing it from the tangled thicket, he layeth it on his shoulders—the clean carrying the unclean, the holy carrying the unholy. Beautiful picture of Jesus, the sin-bearer! Every saved soul has been upon Christ's shoulders. When he "bare our sins" and "carried our sorrows," then was the befouled yet precious load upon Jesus' shoulder. Yes and he bids us" cast our cares" upon him too! The whole load He taketh up joyfully.

It has often been made a cavil by students of astronomy that, if this globe of ours is only a mere speck in the starry universe' amid millions of suns and planets, why should the Son of God single out this diminutive globe as the theatre of his incarnation and sufferings? Why did he stoop to such a little world as ours? In this cavil Dr. Chalmers prepared and preached magnificent "Astronomical Discources."

But we think that this exquisite parable throws a hint of suggestive light on this problem. For, though we do not know that our Saviour never went on an errand of redemption to any other planet, we do know that He came to this one of ours. We do not, know that he went to stupendous Jupiter, or to belted Saturn, or to far-away Neptune. He did not go perhaps, to the planet that was biggest in size, but to the one that was basest in sin. He came not "to the largest world but to the lost world." Ah! He may have left the "ninety and nine" glorious and gigantic orbs which never wandered, and sought out the single one in which lay a race of sinners lost in misery and guilt!

There is one stroke in the parable which we must not loose sight of. It is that which depicts the exquisite joy of the rescuer. When the shepherd, findeth the sheep layeth it on his shoulders, rejoicing." He is glad for the sake of the restored sheep, but still more for his own.

It was "for the joy set before him that He endured the cross and despised the shame." Into that sublime joy how many elements may enter! There must have been in my Savior's heart a holy ecstasy of love which pleased itself in doing good—in saving me when lost—in enduring suffering, sacrifice for my salvation. This sublime love for the sin-bearer makes even the crown of thorns to flash as a diadem of splendors on the Redeemer's bleeding brow. Here was the divine luxury of doing good.

It is a sweet thought too that Jesus would have missed me if I had never been sought and brought back. As the shepherd in the story left the ninety and nine to hunt for the single straggler, so I may gladly hope Jesus wanted me in Heaven or else he would not have come so far or endured so much to save me. If I were left without him there I would have been one more soul in hell.

But if he where left without me, there would be one soul the less to sing his praise in Heaven. He would have one the less to present before his Father "within exceeding joy."

For observe that the sweet parable says nothing about the delight of the sheep in being found; it only depicts the exceeding joy of the shepherd in finding the wanderer. He calls his neighbors together to share his gladness." Likewise there is joy in the presence of the angels of God over one sinner that repenteth." The common and inaccurate rendering of this text confines the joy of the angels only; as if it read "among the angels."

Just as well say that the "neighbors" felt the shrill of gladness over the recovered sheep and not the shepherd himself. The transcendent joy in Heaven over a saved soul is not confined to the angel bands. It is only witnessed by them, partially shared by them. It is "in their presence" that the celestial rapture breaks forth.

But the supreme joy is in the bosom of the enthroned Redeemer! His was the sorrow, when he was "exceeding sorrowfull even unto death." His is the joy, when he presents even one repentent sinner "before the presence of his glory." He sees of the travail of his soul and is satisfied.

Oh! beloved Savior! When we behold thee on thy throne, the shepherd amid his ransomed flock; thy victories complete; the last wandering sheep brought home; the last recovered jewel glittering in thy crown; then we will confess that the triumph was worthy of the toil, and the ransom of thy glorified church was worthy of all the bitter agonies of him who came to seek and to save the lost! " Worthy is the LAMB that was slain, to receive power and riches and strength and honor and glory and blessing for ever and ever!"

Selected by B. S. Whitten.

"Jesus Christ, the same Yesterday, and To-day, and Forever." Heb. 12: 8.

In resuming at the commencement of another year those short scripture studies entitled "Sabbath Thoughts," I return to my readers with a text, old, yet ever new; well known, but always fresh, because its theme is—Jesus! Changes pass over us—he never changes. Life rolls on—he stands ever by us. Friends depart—he remains. What he was to us at first, he is now, and ever will be; only that, as time goes on, those who have learned to know him, confess how much they have still to learn, and how deeply they need his own true teaching.

To learn what Jesus Christ is "to-day," and will be "forever," look at what he was "yesterday," that is to say, while he was on earth among men. It was then that he manifested himself, and men saw in him the revelation of the Father, full of grace and truth, in his birth, his works, his words, his life, his character, his death. Behold him in his lowly birth, coming among men as a root out of a dry ground, having no form nor comeliness.

Jesus is still the same; and when he comes to the heart, it is as the meek and lowly Savior, revealing himself to the humble. Behold him in his works. Hear his "I will, be thou clean," to the leper; his "Arise, and walk," to the sick of the palsy; his "Come forth," to Lazarus.

Jesus is still the same; there is no spiritual sickness, nay, there is no spiritual death, which his word of power cannot reach, "yesterday, to-day, and forever." Behold him in his teaching. Hear his awful "Woe unto you, Pharisees;" and listen to his "Come unto me all ye that labor and are heavy laden." In his teaching, as in his working, Jesus is still the same; as full of tenderness in his call to the penitent, and as solemn in his warnings to the Pharisee now, as he was when on earth. Listen to his voice of compassion, saying to the widow of Nain, "Weep not." Mark his own tears, as he wept over Jerusalem, and again beside Lazarus' grave. And remember that his heart is unchanged, though now exalted to highest heavens; for even then Jesus is the same.

Thus, in meditating on our Lord, we gain new thoughts of his character and glory, as strengthening to our faith as they are real and well founded. In these suggestions I can but indicate one of the many paths which will amply reward examination, as to each characteristic of our Lord's words and ways, the believer adds the apostle's testimony in our text, and finds past and present unite in him with whom "is no variableness, neither shadow of turning."

What he does in his dealings with his people is often perplexing; and by these faith is exercised. What he is as their strength, their hope, their life, they alone can tell; and thousands have borne their glad testimony to it.

Let us be found still depending on his grace, believing in his wisdom, hoping in his mercy, and we shall be sure to end it—whether in this world or the next—praising his faithfulness.

Girls Should Learn Domestic Duties.

A mother has no right to bring up a daughter without teaching her how to keep house, and if she has an intelligent regard to her daughter's happiness, will not do it.

By knowing how to keep house, we do not mean merely knowing how books should be arranged on a centre table, and how to tell servants what is wanted to be done. We mean how to get a breakfast, a supper; how to do a thousand and one different things which are requisite to keep a home in order, and to make it pleasant.

A person who does not know how to do a thing well, does not know how to have it done well. No number of servants makes up for the want of knowledge in a mistress.

A family employed a girl to do general housework. She came just at night, and the first thing assigned her to do was to wash the supper dishes. She washed them in cold water, and without soap.

A gentleman sent home a roasting piece of beef and a quantity of cut porter-house steaks. When he sat down to dinner he found that the new cook had roasted the steaks.

Yet many a boarding-school miss at the time of her marriage, might make either of these mistakes.

Not one woman in a thousand knows how to make bread as good as it can be made. And sour tempers, scolding, dyspepsia, with its indescribable horrors, and even death itself, not unfrequently result from bad cooking.

Mothers, what ever else you may teach your daughters, do not neglect to instruct them in all the mysteries of housekeeping. So shall you put them in the way of good husbands and happy homes.

Love in the Bottom of the Cup.

There was a fine Christian philosophy in the cheerful remark of a bright young Christian on his dying bed, "When I have most pain in my body," said he, "I have the most peace in my soul. I do not doubt but that there is love in the bottom of the cup, though it is terribly bitter in the mouth." It was at the bottom of the cup that the precious blessing was disposited; and he must needs drink the whole bitter draught to reach it.

Many of the richest Christian graces lie at the bottom of the cup of trial. How patience sparkles down there amid the tears. How lustrous shine the jewels of Faith! Joy too is there—such joy as the apostle tasted in his "tribulation." Courage always shows too, the most grandly when the fight is fiercest, and when Death on his pale horse is careering down on us over a field strewn with defeat and disaster. There is a patience of hope, a peace passing all understanding, a sweet sense of the immediate presence of Jesus that can never be reached by us in a state of ease and prosperity. They lie only at the bottom of trial's bitter cup. And God esteems them of such precious value that he mingles for us the very draught in order to bring them out in their beauty and power. This cup which our Father's love compounds for us shall we not drink it?

I have found great comfort lately, when in sore trouble, in reading a short sketch of the racy talk of old "Uncle Johnson," a poverty-stricken negro, who reached over one hundred years, and was then bereaved of his wife.

"Uncle, don't you feel lonely since Ellen left you?" his minister inquired.

"Yes, massa, I feels berry lonesome. But den de blessed Jesus comes round ebery day and gives me a few drops of heaven, just as a nuss would wid a spoon; den, oh how I wants to get holt ob de whole dish! When I was so sick, de odder day, I could see de dust ob God's chariot comin' ober de mountains for me, 'Wait, old Johnson! wait—hold on a leetle longe, and I'll come round d'rectly.'

"Yes, Lord, I will hold on if de Lord please for anoder hundred years! O blessed Jesus, only keep de table standin, for me; I's bound to be dere."

Brother in sorrow, look at that solitary old saint, holding in his trembling hands a cup that has, "a few drops of heaven" in it; and never let you or me complain of any draught which infinite love may press to our lips. "Father, not as we will, but as THOU WILL"—T. L. Cuyler.

HOME SUNSHINE.—Many a child goes astray, not because there is want of prayer or virtue at home, but simply because home lacks sunshine. A child needs smiles as much as flowers need sunbeams. Children look little beyond the present moment. If a thing pleases, they are apt to seek it; if it displeases, they are prone to avoid it. If home is the place where faces are sour and words harsh, and fault-finding is ever in the ascendant, they will spend as many hours as possible else-where. Let every father and mother, then, try to be happy.

Let them talk to their children, especialy the little ones, in such a way as to make them happy.

For the COMPANION.

Avoidance.

I noticed an article in the COMPANION, present volume, No. 12, on the subject of Avoidance as recorded in 1 Cor. 5th chapter, written by brother J. L. Meyers, from Illinois; giving his views on the subject, and desiring to be corrected, it in error. I will not assume to say that the brother is in error; but will briefly submit my views for the consideration of the brethren; earuestly desiring that we might be brought to a oneness in this matter.

This subject was originated by the disorder of the Corinthians, in permitting one that had committed fornication, and such fornication as is not so much as named among the Gentiles, to associate with them. In verse 2nd, we understand that Paul was much grieved, that the Corinthians passed over this matter so lightly, instead of mourning, that he that had committed this deed might be taken away from them.

In verses 9, 10, we learn that Paul had written unto them in an epistle, "not to keep company with fornicators; yet not altogether with the fornicators of this world, or with the covetous, or with extortioners, or with idolaters; for then must ye needs go out of the world."

In the 11th verse the subject is brought to a point. It reads as follows: "But now I have written unto you not to keep company, if any man that is called a brother be a fornicator, or covetous, or an idolater, ar a railer, or a drunkard, or an extortioner; with such an one no not to eat."

By comparing verses 9, 10 and 11, I understand Paul wants the Corinthians to look upon those persons who have committed such gross sins with a degree of abhorrence; so much so, that they will put them away from them; that is, hold them no more as brethren, &c., and also not to company with them, that is, uot to associate with them; and if they will carry out the rule, I think they will not eat with them; because, if they would, they would company or associate with them. Now, this should be done from principle. The object is to destroy the flesh, that the spirit may be saved. We should ever have the love of souls at heart, and pray earnestly to God for this.

Now, to compare the two cases, I think there is a good deal of difference between a member that is disodedient, or neglects to hear the church, and one that has committed such gross sins. We can find no scripture that forbids us to associate with a heathen and publican.

Again, we notice that, in the one case, if a member offends and complies with the decision or advice of the church, it will be forgiven, and thus restored immediately; while one that has committed such gross sins, will not, in like manner, be restored immediately, but must be delivered over to Satan, for the destruction of the flesh, that the spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus.

In conclusion I would say, let us be careful that we are not puffed up, as the Corinthians were; and let us be on our guard, continually watching and praying, lest we be overcome with temptations, that we may be ready for the coming of our Lord.

An Exposition of 2 Cor. 5: 17.

"Therefore if any man be in Christ, he is a new creature; old things have passed away; behold, all things are become new."

In Christ," "in the Lord," and "in God," are phrases that occur frequently in the Bible; as, "So we, being many, are one body in Christ, and every one members, one of another," Rom. 12: 5; "For the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God; and the dead in Christ shall rise first," 1 Thess. 4: 16; "Ye know that your labor is not in vain in the Lord," 1 Cor. 15: 58; "In whom all the building, filthy framed together, groweth unto a holy temple in the Lord," Eph. 2: 21; "Paul and Silvanus, and Timotheus, unto the church of the Thessalonians which is in God the Father and in the Lord Jesus Christ," 1 Thess. 1: 1.

"In Christ" implies a very close relationship between Christ and his disciples. It also implies that, naturally, man is without Christ; but that through obedience, he may be adopted into the family of Christ: "That at that time ye were without Christ, * * * but now, in Christ, ye who were far off are made nigh by the blood of Christ." Eph. 2: 12, 13.

"Without Christ," and "far off," are phrases, that express the relation of sinners to Christ, while "In Christ," "In the Lord," and "In God," express the relation of the saints and disciples of Christ to Christ himself. Now, our text says, "If any man be in Christ, he is a new creature." Not that the physical man is renewed, or regenerated; but that he is subdued and the spiritual man now predominates, as Paul says, "That ye put of, concerning the former conversation, the old man, which is corrupt according to the deceitful lusts, and be renewed in the spirit of your minds." Eph. 4: 22, 23. "Be not conformed to this world; but be ye transformed by the renewing of your mind." Here we have it definitely expressed, that the renewing is of the mind or Spirit. Our Master said to Nicodemus, "Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God." John 3: 5.

The next clause of our text says, "Old things are passed away;" that is, "The old man."—the old relation, —"without Christ." "Far off"—have passed away—"no more strangers and foreigners, but fellow citizens with the saints and household of God." No more a "servant of sin unto death, but of obedience unto righteousness." "Behold, all things are become new." A new mind, new desires; the things, that I once hated, I now love. And the things that I once loved I now hate. New relation; instead of being without God, I am now recognized as a son of God, an heir of God, a joint heir with the Lord Jesus Christ. Christ recognizes us as brethren: "All ye are brethren," says he. "He that doeth the will of my Father which is in heaven, is my brother, and my sister, and my mother."

Now, dear reader, are you in Christ? If you are, you will rest from your labors, and your works will follow you: "Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord, from henceforth: Yea, saith the Spirit, that they rest from their labors and their works do follow them." Here we have the promise of being blessed, and that we shall henceforth rest from labor.

Paul says, "Them which sleep in Christ will God bring with him;" and that 'the dead in Christ shall rise first.'

These are exceedingly great and precious promises. Not only the work of saints will follow them; but the works of sinners will follow them also. Their neglect of the stranger, the naked, the hungry, the thirsty, the sick, and of the prisoner, will stand against them at the day of judgment, as shown in the 25th chapter of Matthew. W. R. DEETER.

DALE CITY, Pa., April 22, 1873.

Slander.

The slanderer is a monster in human form—a man or woman with the heart of a beast and the tongue of a serpent. Frequently the slanderer is a wolf in sheep's clothing; presenting a meek and friendly appearance, but having a heart filled with envy, suspicion, corruption and malice. The tongue of the slanderer is a sharp and cruel sword; wounding the heart of him who is the object of the thrust, the ears of those who hear the unwelcome sound, and, not unfrequently, the hand of him who wields it.

Brown says slander is, "to charge a man falsely with faults, or rehearsing his real faults from a bad motive, and without a legal requisition. It is most ordinarily done when the persons charged are absent, and proceeds from hatred of their person, or envy of their excellencies. The name slanderer is the same in Greek as that of devil. (1 Tim. iii. 11. Gr.) Yet what multitudes of men seem ambitious of the character! Meals and civil fellowship, are seasoned with slander; as if men had received the gift of speech for no other end but to speak evil of their neighbors."

The tongue of the slanderer, in the light of God's word, "is a fire—a world of iniquity; * * * * it defileth the whole body, and setteth on fire the course of nature, and it is set on fire of hell; * * * it is an unruly evil full of deadly poison." The slanderer's tongue blesses God, and curses men, who are made after the similitude of God. James says, "This wisdom decendeth not from above, but is earthly, sensual, devilish;" hence the same name is used in the Greek for slanderer and devil.

The Psalmist, in speaking of a slanderer says, "The words of his mouth were smoother than butter, but war was in his heart; his words were softer than oil, yet were they drawn swords." "My soul is among lions; and I lie even among them that are set on fire, even the sons of men, whose teeth are spears and arrows, and their tongue a sharp sword." "They only consult to cast (a man) down from his excellency; they delight in lies; they bless with their mouths, but they curse inwardly." "They encourage themselves in an evil matter; they commune of laying snares privily; they say, "Who shall see them?" They search out iniquities, they accomplish a diligent search: both the inward thought of every one of them, and the heart is very deep. But God shall shoot at them with an arrow; suddenly shall they be wounded. So they shall make their own tongue to fall upon themselves." Such characters must inevitably make themselves repugnant in the eyes of the good, as they are already an abomination in the sight of God, and under the penalty of his law; for he saith, "Whoso privily slandereth his neighbor, him will I cut off." Ps. 101: 5.

Slanderers trample upon the character of others, and scatter their reputation to the four winds. Their polluted tongue is a very upas of death, full of deadly poison. They destroy the peace of happy families, quiet neighborhoods, and civil communities. They make inroads even into churches, and, by their influence, they make fearful havoc of the life and power of religion, and abuse and crush down those whom they call brethren. They are gnawing worms in the bowels of society; devouring its vitals, and destroying its best interests. They are like hidden rocks in the ocean, endangering the characters and lives of those who come nigh them. They betray their friends with a smile and a shake of the hand, and their brethren with a kiss. Their hearts are a slough of corruption, licentiousness, suspicion, and envy; and their mouths are open craters, spewing out, like a flood, the inner corruption, and desolating everything in its course.

He is indeed unfortunate who becomes an object of slander. Devouring flames may be quenched, and destroying floods turned aside, but who can quench the fire or turn aside the flood of slander? The most powerful and ferocious beasts may be met, baffled, conquered, subdued, tamed; "but the tongue can no man tame, it is an unruly evil." Wild, strong, vicious, cruel tongue of the backbiter, or slanderer, no man, against whom thou hast arrayed thyself, can tame thee; but we are glad that the man or woman in whose mouth thou art, can control thee, and God, by the power of his word and influence of his Spirit can subdue and tame thee; changing the heart of the slanderer, and putting a new song into his mouth, the accents of praise upon his tongue.

Railroad Privileges.

So far as the Pennsylvania Railroads are concerned, the brethren who contemplate attending the next Annual Meeting, may rely upon excursion rates. To the Pennsylvania Central, and its Branches, and the Pittsburg, Washington & Baltimore, and its Branches, we will attend ourself, and announce the arrangement in good time. Be this understood, however, that we will apply only for twenty days, from the 20th of May to the tenth of June.

If the persons appointed to confer with the Pittsburg, Ft. Wayne and Chicago Company, have made application without success, we should be pleased to learn the fact at once.

The Usual Invitation.

In nearly every announcemsnt of a lovefeast that is sent us we find someting like the following, "A hearty invitation is extended to all, and especially ministering brethren," or, "The usual invitation is extended." Hereafter we shall strike out all such invitations, in order to save space for something more edifying. The fact that a meeting is announced through the COMPANION, is invitation enough. The announcement says, "We want our brethren and sisters to know the time and place of our meeting; and we wish them to know it, to show that we invite and welcome them to attend."

How to Cure a Cold.

In our last issue, there appeared a short article under the above heading. It contains in it a good lesson, if our readers only have patience and forbearance enough to learn it; but it was intended for the Dale City RECORD, and not for the COMPANION. However, since it appeared in the C. F. C., we wish our readers to make the best use of it. It will answer very well to illustrate how we may, through want of proper care, allow our secular affairs to interfere with our religious duties. J. W. B.

Brother Noah B. Blough visited our office last week, while on his way to friends in this county. Brother B. has had very severe affliction the past winter, having lost, by death, his wife and two of his children. His address will hereafter be New Enterprise, Bedford county, instead of St. Clairsville.

Books.

We are out of Turkey Morocco Hymn Books, and our orders are not all filled. Those who have ordered that style of binding, will please be patient until we can get on a fresh supply.

We wish our patrons and readers to bear in mind that new subscribers are always in order. A few hundred at the present time, with cash in advance, would be very acceptable. For one dollar we will send the balance of the year, and a bundle of back numbers, almost complete since January.

The Way to the Next Annual Meeting.

For the satisfaction of all persons who wish to attend the Annual Meeting at this place, we offer this explanation:—Those coming from the West will take the Pittsburgh, Baltimore & Washington Railway at Pittsburgh, which will deliver them at Dale City. We expect to make arrangements for special trains on Saturday and Monday evenings, likely not to leave Pittsburgh later than 3 o'clock.—Brethren should aim to be at Pittsburgh at noon on those two days. The regular trains leave Pittsburgh at 6 in the morning. All west of Johnstown, Pa., should go to Pittsburgh, or they may stop off at Brinton Station, P. R. R., and walk one-half mile to Port Perry, P. W. & B. R. R. But we think they will be safest by going to Pittsburgh, which is eleven miles farther. We tried the Port Perry arrangement once, and we have regretted it often.

All east of Altoona, along the P. R. P. should go to Huntingdon, and there to the Huntingdon & Broad Top R. R., by way of Mt. Dallas and Bedford to Bridgeport, which is again on the Pittsburgh, Washington & Baltimore Railroad. From thence we also expect to have special trains to connect from Cumberland, on Saturday and Monday evenings, say 5 o'clock. Those coming from the South and Southeast, will aim for Cumberland, Md., where our Pittsburgh, Washington & Baltimore connects with the Baltimore & Ohio R. R.

The Union depot and the depot on our road are about three-fourths of a mile apart; but the way is easily found. Ask for the Connellsville depot.

We will also endeavor to have special trains, or at least special cars, from Harrisburg to Bridgeport on Saturday and Monday.

Middle Penn'a. District Meeting.

The next meeting of the Middle District of Penn'a will be held at Clover Creek, Blair county. The best Railroad connection by railroad is by way of Altoona, to Martinsburg, which is two miles from the place of meeting. Another route is by way of Huntingdon & Broad Top R. R. (changing cars at Huntingdon) and stopping off at Cove Station, from whence it will be five miles across a high, rough mountain. The latter route is the shortest and cheapest by about one dollar and a half.

The brethren at Clover Creek are anxious to have the services of ministering brethren over Lord's Day, and would like to know on whom they may depend. Those who are willing to labor for them will please address brother John W. Brumbaugh Clover Creek, Blair county, Pa. The meeting will be held on the 13th of May. We hope to attend it.

Elders John W. Brumbaugh and Tobias Blough were with us several days, during the past week. They and Elder John Wise had been called as a committee, to assist in adjusting difficulties in the church. Brother Wise failed, on account of the sickness of his wife. The mission of the Brethren was a success, and everything seems to be in good order.

BROTHER HOLSINGER:

By these few lines I will inform you that the friends and brethren are well as far as known to us in this part of God's moral heritage. The churches in this far western part of Kansas are in a flourishing condition. The brethren here are talking of the matter of building a large meeting-house, here in Douglas county. There are so many different reports gone to the east in regard to this country, that an eastern man does not know what to think of this country. I will give you a few facts in my weakness, as I have been here fifteen years, I have had a good chance to know. It is very true that when we first settled here, there were no buildings, no fences and no timber on the up-lands; and it was windy and dry: but it is different at this time. Now we have fruit trees, with abundance of fruit, fences, buildings: and less wind and more regular summer showers.

HOMES may be obtained at fair prices.

District Meeting of North-Western Ohio.

The Brethren in north-western Ohio, will hold their District council on the 23rd day of May, at the house of John Brillhart, in Crawford county, Ohio. We intend, if God willing, to hold a love-feast on the 24th of May, at the same place. An invitation is given to all those that wish to be with us. The Railroad station will be Bloomville, on the Mansfield & Cold Water, Michigan Railroad. JOHN BRILLHART.

Rail Road Privileges.

BROTHER HENRY: As we have made an amendment on our Railroad arrangements will you please publish it again?

I will state as before, arrangements have been made from Chicago to Pittsburg, on the Panhandle Road, for the Brethren going to the Annual Meeting, to be held in Dale City, Pa, June next, on the following terms:

Those going to the said place, shall be in Chicago, Ill., Thursday morning, May 29th; those at Logansport, Ind., Thursday evening, May, 29th; Richmond, Ind., May 30th, 3 o'clock, A. M.; and Piqua, O., May 30th, at 7 o'clock, A. M. Remember, club together. Clubs of 20 to 29 will pass for 5 cents a mile; from 30 to 39, for 4½; and from 40 and upwards, for 4 cents, and return free. Those being of either of those numbers will call for their free return tickets at either of those four named places. Tickets good for 30 days.

You will notice the amendment at Logansport, Ind.

JOHN BEECHLY.

Notice.

Will our dear ministering brethren, who expect to attend the District Meeting here with us, next May, be so kind as to favor us with their names and intentions of coming. We desire this favor from the fact that several posts are being sought for preaching. For these points we want working men, and we can hardly make appointments without the assurance of the persons to fill them. Write to me at once, brethren, and let the "Sower" sow good seed.

J. G. GLOCK.

There will be a communion meeting held on the fifteenth of May, six miles west of Dayton, Ohio, known as "Bowman's District."

H. H. MARTIN.

The brethren of Sandy Creek congregation, Preston Co., W. Va., have appointed their lovefeast on the 24th of May next. It will be held in Salem meeting house, commencing at 2 o'clock P. M. Those coming from the West, will stop off at Falls City, on the P. W. & B. R. R., which is 13 miles from place of meeting. Please give notice, by letter, to the undersigned, at Shinbone, Fayette Co., Pa., of the time and number, that the necessary conveyance may be at the station at the proper time.

M. J. THOMAS.

The District Meeting of the Middle District of Iowa, will be held in the Brethren's Meeting-house in Dallas Co., on the 19th of May. A general invitation is extended to all. We hope to have a good representation.

Change of Address.

Brother Conrad Kabler has changed his address from Bolivar, Ohio, to Canton, Ohio, box 361.

BROTHER H.:

By your permission, I would inform the readers of the C. F. C., that, on the night of the 14th of March, a fire broke out about three miles from our settlement. It was the stormiest night that we had since we are in Kansas. The fire burnt nearly as rapidly as a horse could run. It burnt brother Levi Himes' stable, his two horses, all his harness, his hogs, and a great many posts and other things. Two of his sons-in-law had their stables burnt. One of them is a brother, by the name of Michael Zeigler. He had also one hog burnt and a good deal of other loss. There were five horses burnt, and a stable, for one of our neighbors.

Now brother Levi Himes needs help, as he had given all his money to build houses for his sons-in-law, and now he cannot get a team without help. We are few in number here but will do all we can. I know he would be ve very thankful, if he could only get enough to buy two horses again. If any of the brethren wish to give, send it to Levi Himes, Bunkerhill, Russell Co., Kansas.

I would inform the brethren that we are still trying to bear the cross; and believe that God is with his children everywhere. I believe it was alone through his mercies that our houses and we were not burnt; as the fire blew about four hundred yards. If any of the brethren want to come west, we think they would do well by coming and seeing our country.

W. B. HIMES.

Brethren's Map of Pennsylvania.

Brother Holsinger: I have been thinking about a subject which I will propose to you, it is namely a Brethren's Map of Pennsylvania. It seems to me it would be a satisfaction to many brethren, and even to the world, to have a map of Pennsylvania, in every way carefully drafted with each county drafted correctly and colored differently, with all the water courses, mountains, &c., as correct as could be. With all the railroads, cities, towns, villages and post offices so far as practical. In every way a complete map; with this distinction that the names of the churches be on, and a sign or emblem be located on the map as near the place as can be. I may be wrong, but it seems to me there would be considerable demand for such a map, both in the church and in the world. I do not mean a large map to hang on the wall, but a paper, pocket map. Or is there such a map in publication with the exception of this last feature of the churches? This peculiarity of the churches, being named and located on the map, would not injure its usefulness to the world, and to the brethren it would often be of use, especially to preachers in travelling. What is your opinion about it? Or is there such a map in publication? Let us hear.

James Y. Heckler.

Harleysville, Pa.

Dear Brother: As I am alone this Sabbath evening with my little children, my mind was set to wandering, and thinking about a little passage of scripture reading thus, "Except ye become converted and become as little children, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven." What a solemn thought! When we watch our little child of three or four months old, and see how innocent and harmless it is, we think to ourselves, "Oh, if we were just as good as this little child, how happy we would be." I have heard some wish that they could have died when little children. I can not say whether this is right or not; but we are certain if we had been called home when little, we would have had no trouble whatever. What a dreadful thought it is to think of death. For the past year it has been almost daily to us to hear of sickness and death in the neighborhood and vicinity. More deeply does it press our minds when death knocks at our own door, and takes from us a darling little boy. I often think if I could only go and stand at little Sily's side, I would not fear the monster death to come. All the comforts and pleasures that can be bestowed upon us here, will profit us nothing; for we are only lent beings, in this world; and the better use we can make of our lent lives, while here on earth, the better it will be for us in our future coming days. What a day of fear and trembling will it be on the morning of the great resurrection, when we all, both great and small, will have to come forth, and give account of our past and present sinfulness. I fear, dear brethren and sisters, that we are few that can say that we have lived a true and christian life as we should live. But if we try to still live nearer the word as we read and understand it we can then say that we have a brighter hope beyond the tomb, a hope that all shall meet on that beautiful shore in the sweet by and by.

Hannah J. Johnson.

Brother H.:

Thinking that a little news from our arm of the church would be acceptable, I send you the following:

In regard to the church, we are in tolerable circumstances; as I find, we all have some cloudy weather. We have been made to rejoice during our series of meetings. Brother Henry Davy preached from the 13th to 16th of March, at the Beech Grove meeting house, six sermons, from the evening of the 16 to the evening of the 18th, five sermons, at the Stony Creek meeting house. Excellent order all the time. The word was delivered with power; many feasting on the word, feeling a desire to seek their Savior, but, like the king, almost, not altogether, persuaded. There were two made to feel their duty; and like obedient children, went down into the liquid stream, according to the example of our Master. May they prove faithful in obeying that form of doctrine which was once delivered unto the saints. As we have had good lessons taught us by our worthy brother, it would be well for us, to be doers of the word and not hearers only. May the blessings of the Lord rest and abide with those that obey from the heart. And may the brotherhood remember us at a throne of grace, that we may all prove faithful to the end of the race.

Yours in the bonds of the Gospel.

S. H. Caylor.

Noblesville, Ind.

Brother H.: I thought it my duty to give you a short sketch of Southern Kansas; that is, Crawford and Cherokee counties, which were in dispute with the settlers and railroad company. The railroad Co. has gained the land. The soil is good, and the chances to get farms are better; because the land or prairie is broken and in good cultivation, and there are some good houses, which can be had at low prices—from one to five hundred dollars. There are good young orchards, bearing peach trees. The land is priced at from 5 to ten dollars per acre, from five to ten years to pay it in. There are hundreds of such chances. I am speaking of land under cultivation. The generality of these settlers are poor. They want to go farther West. As they were defeated in their land, they say they will not pay the railroad company. They would sooner take what they can get for their claims and leave.

Water, wood, and coal are good and plenty in this country.

There are six members here. Our desire is for brethren and sisters, and especially ministering brethren, to come here and form a church. We have a good any healthy country here. For farther information address the writer at Mulberry Grove, Crawford Co., Kansas.

J. F. Dale.

Why is It?

Brother Eby, in C. F. C., No. 14, you say, "In a mission of love through Iowa, nearly all the sisters came to the house of worship without the proper covering on their heads." You farther say, you "intend to give this subject farther notice, and perhaps associate with it the duty of Elders."

I am not acquainted with the custom in Iowa, for women to cover their heads; but those who profess to be members of Christ's body, I should think, would wear a neat modest covering, and as long as a woman's head dress is that, I would consider her strictly in order, and her covering proper.

Now, brother Eby, I have given you my opinion about the proper covering: and, if you please, I would like to hear what you style a proper covering for a woman's head, and where you got the PATTERN.

BROTHER H. R. HOLSINGER:

On the 23rd day of Feb., we held the first meeting ever was held in Dixon. The appointment was filled by brethren Trostell and Lehman. The day being very cold we did not have many people. The sermon was very acceptable to the people, as far as I have heard. Another appointment was made for the 23rd of March which was filled by brethren Lehman and Raffensparger. The day was pleasant. We had quite an audience, but as it was not generally known among the people we did not have the house crowded. As far as I have heard, the people were well pleased with the sermon.

Another appointment is made for the 20th of April. Hope and believe that we will have a full house. In the morning before our last meeting I walked out to invite the people to our meeting. I met an old man and invited him. His reply was, "I would like to come but my clothes are not good enough to go to Dixon churches." After a little talk he promised to come, and did come. Others said they have no plug hats and they can't go. After some conversation, they promised to come, and did come, and are well pleased. Some say that they are willing to give to a church; but they do not want to be dogged to death for money. I shall give to such a full explanation. Others make different excuses; but I know that they would sooner be in the whiskey saloon or tobacco house than in the church. I will probably give you my experience on whiskey and tobacco some other time.

Yours in love.

JOHN HIPPLE.

Lovefeast.

The brethren of Shipswanee branch, intend, the Lord willing, to hold a communion meeting on the 12th day of June, commencing at ten o'clock, A. M. The meeting to be held at the house of brother Jonas Kauffman, about two miles south-west of the town of Lagrange. Those coming by railroad will stop off at Lagrange, and will be met with private conveyance one day before the meeting, by giving timely notice to brother Henry Gephart or Jonas Kauffman. Address Lagrange, Ind.

Sudden Changes.

Dear sister Rachel: We have to exclaim, what sudden changes! It has not been long since you visited us in seemingly good health, and, in so short a time, we hear the sad news that affliction has thrown his unwelcome arms around you, and in consequence thereof you have called the physician who will of course administer unpleasant doses. On hearing the above, we desired at once to visit you, but were unavoidably prohibited, on account of the inclement weather; therefore we could not comfort you face to face; then I desired thus to do so, for I think I know the priceless value of comfort in the hour of affliction. Even though the comfort may emanate from a very weak source, it always has a soothing influence, as well as a salutary effect. We do hope that you are not discouraged. Remember this lovely verse, that has so often cheered your elder sister:

"Affliction is a stormy deep
Where wave resounds to wave;
Though o'er our heads the billows roll,
We know the Lord can save."

We hope you will cast your eyes upward and listen to those uplifting billows; for they are full of rich consolation. And, dear sister, keep the Testament close by you in affliction, as well as in health, and neglect not to partake of its fatness. It contains much more encouragement than all your sisters can give you. It contains a sweet and pleasant, as well as, an inexhaustible virtue which flows direct from our good Father to us his children, and none can prohibit you from supping of this essence as often as you wish; and you are safe in sipping thereof. It is heavenly; therefore it is pure, and it will make you pure if you partake of it; and it is good; therefore it will make you holy. You may not only partake of it, but you may partake of it largely, and more largely, and continue so to do throughout all endless ages; for it emanates directly from a never-failing, ever-overflowing spring of pure love; and at the head of this spring is seated our good Father of love and mercy.

O sister, what rich encouragement! Lift up your head, take comfort, and hope for better days. As day appears more bright and clear after a dark and blustery night, so it proves in affliction; after its dark and gloomy shade is past, and health takes its place, everything seems so lovely and bright. Truly, after we have been afflicted, we know how to welcome the return of health. Then we know how to appreciate and value the richest of all earthly blessings. So be encouraged, and think of the brighter days that we hope for in the future. The Lord is our friend and helper in time of need; and he is strong, and therefore can make the weak strong. Sisterly love is what prompts me to address you. Please receive it in love.

Your unworthy sister.

REBECCA SNAVELY.

From Blairstown, Iowa.

DEAR BROTHER:

I have been a reader of the C. F. C. for some time. I see more or less said about tobacco, by some of the brethren; and I don't see any portion of the scriptures referred to, so that I could see whether they correspond or not. So I thought that I would like to know where they get so much to say about that one thing. I would like to know who created that plant—whether it was the devil or our heavenly Father; and if it was the Lord, why should man accuse it so; for we read in the scriptures, that after our heavenly Father had created all things, he saw them all, and he called them all good, and very good. Now dear brethren, can any of you prove by the Bible that man will be debarred from heaven for using tobacco?

Another question: Which is doing the greater evil, using tobacco or following the foolish fashions of the world in dress? Will some brother prove by the Bible which is the greater sin? I have written this in love and for instruction.

From Labette Co., Kansas. Mar. 25th, 1873.

Dear Brother:

In the bonds of love, and fellowship in the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ, I have been requested by the friends of the deceased persons mentioned in this communication, to write to you, and I will try to comply with their wishes.

On Friday night last, as I was just retiring to rest at a late hour, brother John Iler, of Neosho county, come to my house, with a request from brother George L. Smith, of same Co., to come and preach the funeral of his little girl, who had died the same day of spotted fever. The request was for two o'clock of Saturday. So, early in the morning, I arose and started on my journey, accompanied by my two little children. My dear wife having been called away from earth on the 18th day of January. I and my two children live alone. We reached brother John Iler's, where we were joined by brother Joseph Garber. We reached the place of meeting in due time, and found brother Smith's little boy, the only one left, (his wife also died last fall,) lying very low with the same complaint; having been attacked at four o'clock the same morning. We began our meeting alone, as our other ministering brethren were absent. Read and spoke from the 15th chapter of Paul's first letter to the Corinthians; but was but half through when brother Garber informed me that the little boy was dying and the services were closed with the Lord's prayer. After some time the child revived somewhat, and brother Garber and I started on our return to his house, as his son-in-law, who lived near by, was lying it was thought, near unto death. When about half way, we were met by a messenger from the dying man, requesting my presence at the earliest possible moment, so we hurried on, reached the place, found him sinking from pneumonia, surrounded by numerous friends and relations, who deeply sympathized with his distress both of body, and mind. When I asked him for what purpose he had sent for me, he said that he was afraid that he would never recover, and that he did not want to die without preparation by being obedient unto the law of the Lord, and that he wished to be baptized that very night. It was dark, and the wind blew fiercely over the naked prairie, and we had no lamps, so I explained to him how, sometimes, in extreme cases of sickness, the brotherhood would receive members by hand and kiss, and if they received that, they were to be baptized afterward; but that I would not refuse to comply with his request if he was not satisfied. But he made a full confession of his faith, and insisted on being baptized. So a fire was built on the margin of the stream and the dying man was hauled to the spot and gladly received the remission of his sins in obedience to the Lord's command, and was hauled again to his residence, rejoicing in hopes of that crown of life and glorious immortality that is prepared for all those that love and obey God. His faith was exceeding strong, and he was perfectly resigned, and tried by every means he could to console his weeping wife and sorrowing friends. He called the doctor to his side and asked him how long that it would take for him to die. He was told that it would be perhaps six hours. He said that he wanted to be buried in the Brethren's grave-yard and that I should preach his funeral. He finally expired at about 7 o'clock, and his soul we believe is safely at rest in Abraham's bosom, which is a great and enduring consolation to his poor wife, who deeply feels his loss. He leaves an infant boy an orphan. According to his request, at about two o'clock I tried to preach to a house full of friends and brethren, also from 1 Cor. 15th chapter. I tried to speak of the creation and fall of man, his degradation and sin, the promise and coming of Christ, of justification by faith in the word of the Lord, of the death and resurrection of Christ the first-fruits of them that slept, of the second advent of Christ, and the great day of general judgment. We do hope that the circumstances that have so afflicted our friends, shall be over ruled for good, for there was a great inquiry after truth, when the meeting was over. The manner of his death, and his great faith, and perfect resignation, have deeply moved many of his friends; and we hope that, like Samson he has proved himself mighty in the pulling down of the strongholds of the enemies of the Lord. His name was Perry H. Templeton; was about 35 years of age. Brother Smith's little girl was 2 years 10 months and 13 days old. His little boy was still living, on Monday at noon, but not expected to recover; but the Lord giveth and the Lord taketh away; blessed be the name of the Lord!

DIED.

We admit no poetry under any circumstances in connection with Obituary Notices. We wish to use all alike, and we could not insert verses with all.

Sister CATHARINE SPRANKLE wife of Michael Sprankle, born June 17th 1791, died Feb. 22d, 1873. Her maiden name was Puterbaugh. She was married Aug. 4th, 1812, united with the Church in 1813, and was a consistent member until her death. The occasion was improved by the Brethren, from Rev. 14: 13.

A. B. Lichtenwalter.

In the Pine Creek congregation, Ogle county, Ill., March 22d, Elder DAVID MILLER, aged 50 years and 4 days. He was sick but nine days. He said he had his trust in the Lord, and appeared willing to leave this world. Oh, what a happy thought!

Bro. Miller came to Ills. in 1867; lived formerly in Washington county, Maryland, in the Broad Fording congregation, where he had been a minister for some years. Funeral services by Elder Jacob Hauger and others, from latter clause of the 10th verse of the 23d chapter of Numbers.

In the George's Creek congregation, March 26th, sister SUSAN MOSER, wife of brother Daniel Moser, aged 85 years, 5 months and 10 days.

Our sister attained unto a good age.—She lived in holy matrimony, with her now aged and bereft husband, over sixty years, was a consistent member of the Church for over fifty years, and it may be truly said she has done her work well, and is now gone into a better world, to reap a rich reward in glorified rest. The Lord granted her request to depart without putting any one to afflictive trouble. She loved the Lord, her Savior, by loving the people of his choice, and often had sweet communion around the Lord's table. She leaves a loving husband, 3 children, grandchildren, and many brethren, and friends to mourn her loss; yet this loss is her infinite gain. Funeral occasion improved by Bro. David Younce and the writer, from Phillipians 1: 21.

JOS. P. COVER.

Near StClairsville, Bedford county, Pa., March 6th, ROSANNA BLOUGH, wife of brother Noah B Blough, aged 38 years and 22 days. (See C. F. C. No. 13, page 206) Disease cancer.

Also March 12th, EMMA S. BLOUGH, aged 8 years 10 months and 28 days.

Also, March 17th, JEFFERSON F. BLOUGH, aged 14 years 8 months and 2 days. Disease diptheria.

We see in less than two weeks, brother Blough was deprived of the happy enjoyment that once existed here on earth. True, they are gone to that land from which no traveller returns. Brother B. is left with five surviving children, and many friends to mourn his loss. We fondly hope, however the loss so deeply felt here is the departed one's great gain. Funeral occasion improved by the writer. Assisted by J. H. Zinn, Lutheran pastor, from Hebrews 4: 9.

S. A. MOORE.

Near New Enterprise, Pa., March 20th, PHEBE FRIEND, aged 57 years 6 months and 5 days. Funeral occasion improved by D. C. Long (seventh day Baptist minister) and the writer, from John 12: 46.

The Christian Family Companion. Is published every Tuesday, at $1.50 a year, by Henry R. Holsinger, who is a member of the Church of the Brethren, sometimes known by the name of "German Baptists," and vulgarly or maliciously called "Dunkards."

The design of the work is to advocate truth, expose error, and encourage the true Christian on his way to Zion.

It assumes that the New Testament is the Will of God, and that no one can have the promise of salvation without observing all its requirements, that among these are Faith, Repentance, Prayer, Baptism by trine immersion, Feet Washing, the Lord's Supper, the Holy Communion, Charity, Nonconformity to the world, and a full resignation to the whole will of God, as he has revealed it through his Son Jesus Christ.

So much of the affairs of this world as may be thought necessary to the proper observance of the signs of the times, or such as may tend to the moral, mental, or physical benefit of the Christian will be published, thus removing all occasion for coming into contact with the so-called Literary or Political journals.

Subscriptions may begin at any time.

The Battle of Life. Gal, 6 : 1.

When in retrospect before us,
We survey the acts of life,
In the changes, that come o'er us,
Are we victors in the strife?

We should all be up and doing,
Bravely battling for the right;
Heaven revering, truth pursuing,
We will surely win the fight.

Some have friends and faithful teachers,
Who have early taught them truth;
Strictly guarded all their footsteps,
In the slippery paths of youth.

Taught them early to love virtue,
Shun the haunts of guilt and shame;
Told them all about the Savior;
Taught them to revere his name.

Some, again, our fellow-mortals,
Who have not so favored been;
No dear parents, no kind teacher,
To protect their lives from sin.

In the paths of vice and folly,
Unrestrained, their footsteps go;
Satan and his lewd employees,
Lure them on to endless woe.

Shall we too, as emissaries
Of Apollyon and his band,
Help to cast them down when falling,
Never lend a helping hand?

No, 'tis right to raise the fallen,
Cheer the faint, support the weak;
Gently chide, and truly teach them,
When and how true joys to seek.

We should strive, with all our powers,
To befriend our mortal man;
Thereby imitate our Master,
Who laid down the gospel plan.

If we turn a careless sinner
From the error of his ways,
Many sins will then be hidden,
Blest by special acts of grace.

Man but Dust.

When I consider God's omnipresence, and how incomprehensible he is, in all his ways, full of wisdom—his understanding past finding out, it speaks to me, "Let every mouth be still, and every ear hearken, when God speaketh; for who knoweth the will of the Lord, but the Son, who declared, "No one knoweth the Father but the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son will reveal him."

What is man but dust? Man of himself is not wise in God's knowledge, and knoweth not what the will of God is, much less God's design. God's design always was a mystery. Heathens failed to find out the existence of an Omnipotent God, who is beyond human comprehension, and with all their rudiments, became fools. They had not the spirit of Christ, that they might believe God through Christ; and they spake evil of those things which they knew not, but what they know naturally as brute beasts. These became wise in their own conceit, and even denied the Lord of glory. They no longer had pleasure in the way of God, but stumbled at his word. Oh, pitiful man! how canst thou rebel against our God, the Maker of our souls? How canst thou resist God's law, which declares and manifests the power of God? Man is but mortal, the soul immortal; the body is but the tenement of the soul.

In proof that man is but dust, see Jesus' walking on the sea. That moment was a trying hour for Peter, to try his faith, when he plunged into the deep ocean. He soon became alarmed, cried out, "Lord Jesus, help me!" Peter was but a mortal; Jesus, the almighty power and wisdom of God, omnipresent, saves Peter from the watery grave. Oh, man! thou canst not exalt thyself above God; therefore, humble thyself, repent of thy ways, make confession before God and many witnesses, do God's commandments, that you may, at the last day, be received up into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Savior, Jesus Christ.

Again, man is but dust, yet God was mindful of his creature. Oh, thou frail man! who has made you thus frail?—Did God design to make and have you so? To injure his creature, man, would not be wisdom of an allwise being. Consider man's noble principles, his wonderful endowments, and the power of intellect, that enables him to find out what the will of the Lord was at the time of man's formation, when God had pronounced all things good, and conducted Adam and Eve into the garden of Eden. "And there was the tree of knowledge of good and evil." Here, I suppose, was the first sermon that was ever preached to man. And what did God tell Adam?—Did God say, "Adam, do as you will?" No, that was not it; the will of God must be done; and in the beginning God taught Adam and Eve that they shall not eat of the tree which was in the midst of the garden, lest they die. Thus God strictly charged them not even to touch, under the penalty of incurring his displeasure, and thereby entailing upon themselves, and their deseendants, mortality, disease, and death. With this small restraint, God left them in the garden of Eden. Thus fixed in the most beautiful situation, possessed of innocence, devoid of guilt.

"Perfection crowned with wondrous frame;
And peace and plenty smiled around;
They felt no grief, they knew no shame,
But tasted heaven on earthly ground.

Then Adam was blessed, just as God would have us all to be, with perfection, noble principles, happiness, and divine love. God designed that man, which he created for his noble purpose, should be blessed with a noble abode, or a blessed state of rest. Even when Adam fell from his happy state of things, God opened a way whereby the human family could be restored, and saved from this lost state. Here was, I suppose, the first of the devil's delusive narrations given; when he approached Eve in the form of a serpent, determined to allure them from their innocence, and stimulate them to the crime of disobedience, he persuaded Eve to taste of the prohibited tree of knowledge, telling her that by so doing, both herself and her husband would be sensible—be as gods—knowing good and evil." Alas the woman transgressed the will of God.

She plucked, she ate;
Earth felt the wound, and nature from her seat,
Sighing through all her works, gave sign of woe.
That all was lost."

Thus by this original disobedience fell our first parents, who, from the happiest condition that can be conceived, plunged themselves into a state of wretchedness, and thereby entailed misery on their deseendants. Thus the deceiver has brought the human family into a lost condition, made all miserable, frail, and weak. Oh, sinful man, sinful reader, consider thy fallen state—how thou hast gone in the way of sin! Remember the enemy of souls, how he has deceived our first parents, how frail he has made us, and deceived us with his infamous ways. The wicked deceiver is still going about, alluring mankind with his spiritual abominations; even holding nations in the bondage of sin. "Behold the abominations, which make desolate. Who shall be able to stand?" is the Revelator's voice.

Again, Oh, frail man, with thy heart so weak, the conscience so faint, and thy understanding so gloomed with the love of this world's goods, how thou hast weakened thy intellect! What wilt thou do to be saved? Sin lieth at the door of thy heart; redemption is nigh thee; come out from the world and be saved, is your Maker's call. Salvation is now offered through the atoning blood of King Emmanuel, is preached to all the world; the nations are baptized with the outpouring of God's blessing, such as the world never witnessed in all ages before. The voice of our Redeemer is heard on the mountains; the voice says, "Come out from the world, and be a people of the Lord; a chosen people, which the world cannot gainsay." It is the voice of the Church to sinful man to "repent and be baptized, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost," and to observe all things whatsoever Jesus commands us to do, in order to obtain eternal life.

Dear reader, the Bible is plain, if you can but understand language; the terms are easy, only humble thyself under the Almighty hand. Don't think to say God is not mindful of you. Remember he will have you to obey his commandments.

Set Your Affections.

BY L. L. TOMBAUGH.

"Set your affections on things above, not on things on the earth." Col. 3 : 2.

The above is an admonition from the apostle Paul, to the brethren at Colosse, but which we, in the present age of the world, should heed as much as those who were particularly addressed at that time. "All scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction," &c., and should be received by us with the same degree of thankfulness, humility, reverence, and earnest desire, to obey from the heart, that we may please God, as did those who lived contemporary with Christ and his apostles, and therefore secure the salvation of our never dying souls; stand acquitted at the tribunal bar of God; become members of the church triumphant in heaven, and live and reign with Christ forever and ever. But in looking at the subject we have under consideration with a serious desire of doing our duty, we are made to exclaim how few of us are obeying with all our heart, that divine injunction. Oh, how few of us live and act, each day of our lives, with that earnestness and zeal which would characterize the followers of the meek and lowly lamb of God, and cause all who see us to feel that, of a truth, we are more concerned about the things that make for our peace than we are about the perishable things of this world, which perish with the using of them! Is our conversation such as to show to the world that we are setting our affections on things above? Is our first waking thought a prayer of thankfulness to God for his mercy toward us? Are we more afraid of spiritual declension than we are of the losses and crosses of this life? Alas! I am afraid we are often derelict in duty, and not prepared to sing that sweet song of Alice Cary:

A sweetly solemn thought,
Comes to me o'er and o'er:
To-day I'm nearer to my home
Than e'er I've been before.

A Happy Home.

What a pity it is that good people should not consider it part and parcel of their goodness to make integrity of life and purpose lovely! Many persons seem to think that a severe mien and an ascetic life are the best safeguard's of society. We wish that these well-meaning people would pause to think how much is contained in the little phrase—a happy home! What a blessing such homes are to young people, who turn to brightness as naturally and properly as the flowers to the warm sunshine. Make your homes dull and unsympathetic, and you may know without asking why those truant feet walk in forbidden paths. Cheerfulness they crave, and will have, with, or without you. Which shall it be?

For their sakes—your sons and daughters,
Ever present,
Looking up to you, their parents,
Make home pleasant.

Let them have no cause to wander,
Nor to linger
Where sin beckons with her ready,
Tempting finger.

The Shepherd Boy.

BY J. E. BENDALL.

Upon a mountain height I stood
Just at the close of day,
When, wrapt in soft blue mist, the hills,
In shadow round me lay;
And, from the village far beneath,
Up on the evening air,
Floated with sweetly solemn sound,
The bell of vesper prayer.

Nature was hushed to holy calm,
Circled in silent rest;
The flowers with folded leaves, and birds
Sheltering in leafy nest.
The sky above me arching spread
Like some cathedral dome,
With western window letting in Light from the angels' home.

Then, gazing on the lovely scene,
I suddenly espied
A shepherd boy, not far from me,
Upon the mountain side.
Amid his flocks, upon the grass,
He knelt, with simple grace,
With reverent air, and folded hands,
Upraised to heaven his face.

His lips they moved, I caught the sound,
All was so very still;
For waiting silence seemed to reign,
O'er every vale and hill.
How fraught with reverence were his tones
I shall not soon forget;
But what he said, to my surprise,
Was but his alphabet!

Then, drawing near, I said, "Dear child.
Now why upon your knee
Do you so earnestly repeat
Aloud your A B C?"
Startled, he turned, and then he spoke—
"They pray to God down there,
And, though I cannot be in church,
I still would join in prayer."

"But, why repeat your alphabet,
Now tell me, little lad."
At this he looked me in the face,
Half serious and half sad.
Said he, "I cannot say a prayer,
To school I do not go,
And no one teaches me to pray,
And so no words I know;

But I have heard that God is good,
So very great and wise;
That he made all on earth, and lives
And rules beyond the skies.
They say, too, God is very kind,
And so I think that he
Will hear, and make himself a prayer
Out of my A B C.

Judge Not.

"But why dost thou judge thy brother? or why dost thou set at naught thy brother? for we shall all stand before the judgment seat of Christ." Rom. xiv. 10.

Judge not; the workings of his brain
And of his heart thou canst not see;
What looks to thy dim eyes a stain,
In God's pure light may only be
A scar, brought from some well-won field,
Where thou wouldst only faint and yield.

The look, the air, that frets thy sight,
May be a token, that below,
The soul has closed in deadly fight
With some internal fiery foe,
Whose glance would scorch thy smiling face,
And cast thee shuddering on thy face!

The fall thou darest to despise,—
May be the slackened angel's hand
Has suffered it, that he may rise
And take a firmer, surer stand;
Or, trusting less to earthly things,
May henceforth learn to use his wings.

And judge none lost, but ever wait
With hopeful pity, not disdain;
The depth of the abyss may be
The measure of the height of pain,
And love and glory that may rise
This soul to God in after days!

Prayer.

Prayer is the connecting link between heaven and our souls. Oh, what an inestimable privilege is ours, that of communing with God, of pouring into the ear of the Omnipotent our every want and desire! How invaluable to the real child of God, is this most precious privilege! When tossed with the tempest; when sorely tried and afflicted; when we feel the fiery darts of the enemy coming against us; then what would poor, suffering souls do had they no mercy seat? Then, perhaps, more than at any other time, they appreciate this blood-bought privilege; and as they go to their heavenly Father, and pour into his listening ear their complaints, they feel the gentle dews of heaven distilling upon their waiting, longing hearts. Then they realize, in some degree, what their Master meant when he said, "It is expedient for you that I go away; for if I go not away, the comforter will not come to you." What a lonely, dreary world this would be without the comforting influences of the blessed Spirit! 'Tis when our hearts are uplifted to God in earnest prayer, that "heaven comes down our souls to greet, while glory crowns the mercy seat." No true prayer is ever unanswered: it wins the prize it seeks, or something better. Oh, that all that profess the name of Christ, could realize the preciousness of this privilege! then we would not so often hear expressions like these, "Oh, I can't pray; I have'nt the talent; it is not required or expected of me." I cannot but believe, that an individual who is often found in secret prayer, will be prepared to offer public prayer when the opportunity is given. When we pray to him who searcheth our hearts, and knoweth our thoughts, he does not require long, learned prayers. This would not be like our God: he only requires that our hearts be in our words, however stammering and imperfect they may be.

What is prayer?

"Prayer is the simplest form of speech,
That infant lips can try."

* * * * * * * * * * * *

"Prayer is the Christian's vital breath;
He enters heaven with prayer."

Oh, then, let us be found in our closets; oftener found in the prayer circle, manfully filling our places. We each have a work that no other can do. Oh, may we do it so well, that angels will hasten the story to tell, and when our work on earth is done, it will be ours to hear the welcome sound, "Well done, good and faithful servant; enter thou into the joy of thy Lord! O beloved friends! let us be praying Christians; for only such will be admitted into the presence of the Father, and of the redeemed company, who have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb.

EUNICE WETZEL.

When any one was speaking ill of another in the presence of Peter the Great, at first he listened to them attentively, and then interrupted him. "Is there not," said he, "a fair side also to the character of the person of whom you are speaking? Come, tell me what good qualities you remarked about him."

HE that lendeth to another in time of prosperity shall never want help himself in the time of adversity.

I Wonder Why?

I wonder why this world's good things
Should fall in such unequal shares;
Why some should taste of all the joys,
And others only feel the cares.

I wonder why the sunshine bright,
Should fall in paths some people tread,
While others shiver in the shade
Of clouds, that gather overhead.

I wonder why the trees that hang
So full of luscious fruit, should grow,
Only where some may reach and eat,
While others faint and thirsty go.

Why should sweet flowers bloom for some,
For others only thorns be found?
And some grow rich from fruitful earth,
While others till but barren ground?

I wonder why the hearts of some
O'erflow with joy and happiness,
While others go their lonely way
Unblest with aught of tenderness.

I wonder why the eyes of some
Should ne'er be moistened with a tear,
While others weep from morn till night,
Their hearts all crushed with sorrow here.

Ah! well, we may not know, indeed,
The whys, the wherefores of this life;
But this we know: there's One who sees,
And watches us through joy and strife.

Each life its mission here fulfils;
And only he may know the end;
And, loving him, we can be strong,
Through storm and sunshine he may send.

The Brethren's Mission—A Plan.

We have believed, for some time, that our brethren are about ready to establish a missionary system, if a suitable plan can be found. It has been well understood, by a majority of our most experienced and observing brethren, that a plan in support and to harmonize with emigration, would best suit our wants. A plan that would require no funds would perhaps best suit some of our brethren; while many are ready, and some are anxious to contribute to any system that would promise satisfaction and success.

There are three considerations to agree upon, and then we will have a plan: first, how to raise the funds; second, how to get the man, and lastly, where to send him.

Let every district east of the Mississippi River become a mission district, and establish a treasury, open for donations from any source. About five hundred dollars will carry a medium sized family to the far West. In a district of twenty-five congregations, this would be an average of twenty dollars to each. If the proper confidence is had, and a fair effort is made, this can be overrun in nearly every congregation. Strong congregations could raise five times the amount, and weak ones are the most likely to come up to the standard; they experience most the importance. Much can be done when an effort is made. Let all money be placed in the treasury, which will accumulate; and when a requisite amount is had, then get the man by the clerk of the District Meeting calling over the names of all the preachers, by sending them each a letter containing a call to the mission. If seven of the preachers, or over that number, respond to the call, willing to be sent, let the delegates to the District Meeting elect one out of the number of respondents, and ordain him sufficiently to the work. If a less number than seven respond to the call, then let the clerk of D. M. send a call to every church that has no willing respondent, to hold an election, and send a candidate to be voted for, as though he had responded willingly at the clerk's first call; and if he is present, and willing to go, let him be ordained, at least, by receiving him in the usual way at our elections; if he is not willing to go, and a majority of delegates release him, then let the delegates elect again, or take the next highest in votes, as the meeting may think best. We believe if this plan, or a similar one, were carried out in the spirit of prayer, that generally a suitable man could be found, and a general interest would pervade in all the churches to support the system, and contribute to its furtherance. If the election falls on a man of means, so much the better; but do not ask him to spend a dollar past his own free will, in the expenses he may have in emigrating and locating. Let the Church, or D. M. appoint two suitable trustees, to take care of, or sell, or rent his estate, as he may direct, and let them be responsible to the Church for their conduct in the matter.—Let the missionary elect proceed, as soon as convenient, to his field of labor, and let him have some discretion in choosing his new home; allowing him six months before he is required to confirm his positive headquarters, or place of address, from which he cannot remove for five years, without the consent of the district from which he was sent. And he should be required to locate at least forty miles from the limits of any established church of the Brethren, or their places of regular preaching. If he goes into a new country, let the D. M. from which he is sent provide him with a year's provision, a house, and comfortable wrappings against the inclemency of the weather, and if he requests it, and especially if he is in limited means, let the district buy eighty acres of land, where good land is cheap, and make him a comfortable house, of course in Western style, and if he is faithful for five years in his calling, then give him a clear title for it, and all the improvements. But in case of sickness or death, or any reasonable discouragements, let the district help him or his family home, and elect another to occupy his place for five years, when both the district and the missionary will be discharged from any further responsibility to that part, past their own good pleasure.

Let every district go to the work, and if after a time there is not enough in the treasury to justify a start, then let the district donate it to the treasury of some other weak district, so that it may be enabled to move in the work. In this way no efforts may be lost.

If the missionary preaches every Sunday, and holds two or three love-feasts each year, and practices the doctrine faithfully, his duties may be considered discharged. This might not require much more of his time than many of our faithful brethren spend at home in the cause; and before his time would expire the Lord might provide him assistance in his work, and some one to leave in charge if he wished to return home at the end of his time.

We believe the church would have confidence in some such a plan, and a general interest would be taken; and the cost would be a mere fraction of what other denominations are spending, and a dozen or two missionaries might be soon in the field, sending home their reports in the shape of church news, giving much encouragement at home and abroad, doing much good, and increasing the bounds of our brotherhood.

The Love of God.

"Herein is love; not that we loved God, but that he loved us, and sent His Son to be the propitiation for our sins." John 4: 10.

When man was under sin and condemnation, God sent His only begotten Son into the world, to become the propitiation for our sins, to redeem us from that condemnation, and make us sons and daughters of God.

We cannot sufficiently admire and adore the love of God in making us his children, if, indeed, we are such; and if we are not such, we certainly should be.

We stand and gaze with wonder at the fact. Who, and what are we, or what have we done, that the infinite Lord should condescend thus to notice and distinguish us, who are of a sinful nature, rebelling against God and His word, or commandments? What manner of love is this, that he should so redeem, regenerate, adopt and bless such worthless worms, such guilty, poluted rebels?—Doubtless it is vast, beyond conception. To what can we compare it? "Behold what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us, that we should be called the sons of God."

If God, then, so loved us, how sincere ly ought we to love him, and obey him in all his commandments; for his commandments are not grievous. No man can be a true Christian, who sets aside the commandments, or some of the commandments of God. The Son of God says, "If you love me, keep my commandments. He that hath my commandments and keepeth them (or doeth them), he it is that loveth me." John 14: 15, 21.—And in the 23d and 24th verses of the same chapter, Jesus says, "If a man love me he will keep my words; and my Father will love him, and we will come unto him, and make our abode with him. He that loveth me not, keepeth not my sayings."

Whereby do we know that we love God? just by confessing that Jesus Christ came into the world? No; John did not so understand it, neither do I, for John tells us whereby we can know him. He says, in his first epistle 2d chapter, "And hereby we do know that we know him, if we keep his commandments. He that saith I know him, and keepeth not his commandments, is a liar, and the truth is not in him. But whoso keepeth his words, in him verily is the love of God perfected. Hereby know we that we are in him. John says that those persons are liars that keep not the Word of God; and a liar is a sinner, and a sinner has no right to the kingdom of God. Whenever persons lie they commit sin; and sin is odious to God, and must be to his children also. When we trespass against his word, or commandments, we may be sure that we will have to suffer for it, as Saul, the first king of the Israelites, and many more such like. Here we can learn that God means just what he says. Saul was commanded to go and slay the Amlekites, both men and women, infant and suckling, ox and sheep, camel and ass. But Saul thought he would keep some of the best to offer sacrifice to the Lord, but the Lord was not well pleased with Saul, in disregarding his word.—Samuel says, "To obey is better than sacrifice; and to hearken, than the fat of rams." And again, "Hath the Lord as great delight in burnt-offerings and sacrifices as in obeying the voice of the Lord? Because thou hast rejected the Lord, he hath also rejected thee from being king; for rebellion is as the sin of witchcraft, and stubbornness is as iniquity and idolatry." 1st Sam. 15th chapter. Many more such instances could be produced.

He who habitually practices sin, can be no child of God. He is of his father, the Devil, for he does his work; he loves to obey him. May we be followers of God, as dear children, and thus show our sense of his unspeakable mercy, by obeying him in all his commandments, and express that obedient grateful, humble, and submissive mind, which becomes those who are so highly favored and distinguished.

God's love to us should be our motive to love him, and one another. No man can be a true Christian, who lives under the influence of the present evil and idolatrous world, observed in its chief cares, vanities, and pleasures, whose sentiments are virtually devilish.

All Must Die.

Hark! from the tomb a voice ascends,
It is a doleful sound:
"The old, the young, yea all must die,
And in the grave forgotten lie."

Decay and death are written upon everything. When the cold chills and frosts of winter are over, and the bright and beautiful spring has come with its warm rains and sunny days, nature is all alive. The earth is carpeted with a beautiful, green carpet of grass and moss, and the forest is covered with its green leaves. The flowers bloom, and scent the air with their rich perfumes. All seems to be life and joy, as man goes forth to his daily labor.

But go with me to the beautiful green grass. When we examine it closely we will find abundance of evidence that decay and death are written upon it. The dead and withered blades proclaim the truth, that death is doing his work there. View the leafy trees, and the dried and faded leaf admonishes us that death is there also. And the beautiful flowers, with their faded companions, add their testimony to the truth, that all must die. Thus we might particularize through the realms of nature's domain, and all things would produce evidence of decay and death. The white and bleached bones, that lie scattered here and there, tell us, in unmistakable language, that death is doing his work in the animal kingdom.

Death is the end of the vegetable and animal life. When they die, they cease to exist. But there is another creature, which God saw fit to create and place in the world, which does exist after the present life is departed—after death. That creature is man, the noblest work of God's creative power manifested in this world. When man came from the hands of his Creator, he was a pure and holy being; could converse with his Maker, face to face, in that beautiful garden in which he was placed. Notwithstanding man's purity and holiness, the Almighty saw fit to place certain restrictions upon him, with an annexed penalty, should he violate them. Man was disobedient, violated the command of God, as we are informed in Gen. 3rd chapter. On account of this transgression, the earth was cursed, and death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned. Rom. 5: 12. Go with me to the graveyard, or cemetery, and there we find the grassy mound, the marble slab, and monument, as sure witnesses, testifying that man must die—none are exempt. Our blessed Savior, when in this world and before leaving it, passed through the ordeal of death, to satisfy divine justice, and to redeem fallen man from the curse of a violated law. Behold! the Savior of mankind, by traitorous hands was carried to Mount Calvary, extended between heaven and earth, and as this awful scene was being enacted, He cried, "I thirst," "My God' my God, why hast thou forsaken me;" and immediately the sun was shrouded, darkness fell on all around, the vail of the temple was rent from top to bottom, while attesting shocks of the earth beneath were felt, and the solid rocks were rent, and graves were opened and some of the dead arose. It was then that our Lord was confessed by heathen lips to be the Son of God. Those truth-testing powers of earth and nature struck conviction to the heart of the centurion. And was it not evidence sufficient to convince all that he was none other than the Son of God? Methinks the multitude that witnessed the crucifixion of our Lord stood abashed, watching in silence the awful scene.

Let us remember, kind reader, that this same Jesus arose from the dead, ascended to heaven, where he now sits, making intercession with the Father for us. He will come again, in like manner as he ascended into heaven; but he will not come in that humble manner which characterized his first appearance upon earth. When the days, months, and years have expired, which have been affixed by God's decree, and the Almighty speaks, heaven will open wide her golden gates, and Creation's Sire will then appear, veiled in clouds of wrath, to take vengeance on them that obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ. Yea, the wicked shall then see their Maker clothed in storms of indignation and wrath, and realize the thundering terrors of his words as he commands them to stand still and hear the mandates of his will. But to his true and humble followers he will appear as the chief among ten thousand, and the one altogether lovely; and they shall hear the welcome plaudit, "Well done, good and faithful servants, enter ye into the joys of your Lord." Then will they enter into rest, into that many mansioned house, where they can chant the praises of his name, and sing the song of redeeming love, while ceaseless ages roll.

The flowers of the field, the trembling and ever restless leaves, teach us most effectively the mortality of our present existence. Everything that blooms and lives in the whole kingdom of nature, lives only to die. The glow of life sparkling upon the blushing leaf of the rose, is fading and dying as you speak of its beauty, and the spark of life which animates these bodies of ours is as certain, if not as soon, to fade and die. Year by year, nature teaches man the solemn lesson of his mortality. Would you know what will soon become of these living frames which we now guard and cherish and adorn with constant care? Look at the blossoms which spring produces in all their beauty and loveliness; when another spring comes, they will be changed to dust, and men will tread upon them, not thinking that they were once alive. In less than a year, God may fulfil upon our living and sensitive frames the sentence pronounced of old upon the whole race, "Dust thou art, and unto dust thou shalt return." As it is our certain doom once to die, would it not be wisdom in us to prepare for the solemn change, so that, when the Master calls, we may be ready to meet him with joy and not with grief? Meet him we must.

Careless sinner what are your thoughts of death and judgment. Have you resolved to forsake the vanity and folly of this wicked and sinful world, and follow in the precepts and examples of our blessed Redeemer? If so, bring your resolutions into practice at once. Delays are dangerous. And if you have not formed any such resolutions, so much the more you stand in danger. In danger you draw every breath. Danger is your travelling companion when you journey, and danger haunts you when at home; danger hovers over you during the bustle of the day, and peeps between your curtains amid the solemn silence of night. You may drown conviction and reflection in business, or by plunging deeper and deeper into worldly dissipation and sin, but you are in danger still—of wrath, death and hell. Oh! flee to Jesus at once, and plead with him for pardon and reconciliation. With him only is safety. Escape while it is called to-day, before the night of death cometh; "for the Spirit and the bride say, come. And let him that heareth say, come. And let him that is athirst, come. And whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely."

"I hear a voice that comes from far;
From Calvary it sound abroad;
Oh! sweeter sounds were never heard,
Than mercy utters from the cross."

Exposition of Colossians. 1: 21, 22.

"You that were sometimes alienated and enemies in your mind, by wicked works, yet now hath he reconciled in the body of his flesh, through death."

There are only two kinds of goodness possible to God's creatures: one is the goodness of innocence; and the other, of penitence. To the first class belong those who have never sinned. Such is the goodness of the holy angels; they have never known the wickedness of sin, the pain of conscious guilt, the bitterness of despair, nor the tears of penitence. Their life is a pure stream, flowing in all its crystal loveliness, from the infinite fountain of life and goodness. It's waters have never been darkened by sin.

To the second class belong those who have sinned and have been recovered from the power of evil. This is the only goodness that is possible for man; for all have sinned. The goodness of penitence is the Christian's goodness; for he is a redeemed sinner.

As there are two kinds of goodness, so there are two kinds of happiness set opposite to them: First, the happiness of uninterrupted innocence. In this there is an entire ignorance of the stain of guilt, remorse and misery of sin. This is a blessed ignorance—a happiness that we can never know. This is the happiness of the holy angels. Second, the happiness of penitence—the joy growing out of forsaking sin and coming back to God. This is the happiness of the Christian, and it may become fully equal to that of the innocent angels. It may embrace all the calmness of the happiness of unbroken innocence, with the intensity of emotion and glow of feeling growing out of a recovery from sin. Some writers think that the happiness of the Christian will be superior to that of the holy angels, because of his sin and recovery from it. I do not think so; for, if it were so, it would have been better for all the angels to have sinned. This is the exploded doctrine of doing evil that good may come from it. It is not true.

As there are two kinds of goodness so there are two kinds of friendship: First, that which has never been broken. This is the friendship that exists between God and the holy angels: it has never received a shock. This friendship man can never know; for he has been alienated from God. Second, that which has been broken and afterward renewed and made sure. This is the friendship of the Christian; for his alienation from God has been destroyed through the atonement of Christ, and he is reconciled to God. This is the only friendship with God that man can know.

The end of the Savior's mission was, to recover man from sin, restore him to goodness, slay the enmity of his heart, and reconcile him to God. This fact is clearly stated in the Scriptures: "All things are of God, who hath reconciled us to himself by Jesus Christ, and hath given to us the ministry of reconciliation; to wit, that God was in Christ reconciling the world unto himself, not imputing their trespasses unto him, and hath committed unto us the word of reconciliation;" 2 Cor. 5: 18, 19; "When we were enemies, we were reconciled to God by the death of his Son." Rom. 5: 10. This work was accomplished in the disciples at Colosse: "And you that were sometimes (that is once) alienated and enemies in your mind, by wicked works, yet now hath he reconciled in the body of his flesh through death."

There are two facts stated in our text: First, that these people were once estranged from God: "You that were sometimes alienated in your mind." The cause of this alienation was wicked works. These are voluntary deeds; they are not something that man cannot help: they are matters of choice. There is a loose way of thinking and speaking of sin, in which we loose sight of personal responsibility, and consequent guilt. We speak of it as though it was a foreign disease, like the cholera, introduced into the constitution, and imputed guilt, growing out of the conduct of our ancestors. The Bible never speaks of sin in this matter. It speaks of sin as a voluntary thing: "Whoever committeth sin, trangresseth also the law; for sin is a trangression of the law;" John 3: 4; "Know ye not that to whom ye yield yourselves servants to obey, his servants ye are to whom ye obey, whether of sin unto death, or of obedience unto righteousness?" Rom. 16: 16. Paul recognizes the fact, that there is a voluntary action in sin: "To whom ye yield yourselves servants."

The child is not God's enemy: he may become such by voluntary action, after he has reached the point in his mental and moral history where he is able to judge between good and evil. The infant is not the child of the devil, but the child of God; for Christ says, "Of such is the kingdom of heaven." When we close the ear to the voice of God; when we transgress the inward law; when we sacrifice the conscience and reason to the outward senses; when we let ease and comfort become more dear to us than spiritual purity; when we neglect conscious duty, and give the body dominion over the spirit, then we sin; for those are voluntary acts. These are the wicked works mentioned in our text.

The results of these are two-fold: there are two steps in this wandering from God: first, there is simply alienation. There is a marked difference between alienation and hostility. In alienation we feel that God is our enemy; but in hostility we look upon ourselves as enemies to God. Alien was a much stronger term in the days of the apostles than now. Then the alien had none of the advantages of a citizen. Among the Hebrews he was not allowed to worship with them, and had no share in the promises of their religion. Among the Romans the word had a meaning even stronger than this. To be an alien from the commonwealth of Rome, was to be without the protection of the laws, to have none of the privileges of a citizen, and subject to severer penalties than the Romans were. For instance: A Roman citizen could not be crucified; however mean and low he might have been, the law forbade it. But an alien was liable to this punishment. Paul tells us what an alien was. Speaking of the condition of the Ephesian brethren, before their conversion, he says, "At that time ye were without Christ; being aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, and strangers from the covenants of promise; having no hope, and without God in the world." Eph 11: 12. This was a fearful condition. No home in God's beautiful universe; no hope; the mighty future clothed in darkness, profound as the gloom of the grave. Alienation —banishment from God—have a deep meaning, and reveal a condition fearful to contemplate.

In one sense we can never be banished from God; for we are always in his presence. There is no place where we can hide from his omniscient eye. But, in another sense, we may be banished from him: in thought, feeling, desire, and enjoyment, we may be cut off from him. To feel that God is our enemy and that we are his, is an awful condition to be in.

Jesus in the Heart.

BY S. M. MINNICH.

How to become new creatures in Christ Jesus, is a question of vital interest to every one of us. How the old man may be put off, and the new man put on, all the world should know. To understand by what means the all things may be made new in us, is to be desired more than gold; yea, than much fine gold. It is not so difficult, perhaps, to name what will not renew the heart, as it is to name what will renew and purify it.

Being born of water, will not purify the heart; nor feet-washing, nor the supper, nor the communion, nor the salutation, nor the caps of the sisters, nor the coats of the brethren—not one of these ordinances or institutions, nor all of them will create within us clean hearts. The disciple may attend to all these ordinances, and yet be "in the gall of bitterness and the bond of iniquity." A sister may wear the cap, and the brother the coat instituted by the church, and yet be full within of dead bones and of all uncleanness.

But let us try to find what will make us new creatures. "Ye must be born again." This Nicodemus did not understand. Neither will we understand the new birth if we trust to these ordinances and institutions for salvation. "Ye must be born again." We must be changed.—The things we once loved we must now hate; and the things we once hated we must now love. The passions must be subdued; the affections must be changed. We must hear the voice of the Savior, and "open the door" for Jesus to come into our hearts; and then he will sup with us and we with him. His loving hand will lead us in paths of peace, which lead to the new life, where we may go in and out, and find pasture. Let us ever try to purify our hearts, that Jesus may dwell within us.

Our Time is Short.

Frail man is like the summer soil
That opens to the morning sky;
But ere the shades of evening close,
Is scattered on the ground to die.

Our time in this world is short, when compared with eternity—a long, endless eternity. Our grand object and great work of life should be to prepare for the enjoyment of a fast approaching eternity. Hear the apostle on the frailty of man: "For all flesh is as grass, and all the glory of man as the flowers of grass; the grass withereth, and the flowers thereof falleth away." 1 Pet. 1: 24.

"How short and transient are our days!"
The passing moments say.
We bud and bloom, drop to the tomb;
Time hurries us away.

The grave, the grave, oh yes, the grave
Must soon become our bed.
This lump of clay, must pass away,
And unto worms be fed.

Go thou and view the gaping grave,
It opens wide for you;
Go. "watch and pray," hear Jesus say,
The way to heaven pursue.

This much lov'd world is not our home,
We do this often see.
We pass away; we've here no stay,
Our home's eternity.

It matters not how soon we die;
If but prepared we are
In heaven to dwell, where all is well,
And live forever there.

Non-resistance.

"Resist not evil." Matt. 5: 39.

This cannot mean that we should resist no kind of evil. It does not mean that we should not resist a mad dog or a rattlesnake. No, nature itself teaches us that we should; and, truly we are commanded to resist the devil, and, by so doing, he will flee from us. I would venture to say that we should resist a drunken man, or any other man, or beast, if any of them would try to injure our persons or family. It would be our duty to prevent them of doing an injury, if possible, but not to such an extent as to do them an injury, except the ravenous beast, which we may kill. Brethren, here is the secret. We brethren or Christians, are to do no personal injury to any of our fellow creatures; so if we closely examine into the meaning of the Savior's words, "Resist not evil," we cannot, I think, reconcile it in any other way than it means not to take revenge.—Daniel Keller, Sr.

"For I will give you a mouth and wisdom, which all your adversaries shall not be able to gainsay nor resist." Luke 21: 15.

"And they were not able to resist the wisdom and the spirit by which he spake." Acts 6: 10.

"Ye stiff-necked, and uncircumcised in heart and ears, ye do always resist the Holy Ghost." Acts 7: 51.

"Whosoever, therefore, resisteth the power, resisteth the ordinance of God; and they that resist shall receive to themselves damnation." Rom. 13: 2.

Now as Jannes and Jambres withstood Moses, so do these also resist the truth." 2 Tim. 3: 8.

Resist the devil, and he will flee from you." James 4: 7.

"Ye have condemned and killed the just, and he doth not resist you." James 5: 6.

"Whom resist, steadfast in the faith, knowing that the same afflictions are accomplished in your brethren that are in the world." 1st Peter 5: 9.

"For who hath resisted his will." Rom. 9: 19.

"Ye have not yet resisted unto blood, striving against sin." Heb. 12: 4.

"God resisteth the proud, but giveth grace to the humble." James 4: 6;—1 Peter 5: 5.

I have re-produced the above texts from the scriptures, as also the one from Bro. Keller's communication on "consistency," simply to direct attention to the subject of non-resistance, which Bro. K. says, "space will not allow me to give as full satisfaction as I would like;" and with the hope that brother K. will feel at liberty to give, through the Companion, for the benefit of the brotherhood at large, the fruit of his mature judgement on this somewhat vaguely taught and more vaguely understood subject.

What duties, as citizens, and members of the body politic, may we perform, and what avoid? what privileges and immunities may we enjoy, and of what deny ourselves? How far must we submit, without resistance, in any form, to usurpation, oppression, injury, wrong, and violence, monarchical, executive, constitutional, military, legislative, judicial, municipal and ecclesiastical.

Again, when, how far, and in what manner, have we liberty to avail ourselves of the protection in person and property, of the various constituted authorities mentioned above?

There are a great many discriminations to be made in those matters, for our proper conduct and guidance, as brethren, in which many of us have had but little experience. For instance: we help to vote down license in the county where we live, so that no liquor can be sold as a beverage in said county; then we may have a father, a brother, or a son, who is addicted to the use of strong drink, and we know certainly where, when, and by whom, he is unlawfully supplied with strong drink to intoxication—the evil unquestionably increasing in every way, the law open, the proof at hand. With no other remedy to abate the nuisance, are we in such a case at liberty to implead such a man, or, in other words, make information of the fact before the proper magistrate, which course would doubtless lead to arrest and imprisonment? Is it consistent to help enact a wholesome law and then plead non-resistant principles when it comes to help enforce it?

The line of discrimination, or of demarcation, in our active or argumentative parts, taken under this non-resistant doctrine, is certainly very poorly understood amongst us, and we are very much in need of all the light we can get on the matter. We sometimes hear it stated in general terms only; but seldom, very seldom, applied in a way calculated to give one a clear idea of its scope and bearing. We therefore, feel to ask our brethren to help us walk in the light of their accumulated experience and wisdom, and be saved from over much stumbling.

In the desire of a happy eternity, and in the fellowship of truth, as it is in Christ Jesus, our only Redeemer, the one hope, I close.

Morality and Love.

Brethren, sisters, fellow travellers to eternity, as one united band let us turn our thoughts and affections Zion-ward, and our backs to all evils: for in love I write to you. This is the subject which bears upon my mind; for if the love of money is the prevailing current by which we are to be carried, then we will be on the downward road to ruin. Woe be to them who make divisions among the people of God. Let us be united upon the plain terms of the Gospel, and walking in the paths of our fathers in the Lord, and peace will be multiplied with us.—Should we turn from our former steps, which we took to be according to the Gospel, and desire all things in fancy style, behold, Satan is at the door! We show forth a bad example to the world, when we advocate principles which are contrary to the principles of the Church.

We should consider well, and peruse the Gospel well, before we attempt to set forth a new rule. When we are founded upon the Gospel, then we have the rock of weight and power in it. Let us not lay a stumbling block in the church, that the world may not say that we are divided, or against the principles laid down in the Gospel. When we love the truth, we will desire all things plain and upright, as the teachings of the Gospel. Let us love one another, and not, as some professors do, that, when the love of money is within, the flock is not cared for. Well might Paul say, "The love of money is the root of all evil." Take the reward of money away, and we would hear but little preaching of the gospel now in the land. Where are their gods? are they not of silver and gold? Men setting out to preach the Gospel with the wisdom of men and with the view of making money! where is there a greater evil than this? I write these few lines as a warning to all, to beware lest the god of this world get in among us, and, most of all, the perverters of the Gospel, who preach for gain. Brethren and sisters, be mindful of that which is right.

Samuel H. Weaver.

An old negro named Pete was much troubled about his sins. Perceiving him one day with a very downcast look, his master asked him the cause. "Oh! massa, I'm such a great sinner!" "But, Pete," said his master, "you are foolish to take it so much to heart. You never see me troubled about my sins." "I know the reason massa," said Pete;—"when you go out duck shooting, and kill one duck and wound another, don't you run after the wounded duck?" "Yes, Pete;" and the master wondered what was coming next. "Well, massa, dat is de way wid you and me. De debil has got you sure; but, as he am not so sure of me, he chases dis chile all de time."

When the devil knew how to quote Scripture falsely, Christ knew how to quote it truly; and it is for us, whenever we are tempted, to go to the Bible and see whether we cannot find suitable for our souls in that hour of temptation.

Christian Union.

"That they may be one, even as we are one." John 17: 22.

If unity in purpose and effort is necessary in order to succeed in temporal affairs, it is no less so in spiritual matters. "In union there is strength," holds as good in religion as in anything else. Whenever anything is to be accomplished by the people, "Organize, organize!" is the cry. The necessity of organizing is felt, that they may adopt some system for harmonious and united action. In this way they labor intelligently; and by combining their forces, they operate much more readily and successfully. This is in strict accordance with the law of God, as exhibited in the various operations in the animal, vegetable, and mineral kingdoms; and, in fact, throughout the universe, so far as our senses reach.

Jesus, the Word of God, by whom all things were made, was thoroughly acquainted with this law; hence, in his prayer to his Father, in the night of his bitter agony and betrayal, he prayed for union among his disciples. Union—union of purpose and effort—concord in feeling, and harmonious action, was the burden of that prayer. No one can read that prayer, as recorded in the 17th chapter of John's Gospel, without observing the great importance attached to unity by our Savior. He did not pray for the world, but for his disciples. He did not pray that they should be taken out of the world, nor that evil should be taken away from them, but that they should be kept from the evil. He prayed that they might be sanctified through the truth—through the word of God, which is truth. He prayed not only for those whom he had chosen, but also for those who should believe on him through their testimony; and it was his ardent desire, fervently expressed, that they might be perfectly united in love—be of the same mind—have one aim—be one even as the Father and Son are one. His language expresses the greatest possible unity—"That they all may be one; as thou Father, art in me, and I in thee, that they also may be one in us; that the world may believe that thou hast sent me. Who can not see that our Savior regarded this unity as essential to their success in the conversion of the world?

We here pause to notice several facts, and to deduce from them a very important conclusion.

1. In refereuce to his disciples, he prayed, "That they all may be one." Notice this language particularly: not only a few, nor even many, but all are to be one. This unity however, could not, in any way, interfere with or destroy their individuality: a thousand disciples, being one according to our Savior's will and prayer, are a thousand disciples—a thousand individuals—a thousand persons still. In harmony with this we read that, on the day of Pentecost, "there were added unto them about three thousand souls;" and afterward, that "the number of disciples was multiplied." See Acts 2: 41; 6: 1. Each soul, each disciple, was a branch, or member, and all united constituted one body or church; hence Paul says, "But now are they many members, yet but one body:" "Now ye are the body of Christ, and members in particular." 1 Cor. 12: 20, 27. The fact we wish you to notice is, that, while the disciples were one body, they were still "members in particular"—their personality, or individuality, was not destroyed. This, indeed, could not possibly be.

2. They were to be one in the same manner, in the same sense, in which the Father and the Son are one: "That they may be one, even as we are one;" "As thou, Father art in me, and I in thee, that they also may be one in us." Now we are ready to draw our conclusion from these plainly established facts. We will put it in the form of a syllogism.

1. The unity of the disciples does not destroy their distinctive personality.

2. The disciples are one in the same sense in which the Father and the Son are one; hence

3. The unity of the Father and Son does not destroy their distinctive personality.

In this syllogism the premises are both true, being established by the word of God, which is truth; the reasoning is just, and the conclusion fairly deduced; hence it is an immutable fact, that the unity of the Father and Son does not interfere with their individuality: while in one sense, they are one, in another sense they are two. The same reasoning will apply to the Holy Spirit; and accordingly John says, "There are three that bear record in heaven, the Father, the Word (Son), and the Holy Ghost; and these three are one." In one sense they are one, are united; but this unity does not destroy their individuality, their plurality, for they are still three.

We now ask the reader to remember this fact, to which we shall return when we have farther use for it; but now we shall consider the nature and extent of the union that is enjoined upon, and required of, the disciples of Christ. It is of the utmost importance that we should know precisely what the scriptures teach on this subject. That professing Christians are very much divided in sentiment, in teaching, and in practice, is a fact which every one knows; that this divided state is either right or wrong no one will pretend to deny. If it is right, it will tend to the glory of God, and we should say nothing against it; but if wrong, if not in harmony with the will of Heaven, we should know it, and do all we can to do away with divisions, and to bring about such a union as is pleasing to God. We have heard persons thank God that there are so many different societies, with their distinctive peculiarities, so that all may be suited, and sinners can have no excuse for not uniting with the Lord's people. Again we have prayed, and have heard others pray, that this divided state might cease to exist; that all who call on the name of the Lord might be united in one body, hold the same faith, and worship God by the same rule. We are honest in our prayer, and, perhaps, they were candid in their thanks; but as we conflict, one is right, the other wrong, and we should know how it is.

Railroad Privileges.

Arrangements have now been perfected for excursions over all the railroads of Pennsylvania, so far as we expect to apply, viz: the Pennsylvania Central, and its branches, and the Pittsburgh, Washington & Baltimore Road, Connellsville route. The arrangements are to sell excursion tickets from May 20th until June 3d, good to return until June 14th.—East of the Alleghany mountains, tickets will be sold to Bridgeport, the terminus of the P. R. R., and return. Notice, that wherever you take the cars, on the Pennsylvania Railroad, between Philadelphia and Altoona, you call for excursion ticket to Brethren's Annual Meeting at Dale City, for BRIDGEPORT.—West of Altoona you will inquire for same ticket, to CONNELLSVILLE. Connellsville is the terminus of the southwest branch, P. R. R. (a new branch recently opened from Greensburg to Connellsville). Those from the east will change cars at Huntingdon and Bridgeport, and those from the west at Greensburg and Connellsville.

Over the Pittsburgh, Washington & Baltimore Railroad, we have also excursion arrangements, from Pittsburg and from Cumberland. All those who land at Pittsburg, no matter by what route, will take this route, direct to place of meeting. You will inquire for excursion ticket for Brethren's Annual Meeting, at DALE CITY. And so at any station along the line of said road, whether at Connellsville, Bridgeport, Cumberland or any other.

These explanations are believed to be full and complete, and need not be repeated, and those who are interested should preserve the paper, or make a note. Those coming from the South and South-east, will come by way of Cumberland, and then, as above stated.

It will be observed by announcement of Elder D. P. Saylor, that the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad have granted half-fare privileges, from all important points along their line.

We shall also make application with the Pittsburg, Ft. Wayne and Chicago R. R, and announce result in time.

Please remember that tickets will be sold only in the time specified above.

Spring Lovefeasts.

The time for our spring course of Lovefeasts is rapidly approaching. Many congregations have already made their announcements, manifesting their desire that their brethren and sisters from a distance may be with them to feast with them, and to share their love and friendship.

These feasts afford great opportunities for doing good, as well as for enjoyment. Here we often meet with loved ones, from whom we had long been severed; and form new acquaintances long to be remembered, or never to be forgotten. Under the preaching of the word, the fire of love is fanned into a brighter flame; by association the bond of union is strengthened; and by the faithful observance of the ordinances of the Lord's house we are revived and renewed in the inner life.

Not only are our own hearts cheered—our own souls blessed—but during these meetings many precious souls unite with the Lord's people. This is a source of much gladness among us, and of rejoicing in the presence of the angels.

Will not our brethren and sisters make this rejoicing more general by sending in carefully prepared reports of their meetings? In this way much good may be done.

Again, would not our agents avail themselves of this good opportunity to extend the circulation of the COMPANION? We feel certain, that by a little extra effort our list could be materially increased. We have a good supply of back numbers, which we will cheerfully send to all who wish to use them in soliciting subscribers. We can still furnish all the back numbers of Vol. 9, and the full volume will be sent for $1.50: or we will send the balance of the volume, beginning with this number, for $1.00. Subscriptions may begin with any number, and run any length of time at the rate of three cents per number, or $1.50 per annum.

The Resurrection.

Twice had the sun gone down on the earth, and all, as yet, was quiet at the sepulcher. Death held his sceptre over the Son of God. Still and silent the hours passed on; the guards stood by their posts; the rays of the midnight moon gleamed on their helmets and on their spears; the enemies of Christ exulted in their success; the hearts of his friends were sunk in despondency and sorrow; while the spirits of glory waited with anxious suspense to behold the event, wondering at the depth of the ways of God. At length, the morning star arising in the east, announced the approach of light; the third day began to dawn on the world, when on a sudden the earth trembled to its centre, and the powers of heaven were shaken; an angel of God descended; the guards shrunk back from the terror of his presence, and fell prostrate on the ground.—His countenance was like lightning, and his raiment was as white as snow. He rolled away the stone from the door of the sepulcher, and sat upon it. But who is this that cometh from the tomb, with dyed garments from the bed of death? He that is glorious in his appearance, walking in the greatness of his strength. It is thy Prince, O Zion! Christian, it is your Lord! He hath trodden the wine-press alone; he has stained his raiment with blood. but now, as the first-born from the womb of nature, he meets the morning of his resurrection. He arises a conqueror from the grave. He returns with blessings from the world of spirits; he brings salvation to the sons of men. Never did the returning sun usher in a day so glorious! It was the jubilee of the universe! The morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy! The Father of Mercies looked down from his throne in the heavens with complacency; He beheld his world restored; He saw His work that it was good. Then did the desert rejoice; the face of nature was gladdened before Him when the blessings of the Eternal descended, as the dews of heaven, for the refreshing of the nations.

We also shall be resurrected. Will we have a smiling God to look upon us, or will we meet his frowning eye? Oh, God forbid that we should disgrace the bleeding Jesus, who died for us, and the third day rose again, that we, at our resurrection, may enter the haven of everlasting peace. If we neglect our duty, how shall we meet our God at the resurrection of the dead? for he will surely say, "Depart from me, ye workers of iniquity, I know you not." "Depart ye, into the lake that burneth with fire and brimstone, prepared for the devil and his angels." But if we do our duty, the angels will rejoice.—The Father of Mercies will smile upon us. Jesus will bid us come to the place that he has prepared for us at the resurrection.

Man.

Who is he? what is he? where is he? and what is his destiny? are questions of vital importance to every reflecting mind; and must necessarily force themselves upon the consideration of every sentient being. Man may look without, and, to a certain extent, fill every wish of his expansive heart, with the enjoyments and employments of the external world; but within is a world of mechanistic mystery, "fearfully and wonderfully made,"—and as beautiful, too, as the wisdom that made it. What wisdom, then, in man, to give his contemplative thoughts to wisdom's fairest work. All without, is stamped with mortality, but within is enshrined the germ of immortal youth. Without is the transient, fading, dying life; within, the deathless spirit of another world, incarnate dwells, and, perchance, is well pleased with its clay tenement, while the sunshine of life is scattered around but when, despoiled by age, and the wintry winds come on apace, piercing its trembling walls, it longs for its "house, not made with hands, eternal in in the heavens."

That "Sacred Ordinance."

A writer in the C. F. C, for April 9th, under the title of "Why is It?" reports, that in parts of Iowa, in January, he saw many sisters "coming to the house of worship, without the proper covering on their heads. Why is it so?" "Will you answer? 'Produce your cause,'" &c.

He infers that pride is the cause; and if the sisters do not give a reason, "we (he) will take silence for consent" that it is pride.

Brother, suppose one of these Iowa sisters would write, "I believe Elder Eby is a hypocrite, and that he wears a round coat and a broad brimmed hat to conceal his hypocrisy; and if he does not bring forth strong reasons, we will take silence for consent."

Such an inference, no doubt, would be very unjust; but no more so than the conclusion that "we will take silence for consent" that all the Iowa sisters are proud who do not wear caps.

"Sacred ordinance." Sacred means hallowed, holy. Ordinance, a law, a decree. "The commands and ordinances of the Lord." Luke 1: 6.

Now, brother, when you "produce your cause," and "bring forth your strong reasons," and convince the sisters that the wearing of caps is a sacred ordinance, it will not be necessary for you to write a treatise on "the duty of Elders, in reference to this very important and sacred ordinance."

Children's Home.

DEAR C. F. C.:

It seems but a short time since we were all at home, father, mother, sisters and brothers. But oh, how things have changed! Our parents have both gone to their home beyond this vale of tears, to a happier home, we trust, than this. Their troubles and sorrows are all over; but we are left to share the troubles and trials of this world. Scattered as we are, hundreds of miles apart, we can't have our father and mother come to visit us. But they can never come and see me any more. Children, those who have good parents, will never know how to appreciate them till they are dead and gone. Ere long it will be said of us, we too have no abiding place here, and must go the way of all the earth. We are as buds that burst in the spring and grow to their full extent in a few weeks, but are soon gone. This brings us to see more closely that the things of this world are transient, and that it is not best to strive to lay up treasures here; for it is of short duration, but let us "Lay up, for ourselves, treasures in heaven, where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt; and where thieves do not break through and steal: for where our treasure is, there will our hearts be also." Now dear children, you that have good and kind parents, obey them, for this is right. "Honor thy father and mother that thy days may be long upon the earth."

Do We Know Who our Friends Are?

BROTHER HOLSINGER:—I thought I would pen a few lines for the C. F. C. to-day, as I had to stay at home all this long Sunday. I could not go to meeting. My health is so delicate that I am not permitted to meet with the brethren very often, and to-day I have to stay all day alone, without speaking a word to any human being. Oh, the sorrow of a widowed life, none know but those who have the trial. Those who have kind and true friends, do not know how to pity those that are in sorrow, both by day and night.

Now to my text. Are those who tell us of every unkind remark made about us, truly our friends? If I may be allowed to use a common phrase, I answer, "not much." If people remark unkindly about us, (and envious persons will), if we never happen to hear of it, it is as if the unkind words were never spoken, and we have it not to worry us; but when some officious acquaintance, sailing under friendship's colors, repeats to us the proof of envy and bitterness, I say that one is no longer our friend: we may rest assured that he has been saying something himself. He will pretend to be your best friend, when he wants a favor, but when your back is turned, he will say as much as those he has been telling you of that were talking about you, and perhaps more too. If he were your friend truly, his first care would be to keep from you every thing which might cause a moment's unhappiness; and we must all acknowledge that bitter words do leave a sting. We may say we do not care; and if our faces are trained to smile when there are tears in the heart, we may persuade the tattler that we really do not care; yet every one knows an unkind expression of feeling towards us, as a remark made about us in an unfriendly spirit, will cause an unpleasant sensation in the heart, whenever we remember it.

But I do not blame persons for pretending that they do not care, in the least, for anything which may be said about them. I do that very thing myself, always, without fail, whenever any one repeats to me the envious, ill-natured words spoken by another. I do this because I believe that no way can the mischief-maker be punished so effectually as being made to believe that I really do not care for anything that spiteful people may say. We may console ourselves with the reflection that the person never yet lived, who, gaining a good start in the race, was not detained by the strong hands of envy being stretched out to pull the lucky one back. We may say to ourselves, that the ill-natured words were spoken by those only who envied some good fortune falling to us, instead of bearing any real unkind feeling toward us; we may say we have friends enough left, and can easily spare those who deal unkindly by us, or we may manufacture any of the thousand other plasters to heal wounded feelings, but it all amounts to the same thing, and that is, just nothing at all. Whenever memory brings up the regretted words, we cannot prevent the lonesome, dreary feeling from creeping into our hearts.

Do what we will, there is only one streak of good that can possibly result from telling a friend of an unkind criticism, and that is, we prize the friends we know to be true the more, as those we only thought to be friends prove false.

But there is another trouble here.—How are we to tell who are true and who are false, in this age of false pretension and shame? Perhaps the very one to whom you would look for sympathy and strength of friendship, will be the first one to smile and wink when your name is lightly handled. Oh, how many of us thought we had true friends, but when found out they were as false as Judas!—Your unworthy writer knows something of being betrayed by false friends. My heart is almost made to bleed, when I think of the past! A few more rising and setting suns, then I will be done with the sorrows of this world. I hope I will be permitted to enter through the pearly gates of the New Jerusalem, where there are no false friends. Brethren and sisters, pray for me, that I may bear all my afflictions patiently.

On the Death of my dear Aunt, Catharine Miller.

"Be ye also ready; for in such an hour as ye think not, the Son of man cometh."

Truly this may be said of our dear sister in Christ. When all was peace and happiness, and all seemed to enjoy good health, she was cut down and taken from our midst; and oh, how sudden! in the short space of three hours she was a lifeless corpse. When we sit and think over the past, it seems but a dream. We can scarcely endure the thought that it is true; but God's ways are not our ways, therefore we must be subject to the will of God. How lonely it is in her once pleasant home! Her smiling face and her many kind words are seen and heard no more. We can say with the poet:

Silently, the shades of evening
Gather round our lonely door;
Silently, they bring before us
Faces we shall see no more."

She died as she had lived, a devout christian, and one that had been in service long. And what more could I say? I could not express more in a volume. She passed away calmly and peacefully, leaving with her friends the comforting hope that she is at rest. Of her life I need not speak; but this I can say, she had a kind heart, and her sympathies reached out toward the poor and unfortunate; and she was always ready to help the suffering wherever she found them. She was a good wife, a kind and tender-hearted mother, and a true christian. Whilst standing by her grave, hearing the sobs and cries of the bereaved husband, children, and friends, I thought, "How peacefully she rests in her narrow house of clay! With her all the trials, the sorrow, the tears, the watching, and the waiting, of this life are over; and she sleeps the sleep of death." Oh, how indescribably sweet that rest must be! No troubled dreams or frightful visions; no waking to the terrible realities of this troublesome world; but all is a peaceful quiet rest, never to be broken. Who would not thus want to rest—to sleep this calm, undisturbed sleep? Surely there is nothing in this world, to keep us from thus desiring to rest. Life is full of cares and trials; as one of old says, "Man that is born of woman, is of few days and full of trouble;" for "behold, all is vanity and vexation of spirit." How true this is. We may search after happiness in this life, and when we think we have found it, it is gone. Our only hope of rest, of peace, and of true happiness is in death. We can so order our days, by the favor of God, that death will appear to us the portals of a never-ending rest—a happiness that is beyond this world—a home in the eternal city of our God, where joy and pleasure, peace and happiness, are perennial, and where sorrow, sickness, or death are known or felt no more. May it be our happy lot to see dear ones on that happy shore is my prayer.

The New Commandment.

In No. 4, Vol. 9, page 53, I noticed an article as a reply to my article in Vol. 8, No. 47, page 737, on the "New Commandment," in which the writer charges me with garbling the sacred witnesses, and says, "the new commandment has not any reference to feet-washing; but means to love one another, and nothing more. I hope the editors will favor me with another hearing on that subject.

We stated in our article, that we believed the new commandment was to wash one another's feet; and to love one another was not a new commandment, but that which we had from the beginning. Now, if the writer of that article fails to prove that to wash one another's feet was commanded before Christ commanded it, then all Bible readers must acknowledge that it was a new command ment, whether Christ had, or had not, reference to feet-washing, when he spake of a new commandment. Now, if the writer can prove that God had a people over 4,000 years on earth, before Christ, and never commanded them to love one another before Christ commanded it, then I will no more call it an old one, or as the Apostle John says, "from the beginning;" but this you will fail to do, and ought to know it, if you are a Bible reader. For if to love one another and nothing more, was the new commandment, how could all men know that they were Christ's disciples, for Moses' disciples were as much commanded to to love one another as were Christ's disciples. For the proof of this, we will give the best authority, even Christ's own words. (Matt. 22: 26,) Being asked which is the great commandment in the Law, "Jesus saith unto him, thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind; this is the first and great commandment, and the second is like unto the first, thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." Now is it possible that to "love thy neighbor as thyself" comes next to the first and great commandment, and was not commanded till over 4,000 years, and yet, "upon these two hang all the law and the prophets?"—Please read the law. (Deut. 6: 4, 5.) "Hear, O Israel! the Lord our God is one Lord, and thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thine heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy might. "(Lev. 19: 17, 18,) "Thou shalt not avenge nor bear any grudge against the children of thy people; but thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself; I am the Lord."—(Deut. 10: 19,) "Love ye therefore the stranger; for ye were strangers in the land of Egypt." And not only were the Children of Israel commanded to love their brethren, neighbor, and stranger, but their enemies also. (Exodous 23: 4,) "If thou meet thine enemy's ox, or his ass, going astray, thou shalt surely bring it back to him again." Now with the above testimony we are inclined to believe that John meant what he said, when he said, "That which we had from the beginning, that we should love one another."

A few words more to the writer, and then I am done. You say that the new commandment is to love one another, and nothing more. What is love? I do not mean such as sinners have, for they love one another, but the love of God. (John 5: 3,) "This is the love of God, that we keep his commandments." But you say it has no reference to feet-washing. Then please tell us which of the commandments it has reference to. If John is right, and we think he is.

Next, you reject "from the beginning," and substitute your own word, "from the Master." Remember, the new commandment is, "that ye love one another, as I have loved you." Here love is a transitive verb, expressing action; and, "As I have," as is an adverb, placed before the pronoun I, and calls for the action, in like manner; and that action was washing their feet, and before Judas came back, you will notice, that he spake again: "These things I command you, that ye love one another," and "remember the word I said unto you, the servant is not greater than his lord." John 15: 21. Now, when did he say the word he told them to remember? Just after he had given them the example of feet-washing, and said to them, "Ye should do as I have done to you. John 13: 15, 16; "Verily, verily I say unto you, the servant is not greater than his Lord."

ELIAS K. BUECHLEY.

Notice to Brethren and Sisters going to A M.

I, to-day, made arrangements with the Baltimore and Ohio Rail Road Company, with its branches, from Baltimore to Washington, Weaverton to Hagerstown, Harpers Ferry to Harrisonburg, and Grafton to Parkersburg, for half fare; no farther west, however, than Wheeling; friend Cole having no authority to control the division west of the Ohio river, in such matters.

The conditions are the same as they were on former occasions on the road. Those going will start where they choose, and pay their full fare to Cumberland, asking no questions, as agents along the line know nothing at all about it, and, of course, can give no information. At the place of meeting I will furnish all who apply, and have complied with the conditions with a certificate, which will pass to the place of starting free of charge.

If some one would, or could arrange with some line of the road west of the Ohio river to connect these arrangements at Wheeling or Bellair, this would be the route for all west and south of west to take; and whereas, the B. & O. R. R. Co., has never refused to grant the brethren half-fare privileges, while the Pittsburg, Fort Wayne, & Chicago Co., has rarely, if ever, granted it, I think the brethren are in duty bound to consider it. Last year they refused to abate one cent of my fare going and coming, while the Pittsburg & Connellsville road, through the brethren, sent me by telegraph a pass to return free over their road. I am already furnished the return certificates. D P. Saylor.

Mr. Editor: Dear Sir, I am a reader of the C. F. C. Am but a boy, and thought I would ask you to insert in the Companion a few of my thoughts on temperance. Temperance is one of the greatest blessings that the human family is blessed with, while intemperance is one of the worst evils that man is subject to. It robs the once happy homes. The family that once lived in peace and pleasure is parted and put asunder. The loving wife, who toils at the spinning-wheel, the loom or the wash-tub, all the day long, when night draws nigh and she tired and wearied with her days toil, is waiting for her once loved husband, who promised at the alter that he would love and protect her until death should separate them. To her sad surprise she beholds her husband coming home tottering, reeling, tumbling from one side of the road to the other. With trembling hand he raises the unwelcome latch and enters in, looks around, and espies his beloved lying on the bed resting from her day's toil. With tottering limbs he starts for his couch, but does not succeed. He falls over in a senseless state and there he goes to sleep, and that is the last of him until the effects of the alcohol begin to die. Then he raises out of his delirium and asks and wonders, what has been going on. But oh! now comes the worst. He abuses his wife, curses his God, profanes his name till it seems as if heaven and hell would come together. I do not belong to any church, but I do despise intemperance. I believe it to be a sin. The Bible has said, "Touch not, taste not, handle not the unclean thing." If we do such things we go contrary to the law of God and man. Therefore, we ought to give more earnest heed to the things that we hear, lest at any time we let them slip. I would advise all young men to avoid intemperance; shun it as you would a viper. Live just as far away from it as you can. An incident occured some days ago in our little village that will do me, should I live a thousand years. A young man who was a member of the Disciple Church, seemingly a believer in God and his commandments. On account of a lady with whom he was associating, his father was angry with him and entreated him not to go any more as he was spending his time and money for no good purpose. The very next day he got drunk and came home and abused his father, knocked his mother down, and defied the living God to lay hands on him. For fear of being too lengthy I will close, hoping that you will ponder these things, and live "temperate in all things" and God will reward you.

An Inquiry.

Who is Jesse Hiestand, of Palestine, Ill.? Is he a member of our fraternity? By the drift of his language, in C. F. C., current vol. page 150, I should certainly not understand him to be a brother, but rather what we term a Soul Sleeper. Who can give me the desired information?

E. K. Buechley.

Queries.

1. In Matthew 13th chapter our Savior spake many things to the multitude by parables; among which we find the parable of the wheat and tares, which were both to grow together until harvest. Query. Did the Savior mean, that they would both grow together, in one individual? Will some of the brethren or sisters give their views?

2. Our Savior's sermon on the mount contains several passages which I will submit to the brethren, for information. Query: Are the following passages to be understood literally, or is a part of them to be spiritually understood? See Matth. 5: 29, 30 39, 40, 41, 42; Luke 6: 30, 34, 35.

J. W, Harshbarger.

Girard, Ill.

I would like some of the brethren to give their views on Matt 9: 16, 17, and the latter clause of the 7th verse of the 10th chapter of Luke, with the 46th verse of the 2nd chapter of Acts, and the 1st verse of the 1st chapter of St. John?

D. S. McDaniel.

Will some brother or sister give a thorough explanation on Mark the 3rd chapter, 28th and 29th verses; and Luke the 12th chapter and 10th verse which reads thus: "Sinning against the Holy Ghost shall not be forgiven."

D. P. E.

As the C. F. C is a medium wherein the brethren have liberty to express their opinions in regard to different subjects in the Scriptures, I would desire some of the brethren or sisters to give an explanation on the 29th verse of the 15th chapter of 1st Corinthians, reading as follows: "Else what shall they do which are baptized for the dead? If the dead rise not at all, why are they then baptized for the dead?" What does the apostle mean by being baptized for the dead?

Your brother in Christ.

Wm. H. Clemmer.

Will some brother give an explanation on Luke 16: 21—23?

The Christian Family Companion, Is published every Tuesday, at $1.50 a year, by Henry R. Holsinger, who is a member of the Church of the Brethren, sometimes known by the name of "German Baptists," and vulgarly or maliciously called "Dunkards."

The design of the work is to advocate truth, expose error, and encourage the true Christian on his way to Zion.

It assumes that the New Testament is the Will of God, and that no one can have the promise of salvation without observing all its requirements, that among these are Faith, Repentance, Prayer, Baptism by trine immersion, Feet Washing, the Lord's Supper, the Holy Communion, Charity, Nonconformity to the world, and a full resignation to the whole will of God, as he has revealed it through his Son Jesus Christ.

So much of the affairs of this world as may be thought necessary to the proper observance of the signs of the times, or such as may tend to the moral, mental, or physical benefit of the Christian will be published, thus removing all occasion for coming into contact with the so-called Literary or Political journals.

Subscriptions may begin at any time.

Over There.

To toil for the Savior is sweet,
All his trials and sorrows to share,
If with him at last we may meet,
And his praises recount over there.

Though thorny the path that we tread,
Though here scorn and derision we bear,
Think that thorns once encircled his head,
And of reigning with him over there.

Let others, deceived by the foe,
Upon earth seek a home to prepare.
Pain mingles with pleasure below;
But not so in our home over there.

Over there, is no sorrow nor pain,
Over there, all is joyous and fair;
Our loss over there will be gain,
All is peace in our home over there.

Oh! give me a home with the blest,
Where, released from all sorrow and care,
The weary are ever at rest,
On the evergreen shore—over there.

Transactions of Matthew, from the Ascension of Christ to his Martyrdom.

After our blessed Savior's ascension into heaven, Matthew for the first eight years, at least, preached in different parts of Judea; but afterward he left the country of Palestine, to convert the Gentile world. Before his departure, he was entreated by the Jewish converts to write the history of the life and actions of the blessed Jesus, and leave it among them as a standing monument of what he had so often delivered to them in his sermons. This he readily complied with, as we shall more particularly mention in giving an account of his gospel. After his leaving Judea, he travelled into several parts, especially Ethiopia; but the particular places he visited are not known with any certainty. However, after laboring indefatigably in the vineyard of his Master, he suffered martyrdom at a city of Ethiopia, called Naddabar; but by what kind of death is not absolutly known, though the general opinion is, that he was slain with an halbert.

Matthew was a remarkable instance of the power of religion, in bringing men to a better temper of mind. If we reflect upon his circumstances while he continued a stranger to the great Redeemer of mankind, we shall find that the love of the world had possessed his heart. But notwithstanding this, no sooner did Christ call him, than he abandoned, without the least scruple or hesitation, all his riches: nay, he not only renounced his lucrative trade, but ran the greatest hazard of displeasing the masters who employed him, for quitting their service without giving them the least notice, and leaving his accounts in confusion. Had our blessed Savior appeared as a secular prince, clothed with temporal power and authority, it would have been no wonder for him to have gone over to his service; but when he appeared under all the circumstances of meanness and disgrace; when he seems to promise his followers nothing but misery and suffering in this life; and to propose no other rewards than the invisible encouragements of another world, his change appears truly wonderful and surprising: but divine grace can subdue all opposition. His contempt of the world appears in his exemplary temperance and abstemiousness from all delights and pleasures; nay, even from the ordinary conveniences and accomodations of it. He was mean and modest in his own opinion, always preferring others to himself, for, whereas the other evangelists in discribing the apostles by pairs, constantly place him before Thomas, he mostly placed him before himself; the rest of the evangelists are careful to mention the honors of his apostleship, but speak of his former sordid, dishonest, and disgraceful course of life, only under the name of Levi; while he himself sets it down with all the circumstances, under his own proper and common name: a conduct which at once commends the prudence and candor of the apostle, and suggests to us this useful reflection, that the greatest sinners are not excluded from divine grace; nor can any, if penitent, have just reason to despair, when publicans and sinners find mercy at the throne of grace.

The last thing we shall notice in the life of this apostle is his gospel, written at the entreaty of the Jewish converts, while he abode in Palestine, but at what time is uncertain: some will have it to have been written eight, some fifteen, and some thirty years, after our Lord's ascension. It was originally written in Hebrew, but soon after translated into Greek by one of the disciples. After the Greek translation was admitted, the Hebrew copy was chiefly owned and used by the Nazarei, a middle sect between Jews and Christians: with the former they adhere to the rites and ceremonies of the Mosaic Law, and with the latter they believe in Christ, and embrace his religion; and hence this gospel has been styled, "The Gospel according to the Hebrews," and "The Gospel of the Nazarines."

Wealth.

Wealth, a very simple word, yet embraces a vast amount, or in other words, in wealth there lie hidden many mysterious things. The rich may live in great splendor and pomp; and carry, as it were, the world with them; yet a man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth. Our happiness and comfort do not depend on our having a great deal of wealth. The life of the soul undoubtedly does not depend on it; for the things of this world will not satisfy its needs, or its desires; nor last so long as the soul will last. Even the happiness and life of the body do not depend on having a vast amount of these things; for many live and get through this world comfortably, and have but very little of its wealth. While on the other hand, many, who are blest with wealth, live miserably. They have no peace day or night, and bereave their souls of good; the good which God so dearly bought on Calvery's rugged cross. Now look back nearly nineteen centuries ago, and see Jesus, lying in a manger. Poorer, never man was! He was laid in a manger, instead of a cradle, with swaddling clothes around him. Now this was an instance of humiliation of our Lord Jesus. This is not the only instance we have on record. If you turn to John 13th, you will find an act of humiliation, and one that we are strictly commanded to observe; it was an act of condescension. Now, if we want to inherit eternal life in Christ Jesus, we must be humble; we must deny ourselves of a great many pleasures that wealth might afford. Christ says, "Take my yoke upon you and learn of me; for I am meek and lowly in heart, and ye shall find rest unto your souls. For my yoke is easy, and my burden light." These are the words of him of whom our father in heaven said, "This is my beloved son, hear ye him."

Salvation of Sinners.

"To him that knoweth to do good and doeth it not, to him it is sin." In the common acts of life, it is counted right that a man should do as well as he knows; and when a man knows his duty and fails to do it, he is blamable. Ignorance may excuse a fault, knowledge certainly aggravates it; and judged by this rule, all have sinned, all have known better than they have done. God counts all mankind as sinners, either penitent or impenitent. He may perceive many grades, but he has only two kinds of men. He puts all sinners into one class. If this were for punishment, they might perhaps complain, but as it is for pardon, there can be no reasonable objection; so God has concluded all under sin, that he might have mercy upon all. Such are the persons that Jesus came into the world to save—the sinful, the guilty, the condemned, the helpless, and the lost. These were they whose miseries moved his pity, and whose needs aroused his love, and brought him down from heaven, not to do his own will, or to seek his own pleasure, but to the ruined and perishing sons of men. "This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners," who had broken the law, despised his mercy, refused his grace, and trampled his words beneath their feet. Shall we not listen to a saying so wonderful as this? Shall we not give earnest heed to such a faithful saying, and accept it as a word of hope and comfort to the ruined and the lost? No man seeks salvation till he knows the need of it. Jesus Christ has provided a way whereby men can be saved. He has borne their sins in his own body on the tree. He has opened the gate of pardon, and bids us enter boldly and find mercy. He has manifested his love to the rebellious and the lost. "God sent not his son into the world to condemn the world, but that the world through him might be saved. For God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on him should not perish, but should have everlasting life."

Our heavenly Father waits to save us. He does not ask us to wait a day, or pray a week, or seek a month or week, and strive a year. We must do and suffer all his righteous will. We must yield our whole soul to Christ; give up our own will, and submit to the will of God. Think of the tears that were shed on Mount Olivet; the sweat and groans in Gethsemane; the meekness of the Lamb led to the slaughter; the blood and anguish on the cruel cross; the place where he had been rejected, mocked, and slain. His justice has been called revenge; his patience, indifference; his long suffering, weakness; and his loving pity, has been utterly condemned; and as long as man cherishes these thoughts and feelings towards God, reconciliation is hopeless. But oh! if this wearied, bleeding, groaning world could know the heart of God, there would be a mighty change! But they do not know. He proclaimed liberty to the captives. He came to the lowliest and saddest sons and daughters of Adam, and spake words of peace to all. The vilest were not rejected. He has forgiven me. In the name of Jesus, I here testify to you the word of grace and mercy from on high—this faithful saying which is worthy of acceptation, "that Jesus Christ came into the world to save sinners;" and by the authority of my heavenly Master, I bid you come and share with me the mercy that God bestows on guilty man. Come without hesitation. Come without fear. Come without doubt; and come without delay, pardon is offered; mercy is extended; salvation is free; but "how shall we escape if we neglect so great salvation."

Thoughts on the Future.

Being lonely this Sabbath evening we have been reflecting upon the past, present and future. We have had some serious reflections. We have thought of the many who began life with as bright a prospect as our unworthy self, and where do we find them this evening? Who among us, my beloved brethren, sisters and friends, have not placed within the narrow limits of the grave, some loved one in the past year? Oh! the many vacant seats, the many sad hearts. Perhaps some of us can say, we are all here yet that were here at the commencement of the year. But methinks we need not go back far before we can see what Time with his scythe has done. How many of our loved ones have been cut down! Yes, your unworthy sister remembers, 'tis but a short time since a kind father and loving mother had to be placed in that narrow house, appointed for us all. Go back a little farther, and we remember a dear brother cut down in the space of a few days, by the chilly hand of death; and the little ones, five of whom are gone before to the eternal world, and methinks, are awaiting our arrival on that beautiful shore, in the sweet by and by.

We will come back to the year past, and we will look into the church where we are all one family, and how many of us are gone. We deeply feel the loss of our beloved elder and father in the church here at Pipe Creek. Oh, how we miss him! We often think, when we are assembled together, could our beloved brother come among us again, what a sermon he would preach! We often think of his many admonitions, one of which was that which Paul gave to his son Timothy, "Take heed to thyself and to the doctrine," which conains a great deal. Have we in the past year, my beloved brethren and sisters, given the heed to ourselves and to the doctrine that was our duty to do? I think we will all find ourselves wanting; yea, far behind! Have we been progressing in the divine life or have we been retrograding? Let us examine ourselves in this matter and wherein we have come short of our duty, wherein we have been burying our talent, let us double our diligence and with renewed energy take courage, and resolve that, if our Father help us, we will try and run the race with more patience in the future.

What will you do, my dear friends, who have as yet done nothing for Jesus? will you not at once enter into the Master's service? will not the past suffice you to have wrought the will of the Gentiles? We say to you, in the language of Moses to his father-in-law, "Come and go with us and we will do you good;" for we know not whether we will live to see the close of another year. You, my dear friends, may be in eternity and unprepared. Methinks it should arouse us from our lethargy, and awake us to our best interest.

Fearing we have been already too lengthy, we close, and in doing so would say to the COMPANION a joyous future to you! joyous in being good, and in doing good.

The Church of Christ.

Our blessed Savior, while on this earth fulfilling his heavenly mission as he had received it from his Father, informs us in the 16th chapter of Matthew, 18th verse, that he would establish a church, against which the gates of hell should not prevail. The intimation is plainly given, that the prince of darkness will powerfully exert himself, in opposition to the true church. All the arguments and inventions, that his Satanic majesty can devise, will be hurled against her, and against her adherents. Persecutions and martyrdom then awaited the followers of the Lord Jesus Christ, and they were terribly fulfilled in the Dark Ages, when the streets of Rome were made to flow with the blood of the martyred saints.

But that age of persecution and martyrdom is in the past. Satan soon saw that he could not prevail in that way; for their numbers were increasing instead of diminishing. The Lord was raising up able and zealous defenders of the church in their midst. Satan seeing that he could not prevail over the church of Christ, now begins to transform himself into an angel of light, and soon sows the seeds of discord and separation among the followers of Christ, and his church; and so well has he succeeded, that church organizations are now numbered by the hundred. From this we learn that Christ is to be esteemed above and before all other objects, visible or invisible; for by him were all things created that are in heaven, and that are in the earth, whether they be thrones, or dominions, or principalities, or powers; all things were created by him and for him, and he is before all things, and is (or should be), the head of the body—the church. Therefore we should be very particular in selecting and uniting ourselves with a denomination that professes to be the church of our Lord Jesus Christ; for in this age of the world, we have so many different denominations professing Christianity, that a man can suit himself somewhere, no difference what his opinions are; and we presume that many, very many, follow their own opinions, without consulting the word of God. If but they are fully persuaded in their own opinions, they are lulled into seeming security, scarcely knowing what are the commands and teachings of that word, until they appear before the tribunal bar to render up their account to God. Yea, I imagine I hear some one in a loud and boasting tone of voice, saying, "Lord, Lord, open unto us. We have eaten and drunk in thy presence, and in thy name have we prophesied; and in thy name have we cast out devils; and in thy name done many wonderful works; and thou hast taught in our streets." But the Savior will answer them' "I know you not whence you are; depart from me all ye workers of iniquity." Those persons seem to have been sure of their acceptance with God, and of their admittance into the mansions of bliss, that are prepared for the true and humble followers of our Savior. Thus we see that something more is necessary.

When we make a choice of a denomination, professing Christianity, we must not consult our natural inclinations, and our opinions, but we must search for the good old paths, and walk therein. We must search for primitive Christianity, as it was in the days of our Savior and his Apostles; and in order to do this we must consult the Word of God, embrace its teachings, have no opinions of our own to set up in contradiction to his will. If we follow the dictates of our own desires, it is not likely that we will submit to the humble requirements of his will; for the carnal mind is not subject to the will of God.

As before stated, Satan has sown the seed of discord—disunion—hence we have so many different denominations; and some of them surely follow the dictates of their carnal minds; for if you apply to them to become members of their societies, they will admit you upon any conditions almost that you desire—without baptism, or by being sprinkled, or having water poured on you, or by immersion, single or triune. Now, if we apply a little good, common sense, it will teach us that not all are right, and cannot meet the Divine approbation. It is as much impossible for all these different modes to be right, as it is for a great number of clocks, all differing in time, to be right.

Kind reader, let us search the Scriptures, take them for our guide, read them impartially, throwing aside all preconceived opinions, teachings, and doctrines of men, and then we will arrive at a true conclusion as regards those different modes of administration.

But some will tell us, that it is very uncharitable to say that but one church is right, and is the true church of Christ, and thereby declare all others to be false. We consider this no more uncharitable than it is uncharitable to believe any awful truth which God has revealed. No Christian can be justly charged with a want of charity for believing that many are called but that few are chosen, or that without faith it is impossible to please God—that there is but one Lord, one faith and one baptism—that he who will not hear the church must be considered as the heathen and the publican. To believe this is certainly not uncharitable; for our blessed Savior was all love and charity, and his heart glowed with the tenderest love for the unhappy objects who had fallen under God's displeasure. Turks, Jews, Atheists, Mohammedans and other false organizations, may as justly upbraid every denomination of Christians with a want of charity, as for other denominations to upbraid us with a want of charity, when we say that but one organization can be the true church of Christ. To us it appears as undeniable as the existence of the God-head, that the religion revealed by him must be one in all it prescribes and professes. To assert, that God can declare to one body of Christians that certain points are to be believed, and to another, that they are not to be believed, is to attribute to to him what is conflicting with his very nature: it would authorize the infidelity of the Atheist, who would then exclaim triumphantly that he can never be justly condemned for refusing to believe in a God who contradicts himself.

Well, I imagine I hear one say, "If you uphold the idea of but one true Christian church, it follows conclusively that all other churches are false churches; consequently all that belong to them must be lost." We do not mean to say that all who mistake the true church in their choice of a religious denomination will be lost, and suffer the punishment that the finally impenitent sinner will suffer. We believe the truth, to the very word and letter, that every one will be rewarded according to his works, and that some will be saved. "For every man's work shall be made manifest: for the day shall declare it: because it shall be revealed by fire; and the fire shall try every man's work of what sort it is. If any man's work abide which he hath built thereupon, he shall receive a reward. If any man's work shall be burned, he shall suffer loss, but he himself shall be saved, yet so as by fire." 1 Cor. 3: 13—15. Thus we see that some may be saved and their works be burned; yet they shall suffer loss Consequently it is of the utmost importance that we be very careful in making choice of a religious denomination, and in connecting ourselves therewith. And yet the way is so plain that none need err therein who are not wilfully blind; for the true church does exist, and will exist to the end of time. And it is to that church that we direct the honest inquirer after truth, and in that church will be found the true religion taught in the word of God. There will be found in her, that true, pure, and holy worship of God, which he himself approves and commands, and she yields obedience to all the ordinances that are grounded on the word of his unerring truth, and in the way and manner described therein.

Search for the good old path, and walk therein.

Exposition of Colossians. No. 2. 1: 21, 22.

The law of God is its own executioner within our souls, and we cannot escape its sentence; for we cannot abolish the law of our own minds. It is not necessary for God to have bailiffs to execute the penalty of his laws: they inflict their own penalty. When a man sins he cannot remain in communion with God and enjoy its blessing; his sins cut him off from God, make him feel that God is his enemy, and awaken feelings of fear in his soul. He feels that a gulf has been opened between his soul and God. Like Adam, he dreads the Divine presence, and tries to hide from it. This is the first effect of sin.

Second, there is a feeling that we are God's enemies. This is the second step in alienation, and may be illustrated by the decline of human friendship, and its change into alienation. Sometimes friendship grows cold; settles down into indifference, and even changes into hatred. In this case a secret sense of wrong will come into the mind. The man feels that he has not done right, and conscience condemns him. In this case the mind immediately sets to work to find some excuse to justify itself in doing what has been done; and the only way to escape is to throw the blame off on some one else or on the one from whom we are alienated. The feeling, "I am not to blame, but he is," comes up in the mind; and he thinks about it, until what was only a feeling of alienation becomes bitter animosity Thus, a member of the church does something that is wrong, and he knows that the church is cognizant of it. A feeling of guilt comes into his mind and conscience condemns him. He almost instinctively begins to look around for something to justify his conduct at the bar of his own mind, and he begins to find fault with the church. This, that, and the other is wrong; and he talks about these things until he gets angry at the church, and what was at first only a feeling of alienation becomes bitter animosity. He hates the church, and feels that he is its enemy. Thus, in alienation from God, the first step is a feeling of indifference; communion is interrupted; irregularity in religious duties is commenced; actual sin widens the breach, and a great gulf is opened between the soul and God.

There are two classes of men; one we call weak, and the other strong men. They both become enemies to God, but reach this state through different roads. The weak man, when he does wrong, lays the blame on circumstances, and says to his own mind, "I know that this is wrong, but I cannot help it; the circumstances in which I am placed compel me to do it;" and by degrees he becomes a fatalist. This engenders a feeling of hostility against God, for making circumstances so that he cannot control them. The strong man reaches this state of animosity in another way. When a strong man does wrong he feels a sense of humiliation; he loses his self-respect. This degrades him in his own feelings; and this degradation produces anger against God. Go into the lanes and by-ways of our cities, and you will find degraded men and women, who hate everything that is respectable, because it is respectable. Sin has produced degradation; and this has awakened a feeling of animosity against all respectability. They turn upon it with feelings of bitter defiance, and hatred. Thus the strong man feels toward God. His sins awaken a feeling of degradation; and to escape this, he throws the blame all on God, and this grows into hatred of him. In this state of mind, man would dethrone God, if he could; and when he knows that he cannot do this, the demon of vice stirs up within him the bitter feeling that filled the soul of Job's wife, "Curse God and die." This is alienation from God; and this is hell, and an awful hell it is! Hell is not merely a place to be banished into: its fires are kindled in the soul, and they commence to burn there. The fountain of misery is in man, and not outside of him. External circumstances may contribute to his unhappiness; but they alone cannot make a man miserable. Put a pure, good man into hell, and he would be happy there; for the fountain of happiness is within him, and the mind rises superior to outer circumstances.

But these people were reconciled to God. Reconciliation is to produce harmony where there is discord; and this reconciliation embraces the following things:

1. Reconciliation to God. "When we were enemies we were reconciled to God by the death of his Son." See Rom. 5: 10. In this reconciliation, the proud spirit of self-excuse is taken away; and the man no longer desires to excuse his sins; but he feels as the publican did when he prayed, "God, be merciful to me a sinner." The rebellious will is humbled under the mighty hand of God, and the prayer is heard, "What wilt thou have me to do?" The soul, instead of being hardened against God, is opened to the divine influence. Then the sufferings of life are not an evidence of God's wrath, but the necessary discipline of a kind Father. This change in our feelings reveals God in a new light to us, and we see him in his true character. He no longer appears as an enemy; but as a tender parent. The universe looks different, and life assumes a new aspect. It is no longer a dull, dreary thing, but a divine blessing. Then we hear the voice of God in everything; and we feel like exclaiming with David of old,

"Praise ye the Lord. Praise ye the Lord from the heavens, praise him in the highest. Praise him, all ye angels, praise ye him, all ye hosts. Praise ye him sun and moon: praise him all ye stars of light. Praise ye him, ye heaven of heavens, and ye waters that be above the heavens."

This reconciliation is accomplished through the death of Christ: "You that were sometimes alienated and enemies in your mind, by wicked works, yet now hath he reconciled in the body of his flesh, through death." "The body of his flesh" means, the body in which he lived. The revelation that the death of Christ gives us of God, brings the sinner into a willingness to be reconciled to him. It shows his wonderful love for man; the deep interest he feels in him, and thus reveals the sinfulness of sin; for how terrible the wickedness of sinning against such a God! The death of Christ lays us under the strongest of all obligations to be reconciled to God." The love of Christ constraineth us."

2. Reconciliation of man to man. "Having abolished in his flesh the enmity, even the law of commandments contained in ordinances, for to make in himself of twain one new man, so making place." Eph. 11: 15. Christ was born of a woman, and under the law; but when he died, he was no longer a Jew. He was then the Savior of the world. He was no longer narrowed to place or country; but the universal Savior. This idea is brought out in this remarkable statement by Paul: "For the love of Christ constraineth us: because we thus judge, that, if one died for all, they were all dead; and that he died for all, that they which live should not henceforth live unto themselves, but unto him which died for them, and rose again; wherefore, henceforth know we no man after the flesh. Yea, though we have known Christ after the flesh, yet now, henceforth know we him no more." 2 Cor. 5: 14—16. To know a man after the flesh is to know him after his nation: it is to know him as a Jew, a Greek, or a Roman. They once knew Christ simply as a Jew, and saw him only as a Jew; but now they knew him as a Jew no longer. After his death, resurrection, and ascension to the right hand of God, they saw him as the Son of God and the mighty Savior of all men, puts all men on a level; and on this basis all men are to become one. This is the true foundation of universal brotherhood. Everything else has been tried and has failed. At the cross we learn that God is the Father of all men, and Christ the Elder brother.

But there is a deeper meaning than this: reconciliation by the cross means by the Spirit of the cross. And what was that? The spirit of love and self-sacrifice, of long-suffering and forgiveness. Christ died for his enemies. It is this Spirit that is to bring all men together; for this breaks down all middle walks of partition.

Love is not mere gratitude for favor received. This is the idea most Christians have of love; but it is a deeper principle than this. The parent loves the child more than the child loves the parent, and Christ loved the disciples more than they loved him. Why is this so? Because the parent has suffered for the child, and the Savior for the disciples. To love in its purest and highest sense, we must suffer, for those whom we love. This is what is meant by the saying, "It is more blessed to give than to receive." Benefits alone will not find the affections; but suffering will. When we suffer for an object, we learn to love it. How much stronger his love for his country is the mind of a soldier after he has suffered for it than it was before he suffered.

3. Reconciliation of man to himself. When we have done wrong we do not readily forgive ourselves. God may forgive us, but we do not. When we have done wrong, we want to suffer—we feel that we ought to suffer. A spirit of self-torture takes possession of the mind, and we cannot forgive ourselves and get back the feeling of self-respect. The death of Christ reconciles man to himself; for it was suffering in love: it was surrendering to that will of God. This is the spirit that reconciles man to himself—the suffering of the will of God. Just as far and as long as a man devotes himself to the good of others, does he forgive himself. This brings back the spirit of self-reconciliation. This is the spirit of the cross of Christ; for he was suffering for the good of others.

4. Reconciliation to duty. Discord between a man and his duty is a terrible state of things. This is the condition of most men; for very few are reconciled to their duty. We feel that we have not found our true place in the world. The mechanic feels that he was made for something better than what he is now doing. Thus it is with most men; and the dream of the majority is, that some day they will get out of the narrow field that they now occupy into their true place in life. Ambition tells them that they are fit for higher things; and that the life they are now living is forced upon them. The cross reconciles man to his duty; for what a life of self-denial the Savior lived! The whole details of his life are mean, and its circumstances wretched. What a condition for such a being as Christ to be in; and what a life for the Son of God to live! Yet he took up the labor of his life cheerfully. Ambition came and tempted him; vision of comfort without toil, by turning stones into bread; political power was offered to him; but he put all these things behind him and was contented to live a humble life and die the most shameful of all deaths. This spirit reconciles man to his duty; and teaches him to take up the work of life that Providence lays upon him. The work may be humble—so was the work of Christ.

My article is getting too long already, and I fear to weary the reader; but as I was deprived of going to meeting to-day, and while I was reading, I came to the two verses heading this article, and my thoughts ran somewhat in the direction as I have written above. In conclusion I would yet say, Brethren and sisters, when ambition tells us that we are fit for higher walks than where we are now treading, and we become dissatisfied with our work, let us get nearer to the cross, and open our eyes to its divine influence, till we become inspired with its spirit. This will reconcile us to our work, however humble it may be, and will not make us ashamed of doing his will and commandments, from the smallest to the greatest; and will make us think that, to obtain life eternal, we will have to do his commands all, and not only a part of them, and leave the rest undone. That would leave our work only half finished. Written from pure motives and in love.

A Surmiser.

"He is proud, knowing nothing, but doting about questions and strifes of words, whereof cometh envy, strife, railings, evil surmisings." 1 Timothy 6 : 4.

The Apostle Paul in writing to his son Timothy, gave rich instructions. It appears to me, that the entire chapter from which the heading is selected, is only what we call experience. We, as Bible readers, all well know, that Paul was once a great accuser, trying to disturb the Christian professor wherever he could. After his conversion, he saw where he was and what he was doing.—He could well inform his brethren what it was to blaspheme his Master. This should be sufficient to show the influence of such a character. I think we have plenty of them around us, almost wherever we go. I am sorry to say it, but it is true—worse than Paul at any time on record. At the time he was a surmiser, he did not pretend Christianity. He considered it an idle work, and tried to banish it. After his conviction he labored the other way.

The surmiser in our days, in many cases, pretends to be one of the humble Christians, which makes it worse. If they would only put their faith in Christ, a little stronger, or else put it entirely away, would be better logic.

"He is proud," says Paul. This is very true; we all see this almost every day.—He walks the street, thinking he knows it all; no one can teach him. He takes no advice or instruction from any one.—Paul says, "He knows nothing." This appears hard language, to tell a man he knows nothing, when he thinks he has swallowed a Bible, or a dictionary. Paul declares this to be the case, and we should not dispute him.

Paul has given some fruit by which we may know them. He says, they are "doting about questions and strifes of words." This we see almost daily. We might say foolish, idle talk. Prying into subjects not beneficial to any one. Sometimes, for the sake of argument, they will spend time to select such questions, as no one can answer, for reasons it is not given man to know. Strife of words, or contention, is frequently the result of angry feelings. When a man knows nothing, and yet wants to know all, then there is an opportunity for getting him angry. It will and does follow. Then we can expect envy, strife, and railings. These are the fruits of such a character. We can learn of them every day; we need not spend much time, nor go far.

A great many different meanings are selected out of the same chapter, so as to give a man his own will, so that he can be a pious or a zealous Christian, as well as a corrupt man in anything else.—We have people of the most offensive character; nothing can hurt their feelings in regard to misusing their neighbors and friends. They laugh and mock at those who are trying to serve their Master as they are directed. All that keeps them as members is, because they have their names on the church memorandum, and pay for the support of that society.—Poor is their religion, but their money goes at par. No wonder the Apostle Paul says, "The love of money is the root of all evil." It is true we can not do well without it, but we ought to know where and how to use it. I often thought that this evil (money) is the chief corner stone of many so-called religious societies. Such are built on the sand, and will not stand. Here is where the language of Paul is frequently applied. They are proud. They know nothing. They are doting about questions. When referred to the true point their sand gives way. They see with a clear sight, and cannot help but acknowledge the fact. They commence to consider, "If we give way, we must follow some other pursuit for a living; our members will no longer aid us; now what is to be done? why we must commence arguing, and must make our members believe something else, or they will drop off. They commence to preach some non-essentials to them; they rail on subjects of great importance; they commence preaching, "Just believe me, I will tell you the true way. This is the way: do just as I tell you." Instead of referring to Christ and his teachings, they refer to some men who tried the same game before them; they are afraid to say, "Thus saith the Lord." If the Apostle Paul did not understand this proceeding, he would not have written so definitely on this subject. There is great danger in this direction. Great many infidels and careless people are led to do what they do, on account of such controversy. Some are so well read in scripture, that they make their members believe, who don't understand Greek and Latin, who are not competent to understand these so-called non-essentials. They have faith strong enough to believe the pastor, but give them a history or newspaper, they will read it with a full understanding; years afterward they can relate the whole story, without any mistake, scarcely any different understanding among the whole of them. The most curious point for me is, to notice that the learned of different persuasions will widely disagree. The faith of a Methodist, Lutheran, Presbyterian, or any other, will, when educated in all the branches and languages, get up an argument, and disagree, so much so, that it seems impossible to believe that it only takes such to understand thoroughly what our Savior has appointed for us to do, and what should be left undone. But right here is the corner-stone for doting about questions, strife, railings, &c. These things should be taken into a serious consideration.

It appears to be fully carried out, what the Apostle Paul cautioned his son Timothy. The practice railing has done a great deal of harm, and does yet; so much so, that we should watch more carefully every day. The time will come, is perhaps near, when we have to render an account for all we say, think or do. A pity that one should not be able to stand, when the Savior calls, "Come." I say, let us try to gain that inheritance, "where moth nor rust do not corrupt, nor thieves break through and steal.

A Sweet Heart-Sin.

Let me step into your heart, sir, and peep upon its furniture. My hands are pretty honest, you may trust me; and nothing will be found, I fear, to tempt a man to be a thief. Well, to be sure, what a filthy closet is here! Never swept, for certain, since you were christened. And what a fat idol stands sulking in the corner! A sweet heart-sin, I warrant it. How it simpers, and seems as pleasant as a right eye. Can you find a will to part with it, or strength to pluck it out? And supposing you a match for this self-denial, can you so command your heart as to hate the sin you do forsake? This is certainly required. Truth is called for in the inward parts. God will not have sin only cast aside, but cast away with abhorrence. So he speaks, "Ye that love the Lord hate evil."—John Berridge.

Hope without patience would be life kindling into over-intensity, and burning itself out in fruitless longings.

Patience without hope would be the decay of life's flame for want of nourishment—till it would sink into the quietude of death. Whenever hope rises into impatience it is the will of God that quiet waiting should lay its hand upon it, and bid it "rest in the Lord and wait patiently for him, and not fret, "for there is purpose in his delay, and occupation meanwhile for us. When patient waiting, on its side, becomes indifferent or torpid, it is not less the will of God that hope should come and wake it up, as the cry did the slumbering virgins, "Behold the bridegroom cometh, go ye forth to meet Him."—Rev. John Ker.

Do not mistake a tendency for a talent; nor conclude that what you dislike to do is not rightfully demanded of you.—Carlyle.

Daily Devotion.

When we look around us, we behold the works of Natnre. When we cast our eyes upward, we behold the starry firmament, that showeth the handiwork of the Almighty. And frequently we can see the blue skies ever our heads, overcast by clouds, and see the vivid flash of lightning. accompanied by the roar of the thunderbolt, that shoots with its resistless velocity upon the earth ,that it seems to shake creation. But soon the thick clouds pass away, and the sun again appears in its brilliancy ; and then we can behold that bow in the cloud, that God placed there for a token of the covenant that he would no more destroy the earth with a flood—that seed time and harvest should never fail while his blessings rest on the children of men—aud that day and night should not cease. These are domestic blessings that we receive from his hand ; and alone through his mercies we are entitled to these and all other blessings. But alas ! how solemn the thought, we are careless to reflect on past blessings that we daily receive from his bountiful hand ! It is our duty daily to return our humble thanks to God for his mercies, that we realize every day.

Time and space will not permit me to enumerate the manifold blessings of God ; and, indeed, it is beyond reason to do so. I feel sorry to say that our devotion to God is neglected too often. We are taught to watch and pray that that day will not come on us as a thief in the night; also to give thanks in every thing, for this is the will of our Lord Jesus Christ concerning us. But as I said before, this is often neglected, Every good gift and every perfect gift cometh from above, or is from above, and cometh down from the Father of lights. A certain man that had plenty of everything that was necessary to sustain him in life, pointed out the fields that were his and said, "Whom do I need to thank for this, but myself?" and in less than half a year he was obliged to work by the day for something to sustain him. He returned no thanks to God who is able to give and to take away ; but placed all confidence in himself as being the architect of his prosperity. Brethren and sisters, we who have taken the yoke of Jesus on us and resolved to live for him, to bid adieu to Satan's service and shun the world's bewitching snares, let us be on our guard and watch and pray that we enter not into temptatiou.

Therefore let us not neglect our daily devotion to God. Daniel of old was saved in the midst of the most blood-thirsty monsters that are created, and many other instances I might mention ; but we are acquainted, more or less, with the Bible and our duty to God in this respect, only we are often neglectful. Let us keep this commandment, "Pray without ceasing," and live as valiant soldiers for Jesus, and God will love us, protect us in life, and after death receive us home to glory.

"What Is Truth ?"

Thus asked Pilate, of One who stood before him, and who had shortly before declared unto him," For for this cause came I into the world, that I should bear witness unto the truth."

Intent on proving to the rabble without, that he was Caesar's friend, he waited not for an answer to the question he had asked, and which to all is of such momentous weight, but "went out," and with the words, "I find in him no fault at all," offered to comply with their custom of releasing whom they would, on this occasion either a notorious robber, or this man in whose mouth was found no guile

Many, at the present day, are not inquisitive as the Roman Governor, while many others may ask, "What is truth ?" but are no more anxious for an answer than he, having, like him, some friend to gain, or retain, and fearing the consequences of losing such, never wait for, nor seek, an answer at all.

But there are a few who not only ask the question, but are intent on an answer ? and should one be given that cuts off the friendship of Caesar, or the severing of long-cherished idols and strong but pernicious habits, they wait not to dally with duty, but yield with the requirement, "If any man will come after Me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow me,"

If Pilate cared not for an answer to so important a question, it need not hinder us from learning what is truth.

"Search the Scriptures," and there, in words clear and legible to every unbiased mind, we may read, "Sanctify them through thy truth, thy word is truth."

Again, we read, "If ye continue in My word, then are ye my disciples indeed ; and ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free." John 8 : 31, 32.

But, many, like the Jews of old will be ready to say, "We were never in bondage to any man." They fail to see their subjection to evil habits, fashion's freaks, and public opinion.

But let them fully understand the claims of God's word upon them, and choose "the way, the truth, and the life," and indeed become disciples of Christ, and they will see the necessity of becoming free from these their masters; and the promise is, they shall be free.

Egyptian bondage is a fit comparison to the servitude that man is under who is the slave to any evil habit.

There is nothing like the truth that will set him completely free from its power. Such can answer the question that Pilate asked, and testify also to the sanctifying power of the word in reclaming them from darkness to light, from the service of Satan to the liberty of the sons of God.

Reading the Bible.

Read your Bible slowly. Take time, even if you have but little time.

A great mathematician once said that if his life depended upon solving a problem in two minutes he would spend one of the two in deciding how to do it. So in reading the Scriptures ; if you are pressed for time,—and this ought to be a rare case,—then spend the precious moments on a portion of the chapter. When you feel that the mind and heart begin to drink in the sentiment even of a single verse, then stop and drain the heavenly chalice, because the Divine Spirit is filling the cup.

To search the Scriptures with the clear unmoted eye of meditation, secures treasures of knowledge known only to him who thus coolly, piously, and philosophically studies the word of God.

Let any man give us the reason why, when the Scriptures are read so much memory retains so little, the quotations are so blundering and incorrect, if the reason is not found in the fact of hasty reading of the word of God. There, as elsewhere, man must reap as he sows.

Christian Union No. 2.

The mission of the Son of God in this world, was one of unparalleled self denial, toil, and suffering; and in all his condescension, labor and passion, he had one grand object in view—the salvation of sinners. He is our Redeemer, having redeemed us from the penalty of God's violated law; and he is our Savior, delivering us from the dominion and consequences of sin. As God is righteous, just, equitable, he proposes to save all by the same means, and on terms suited to our conditions. The only means is the blood—the atoning and sanctifying righteousness—of Christ our Redeemer and Savior; and the terms upon which the Lord proffers salvation, are plainly set forth in the Gospel.

The requirements of the Lord upon us are strictly equitable, as with him there is no respect of persons. As the gold and the silver, the cattle upon a thousand hills, the world and its fullness, are all God's, before him the king and the beggar, the master and servant, the circumcised and uncircumcised, male and female stand on an equality. To whom much is given, of him much will be required; and if but little is given, little will be demanded. On this same principle, if nothing is given, nothing is asked. He who imagines that the Lord will waive the demands of the law and be lenient with him in the judgment, because of his rank, title, or favored circumstances in life, will be sadly disappointed in the great day of accounts, to find that many a Lazarus, who was clothed in rags and afflicted with sores, will be more acceptable than he. The idiot whose senses are clogged and whose mind is shrouded in darkness, will not be held responsible for not acting intelligently, neither will the sound minded be justified by living and acting like the fool. The child, whose mind is not sufficiently developed to receive the knowledge of the Lord, will not be damned for not believing—"Of such is the kingdom of heaven;" neither will he whose mental powers are developed, be justified in unbelief, when he has access to the truth—"He that believeth not shall be damned.'

The love of the Father, the mediation of the Son, and the operations of the Holy Spirit, unitedly and harmoniously work together for the salvation of sinners. Love is the inexhaustible fountain from which flow all the sweet streams of God's mercy, goodness, and grace. The disciples of Christ must draw from this fountain, that they may have the mind of Christ, and that the love of God may dwell in them richly: even as a well of living water, that their every word and action may be as so many drops of mercy, pity, compassion, sympathy, good will, kindness, and obedience to God, making up their life-stream of love to God and man. In this sense the disciples of Christ must be one, according to our Savior's prayer, "That they may be one, even as we are one."

Christians, that are one in this exalted sense, have the same mind and judgment, and speak the same things. The Corinthians were deficient in this respect.—They had divisions among them, evincing a state of carnality; and hence Paul gives them this admonition: "I beseech you, brethren, by the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, that ye all speak the same thing, and that there be no divisions among you; but that ye be perfectly joined together in the same mind and in the same judgment." 1 Cor. 1: 10.—Paul urged this unity "by the name of our Lord Jesus Christ;" that is, by his authority, according to his will, as expressed in the petition, "That they may be one, even as we are one." To the Romans Paul said, "Be of the same mind one toward another," (12: 16); and, "Now the God of patience and consolation grant you to be like-minded one toward another according to Jesus Christ; that ye may with one mind and one mouth glorify God, even the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ;" (15: 5—7).—In his first epistle, Peter said, "Finally, be ye all of one mind, having compassion one of another;" (3: 8).

This one mind, that the disciples are so earnestly admonished to possess and cultivate, is the mind of Christ. Peter testifies, "Forasmuch then as Christ has suffered in the flesh, arm yourselves likewise with the same mind;" (1 Peter 4: 1). The disciples are to have the mind of Christ, and this mind is to be to them an armor wherewith to fight the battles of the Lord. If we have the mind of Christ, every throb of our hearts is in harmony with his will; his desires are our desires; his prayer, our prayer, and we are workers together with him. Here we begin to see the divine character of Christian Union. The Son submitted his will to the will of his Father; and he spake and did only what the Father commanded; the Son was in the Father, and the Father in the Son. So the will of the Father, as revealed to us by the Son, is our law; and we must bring every thought into subjection to the will of Christ; then, as the Father is in the Son, and the Son in the Father,, we will be one in them, and they will dwell with us. (See John 17: 21; 14: 23).

Christians that are thus united are one in their affections—have the same love.—"Fulfil ye my joy, that ye be likeminded, having the same love, being of one accord, of one mind;" (Phil. 2: 2). This "same love" is "the love of God," which "is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost which is given unto us;" (Rom. 5: 5). Having this love, we love God because he first loved us, (1 John 4: 19). The love of God is ever the same; and if we have indeed the love of God in our hearts, we will not only love God, but we will love what he loves and what he hates we will hate: the same love will ever love the same things. No wonder the Apostle says that love is greater than either faith or hope.

Love moved the Father to give his only begotten Son for our rescue; love prompted the Son to condescend to our low estate, to toil, suffer and die for our salvation; all the operations of the Holy Spirit are manifestations of love; and every child of God, every true disciple of Jesus Christ, has the love of God shed abroad in his heart. Says John, "Beloved let us love one another; for love is of God, and every one that loveth (with the love of God, of course) is born of God, and knoweth God. He that loveth not, (that is with the love of God) knoweth not God, for God is love." It is folly for a person to think that he can be an heir of Heaven, so long as he is without this love; and it is madness for him to think that he is in possession of the love of God, so long as he does not love what God loves, or so long as his affections wilfully cling to anything which he knows God hates. "Beloved, if God so loved us, we ought also to love one another. * * * If we love one another, God dwelleth in us, and his love is perfected in us. * * * God is love; and he that dwelleth in love, dwelleth in God, and God in him. If a man say, I love God, and hateth his brother, he is a liar; for he that loveth not his brother whom he hath seen, how can he love God whom he hath not seen? And this commandment have we of him, That he who loveth God loves his brother also." 1 John 4th chapter. Love is the motive which prompts to true obedience and that renders our service acceptable to God.—Without love, though a man might speak with the tongues of men and of angels, yet is he only as sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal. Though a man has the gift of prophecy, understands all mysteries and all knowledge, has all faith, bestows all his wealth to relieve the needy, and even gives his body to be burned, yet, if he has not love as the motive to induce these things, he is nothing in the sight of God, and his excellencies and works in the end will benefit him nothing. See 1 Cor. 13th chapter.

Love is the bond of Christian Union—"the bond of perfectness:" "And above all things put on charity (love), which is the bond of perfectness." Col. 3: 4.

Love is the badge of discipleship. "By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love one to another." John 13: 35.

Love is a debt which we owe to all mankind; and in discharging this obligation we work for the good of all: "Love your enemies," (Matt. 5: 44); "Owe no man anything but to love one another.—Love worketh no ill to his neighbor, therefore love is the fulfilling of the law." Rom. 13: 8, 10.

Love enables the Christian to suffer ill-treatment, and still to be kind; preserves him from envy and rashness; keeps him in the vale of humility; guides him in his decorum; enables him to deny himself of that which might be lawful, for the good of others; preserves him from provocation and from evil thoughts; gives delight in the truth, fortitude and strength under all circumstances; is the fortress of faith and hope: in short, love is the never-failing, ever-living fountain from which all the Christian graces and fruits of the Spirit flow into the soul of the humble, faithful disciple of Christ.

Love prompts to obedience; and hence the faithful are governed by the same law. "If a man love me, he will keep my words," (John 14: 23); "Whereto we have already attained let us walk by the same rule." Phil. 3: 16.

If persons can have the love of God shed abroad in their hearts; if they can be knit together, rooted and grounded in love; if they can be of the same mind, speak the same things, and walk by the same rule, and yet have different societies with their distinctive peculiarities, differing in doctrines and conflicting in practice, then our prayer for Christian Union is vain, and sectarians may thank God for a divided, disrupted, schismatical, confused, and conflicting Christianity. Before you thank God for this unhappy state of affairs, ponder well the prayer of our blessed Lord, "That they may be one, even as we are one."

Origin of the Mourner's, or Anxious Bench.

Dear Editors and Brethren, it becoming known that I was making efforts to ascertain the origin of the Mourner's Bench, I have been strongly solicited, and urged, by many, to have it published in our papers, some naming one, and some another one, &c. I have at last found it in the "Life and Labors of James Quinn," by John F. Wright. Although this work was published in 1851, it is nevertheless out of print, and I had a long and tedious search before I obtained a copy in a second-hand bookstore in Baltimore. And whereas our brethren and readers generally are not overmuch concerned in procuring biographies of Methodist preachers, I will for their information give the historical extract, and without partiality I will endure the writing toil and give a copy to the COMPANION, Visitor, and the Pilgrim. It is as follows:

"This year, (1833) he (James Quinn) frequently invited penitent souls to the seats vacated for their accommodation, that they might have the concentrated sympathy, solicitude, and prayers of such as had access to the throne of grace, and influence at the court of heaven. About this time the question was agitated as to the distinguished individual who first introduced the practice of inviting penitent persons to the Mourner's Bench. Hear Mr. Quinn on this subject: 'Something has been said, in a late number of the Christian Advocate and Journal, on the subject of inviting mourners to the vacated seats or railing around the communion table—for I dislike the term altar, or altar for prayer, on such occasions. A Jew or Catholic may use the term consistently with his faith on the subject of altar and sacrifices, but an enlightened protestant believer, when he thinks, speaks, sings, or worships, extends his views beyond temples made with hands. * * * * But to return. The writer (in the paper referred to) seems to think that L. Dow first introduced the practice in 1802–3; but the first I (Quinn) ever saw or heard of it, was in 1795 or 6 at a watch-night held in the house of that mother in our Israel, the widow Mary Hawthorn, near Uniontown, Pa. The person who conducted the meeting was that holy, heavenly-minded man, the Rev. Valentine Cook. Blessed man! In imagination I view him now, near or quite six feet in stature, quite stooped-shouldered, dark complexion, coarse, black, curly hair, not much taken care of, small, deep-set, black eye, and full of intelligence, strong, well-arched brows, high cheek-bones, and an unusually large mouth. He was not handsome; but when he conversed on the subject of religion—and it was almost his constant theme—and more especially when he preached, there was a sweet and almost heavenly benignity beaming in his countenance, presenting rather an unearthly attraction. It was next to impossible for the most heedless to remain uninterested under the sound of his voice. Mr. Cook's subject was the qualifications, duties, and awful responsibilities of the watchman. His sermon was close and augmentative, giving to the greedy and sleepy dogs, as the prophet styles the avaricians and slothful watchmen, or ministers, a portion; observing as he passed along that those who were least laborious were often the most clamorous for their worldly gain. The sermon was closed with an almost overwhelming exhortation, which appeared as though it must carry all before it. Then came the invitation to the mourners to come to the vacated seats, to be prayed with and for. I think this was new, perfectly new, for the people were panic struck; and I confess I was greatly moved, for it appeared to me as if the two worlds were coming together. Verily methought the very hair of my flesh stood up. He, however was very particular in giving the scriptural character of a true, penitent, and, in the most affectionate and convincing manner, invited such, and none but such, to come; alleging at the same time, that if any should dare to act as did Ananias and his wife, they might be met as these were. O, it was an awful, yet glorious time of the gracious power and presence of God! Several souls found peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ, and some obtained the blessing of perfect love. But brother Cook, and most of those who united with him in the meeting, have passed away; yet have they a more distinct recollection of what then and there took place than the old man, who by the forbearance of God, lives to write about it. Since that time I have heard many inviting mourners to the place prepared for the purpose —have not always been suited—have often attempted it myself, and frequently failed; and it does appear to me that a combination of time, place, persons, talents, etc, must concur; otherwise, not only no good, but some harm may be the result of a misguided and a premature effort. We may have seen, as well as read of 'sparks of our own kindling.'"

My dear brethren, the above is all I can find written on this subject; and I feel assured that a general knowledge of the origin of this man-made idol will do more toward the overthrow of this Babel than all the essays, treatises or tracts we can write on the subject. Mr. Quinn was admitted into the itinerant ministry of the M. E. church, May 1st, 1799, and served in it till 1847, when he died after 48 years services, and hence knows whereof he affirms. It appears that Cook, the originator, was very cautious at first as to what class of mourner's he invited; and Mr. Quinn thinks, unless under certain combinations, no good, but harm might result from it, by raising sparks of our own kindling. It does not appear that the plan was soon generally adopted, even among the Methodists, as Mr. Quinn writing in reference to camp-meetings in 1804–6 says, "There were no altars, no mourner's benches, or anxious seats, in those days, nor were any invitations given to seekers of salvation to present themselves for the prayers of the church." How has this idol grown! Now are not only a certain class of scriptural penitents invited, but boys, girls, and even children are fairly dragged out, and that that, as I have known, by men who were drunk less than a week before, and again drunk, lying in the mud, in less than two months after. This is a hard saying, but truth not only justifies, but demands it.

By the minute description Quinn gives of Cook, a physiognomist will pronounce him one of the most violent of fanatics, full of electricity, and competent for the wildest freaks of fanaticism. This is the character of the man who is the creator of the mourner's bench, which Mr. Quinn said was "new—perfectly new," and at its birth panic-struck the people, and made the very hair on his head stand up. This has now grown to a full stature, and has become a great idol, of such popularity in certain quarters, that to say aught against it, stirs up the fires of hell, and woe to the one who dares stand in the range of its shot and shells.

Well, brethren, I am the one that will dare to stand before its hottest fire, and will not be afraid to open my mouth against it, and take the monster by the horns, if the latter are not afraid to put it. Valentine Cook being the creator of the mourner's bench, is the God of it, and his spirit is the spirit of it, and they who are born under its influences are born of Cook and not of God. This being so is there any wonder its converts are what we see and know them to be. From this idolatry, good Lord, deliver the people!

D. P. Saylor.

Dear Cousin Henry:

Will you be so kind as to send me the Companion? It is very lonesome out West, here where there are no brethren to preach for us; and I have nothing to read beside my Bible.

We have had the most severe snow-storm here that I ever witnessed. It commenced on the evening of the 13th with a thunder-shower, and it turned to snow. The storm raged for three days. It was impossible to see any distance. A great many cattle and horses died in the storm. The weather was not very cold during the storm. I just now heard of a man and woman that died in the storm. I did not hear how they perished, but I presume they lost themselves in the storm. Some of our neighbors went to their stables, and could hardly find their way home. God pity the poor, in such storms.

When you come to the West again, please call on us. It would give us great pleasure to see you. This is a beautiful country, and also a very healthy one. We live six miles from Carlton, which is our postoffice.

Notice to the Brethren in Kansas, Nebraska, and Missouri, who wish to attend our A. M.

I wish all the names of the members who wish to attend at once, as I expect to be able to make arrangements for half-fare permits, for all our members, on the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy R. R., from Quincy to Chicago, and probably on the Hannibal & St. Joseph from St. Joseph to Quincy. From Chicago to Pittsburg the arrangements have already been made by brother John Beeghley. Brethren to meet there on the 28th or morning of the 29th of May and take the Pan Handle route. Brethren in Illinois, who have no half-fare season, or yearly permits on the C. B. & Q. R. R., and wish to take that road, are also included.

BRIDGEPORT, PA., April 24th, '73.

Dearly beloved brethren and sisters in the Lord; I am now on my way home: one more day, if God permits, and I shall be in the cool breeze of Somerset county, my almost longed-for home. Soon, soon within it's bounds I'll be, no more to feel the Eastern breeze.

My visit amongst you, dear brethren and sisters, has greatly encouraged me to go forward in the discharge of my ministerial duties, and my prayer is to God, that he may abundantly bless you for the kindness manifested in my behalf. Brethren Daniel Snowberger, John W. Brumbaugh, and Henry Harshbarger, have my thanks for conveying me around so much. May the Lord continue to illumine our pathway with the light of his countenance, and ultimately save us all through Christ, our blessed Redeemer. Amen.

LATER. APRIL 25th, '73.

Here I am, at Dale City, in safety. Arrived here last evening at half-past six o'clock, and found the folks all well. How astonished I was to see the ground covered with snow, and the roads so very muddy. Little did I think of seeing snow in Somerset Co., after leaving the East. After arriving at this place I struck for the house of Eld. C. G. Lint, where I tarried over night. I found brother Lint about as lively as usual, and anxious to hear how I enjoyed the trip. This morning, (April 25th), I started for the C. F. C. office. Found the COMPANION FAMILY healthy and cheerful. Rest assured I was anxious to meet with the Dale City brethren, whom I had left about ten weeks ago.

The pleasant time I spent with the brethren in the East, will long be remembered; I hope, too, they will continue to remember me at a throne of grace. During my stay, I preached some fifty sermons, which I hope will result in some good, at least. Those loving men and women in Lancaster City, who so faithfully promised me to attend to the "one thing needful," will, I hope, not forget the blessed instructions I tried to give. Give your hearts to God in early life, and you will never regret it in days to come. Now, dear friends, when you read this, remember the promise you made. Come to Jesus; receive a mansion at the right hand of the Father's throne: so when the Judge will come, he may bear your name enrolled on the fair pages of the Lamb's book of life.

So Fare-you-well.

J T. MEYERS.

BROTHER HENRY:

I would like to say a few words to the brethren and sisters, subject to your better judgment. I see no response to brother Henry's earnest yet kind call for his just dues. Now brethren and sisters, we, who are subscribers to the C. F. C., are all, I presume, very anxious to see it come regularly every week. If it does not come, brother Henry is reminded of it, and that pretty sharply sometimes. And are we not forgetful in paying for it? That sister in Virginia sent twenty-five cents; she said it was all she had, but she would work and try hard to pay all. She would like to have the C. F. C. Now brethren and sisters, come, let us drop tobacco, a little finery, and pay brother Henry. He asks so kindly. He only says, "Wont you?" Oh how kind! "Wont you?" Brother Henry, enclosed find one dollar, that will partly pay for C. F. C., for some brother or sister. I have quit using tobacco: instead of putting it in my mouth, I will henceforth put my foot upon it. If this meets the eyes of my brother Jacob, I hope he will do the same. Oh, come, brethren and sisters, let us worship our God with a clean mouth and a clean breath, not contaminated with whiskey or tobacco.

Dear Brethren Editors, With a due appreciation of your responsibilities, and the critical position you occupy, we pen the following thoughts, in reference to our periodicals, who have, we trust, the honor of God and the salvation of souls for their objects, and consequently should feel to remove every obstacle that might hinder their progress in accomplishing that all important end.

I will name some of the obstacles, to wit: so many advertisements of a worldly nature—of lands, trees, bees, papers, silver-tongued organs, agencies, and a variety of literature, some of which is considered novels.

Again, brethren giving notes of travel, tell where they have been, how they were used in some families, what time thy got there, and when they left, and who took them, and where, and when, they had meetings, and especially that good impressions were made, when they did all the preaching themselves. Many think, all such jottings and boasting are vain, and the columns could be filled with matter of more general interest, and be more food to the soul.

Again, this or that brother or brethren, have been here, and made use of such a subject, and it (the sermon) was a masterpiece and so many were converted. I wish he or they would come back again, &c.

And again, in obituary notices, perhaps a child, 5 to 10 days old, the funeral services by the writer; and frequently Elder attached to the name.

And again, at the residence of the bride's father, by the undersigned, &c. &c.

These are some of the obstacles in the way, because it is not gospel, and not edifying, hence do not like to pay for that which is no profit, and say I think I will stop my paper for another year.

Now brethren we speak that which we know, and testify that which we have heard, but whether you will receive our witness or not, is left for the future to decide.

Written through love to the cause.

A few Lines to the Brethren in Iowa.

We would be truly glad to have some of the brethren to come and preach for us as soon as they can, as we think there could be good accomplished.

There are persons living here that say they will help pay their way, if they will only come. Try and come as soon as you can. Give us two weeks notice beforehand.

From your unworthy sister.

Mourner's Bench Religion.

Dear Editor:—There has appeared in the C. F. C. an inquiry as to whether there is any such thing as getting religion at a mourner's bench? We will try in the fear of God, to offer a few thoughts upon the subject, in reference to going forward to the altar, or mourner's bench, to receive religion. I maintain this is a new method to call sinners to repentance, or to get religion, as though you could manufacture religion at the altar. They can get such religion that will cause them to go on at a wonderful rate, shouting and screaming, rolling and tumbling. This is only artificial religion; it is not that pure and undefiled religion which the Apostle speaks of. We do not believe that there ever has been a person that received the right kind of religion at the mourner's bench, from the fact that we cannot find any such a rule laid down in the divine law of God, to call sinners there. We are commanded to point sinners to the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world, not to the mourner's bench; therefore we cannot endorse this doctrine, which is not founded upon the Gospel.

We are bold in saying, that there was no such method in the time of our Savior on earth, neither in the time of the holy apostles. If any one will show us scriptural authority to pursue such a course to call sinners to repentance, we will yield the point, and not until then. We do not believe that a true minister of the Gospel will make such an effort, because it is an additional effort, not found in the Gospel. We learn from the great Head of the Church, that we are not to add anything to his word, neither diminish therefrom. Christ has unequivocally declared, "If any man shall add unto these things, God shall add unto him the plagues that are written in this book, and if any man take away from the words of the prophecy of this book, God shall take away his part out of the book of life." Here we see there is great danger in adding anything on our part.

Again, the question was asked, whether there is any such a thing as getting through. We know that many will go to the altar, or bench, and by and by they will get up and say they have got through, and claim that their souls are greatly blessed. We claim that there is no such a thing as getting through at the altar, or Mourner's Bench. For our proof, we would refer the reader to the conversion of Saul of Tarsus. When he was converted through a miraculous power, he fell to the earth and was without sight; and he said, "Lord what wilt thou have me to do!" He told him to go to Damascus, "There it shall be told thee what thou must do.' Ananias said, "Brother Saul, receive thy sight." This was not sufficient, but he said unto him, "Why tarriest thou? Arise and be dipped and wash thyself from thy sins, having invoked the name of him." This is the Greek rendering. But he did not get through until he had finished his ministry. Then he was through, and could say, "For I am now ready to be offered, and the time of my departure is at hand. I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith. Henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness."

Again, we will call your attention to the case of the Jailor. When he came trembling, and fell down before Paul and Silas, and said, 'Sirs, what must I do to be saved," they did not tell him to go to the altar. No, but they told him to believe on the Lord Jesus Christ. "And they spake unto him the word of the Lord;" and he was baptized, not received on probation, or on six months trial.

And again, we find that, When Philip and the Eunuch were riding together in the chariot. Philip preached unto him Jesus; and when they came unto a certain water, the Eunuch said, "See here is water, what doth hinder me to be baptized?" Philip said, "If thou believest with all thy heart, thou mayest. And he said I believe that Jesus Christ is the Son of God." But Philip did not say to him, "Now you are through, your soul is blessed;" but he immersed him. Then he was justified.

This is the only way that members were received into the Church in the apostolic age.

We might present many more testimonies, but it is not called for; we have established our position by two or three witnesses. We say there is no rule laid down in the divine law of God to receive members into the church, but by faith, repentance, and conversion and immersion, not sprinkling or pouring. We claim they are not in the church until they have complied with the first principles of the doctrine of Christ. It is not the duty of a minister to leave it to the candidates in what way he wishes to be received into the Church. This is frequently done. We claim it is the minister's duty to teach the people, and to instruct them how they should be adopted into the Church. There is only one way. Christ declared, "I am the way, the truth and the life; no man cometh unto the Father but by me." If any minister does not know how to baptize, but must ask, he ought to use milk, "For he is unskillful in the word of righteousness."—We are informed in God's word, that such are false teachers. The Apostle said it is not surprising for the adversary himself transforms himself into an angel of light; it is therefore no great wonder if his servants also transform themselves as servants of righteousness, whose end will be according to their works. Now we will close. Please read our scattering remarks in the spirit of meakness and fear.

BROTHER H.:

As I am about to leave my native home and go West, I thought while I had time I would write a short article for the C. F. C. Oh! how solemn it is to leave our dear ministering brethren and the kind friends and neighbors. To visit the graveyard for the last time, where our dear mother's remains lie buried beneath the ground! Farewell mother's grave, I bid you adieu, for Providence only knows whether I will have the pleasure of seeing you again.

"Farewell brethren, farewell sisters;
Till we all shall meet above."

May our Father add a blessing to us all is my prayer.

My dearest friends, in bonds of love,
Our hearts in sweetest union prove,
Your friendship's like a drawing band,
Yet we must take the parting hand.
Your presence sweet, your union dear,
Your words delightful to my ear;
And when I see that we must part,
You draw like cords around my heart.

Pray for me.

BRETHREN EDITORS: Our Annual Conference for 1873, with its near approach, is now engaging the minds of our thinking brethren. Those of us, who believe the church of Christ to be a progressive one, anticipate going up with the determination of honoring God, by increasing, to some extent, the holiness of our beloved fraternity. There is, evidently, but one way in which we can make the meeting both pleasant and profitable; and this is by approving of and supporting only that which has truth and virtue in it, and by placing our foot on that only which is of sin, and not everything which, when abused, may lead to it. There are growing evils that must be suppressed, most of which arise from the wrong teaching of too many who cannot clearly distinguish the burden of sin from that of the cross.

Among other questions that demand timely attention, there is none more important than education. Ignorance is sin every time. Education, then, must wipe out the sin of ignorance. Two things it must, and, I believe, will do—add strength to our virtue, and make us humble. A man has to know a great deal to know his insignificance.

To our readers interested in the great work of reformation, I feel to say, let us not forget for a single moment to prayerfully consider the responsibility that rests upon us, in whose care it has pleased God to entrust a worthy and noble cause. An inclination on the part of any of us, to be unconcerned in a time like this, is robbing God; who supplies every want, of the greatest honor due him.

DIED.

We admit no poetry under any circumstances in connection with Obituary Notices. We wish to use all alike, and we could not insert verses with all.

In the Manor Branch, Indiana county, Pa., April 15th, Elder SAMUEL LIDY, aged 79 years, 2 months, and 22 days.

Thus has departed one who labored in the vineyard of the Lord more than half a century, serving in all the different stations, having ascended the ladder from round to round — private, deacon, minister in its different degrees. — About a quarter of a century ago he was advanced to the full commission of Bishop, with the oversight of the Manor congregation from its infancy. He survived all the members, of which said congregation was composed when he moved into its territory, but two. Elected in the Conemaugh congregation, which then embraced the territory composing the Shade congregation, he served alternately with Elders Mincely, Roberts, et al., who have long since gone to their reward.

He preached frequently in the dwelling of grandfather Philip Hoffman, the house in which the writer was born. This was the first household of the faithful in that place.

He never possessed the gift of eloquent utterance; but indomitable perseverance was prominent. He denied himself of many things, and labored hard with his hands for the support of a large family; looked with a jealous eye on all movements seemingly intended to secure a temporal reward to ministers, and earnestly protested against them; but he always had an open hand and a generous heart towards the poor of all classes in the church. The testimony of the world is, "He was a good citizen, a firm friend of mine, and, I believe, a very good Christian." Funeral occasion improved from 2 Tim. 4: 1—8, by the writer and Levi Fry.

Joseph Holsopple

[Visitor please copy.]

In Warrior's Mark congregation, Huntingdon county, Pa., April 16th, Alten Asbury Nearhoof, son of brother Jerry and sister Sarah Ann, aged 4 years 11 months and 20 days. Funeral occasion improved by the writer from Mark 10: 13; 14.

Alten, as he was commonly called, was an amiable little boy, and much beloved by all who knew him. Especially by the family; but his stay on earth was short, and now he is an angel and has gone to dwell with his Savior, where we can all meet him if we obey all of Christ's commandments.

Sam. M. Cox.

In the Rock Grove congregation, March 19, Floyd county, Iowa, James Webster, infant son of brother Andrew J. and sister Sarah Workman, aged 1 year 6 months and 19 days. Funeral services by the writer. Text, "Suffer little children to come unto me, &c."

W. J. H. Bauman.

In the Spring Run congregation, Mifflin county, Pa., April 3, Calvert Andrew, oldest son of Elder Joseph R. and sister Eva S. Hanawalt, aged 5 years 10 months and 1 day; also, April 4th James Howard, youngest son of the above parents, aged 8 months less three days. Funeral sermon by Elder Peter S. Myers, from Mark 10: 13—17.

The above little innocents died only a few hours apart; were both buried in one grave, side by side, at the same time, and their gentle spirits have gone to the Paradise of God, where no more pain is felt, and where sickness can never come. Brothers and sisters will you meet them there? will you? Oh, you can, if obedient to God's Holy word.

Our brother and sister still have sickness in their family. At the time of this writing [April 20th] 4 are sick, one of which is in a critical condition. Whooping cough was the first complaint, but other diseases were also contracted.

Also in Dry Valley congregation, Mifflin county, Pa., April 5th, Martha Elizabeth oldest daughter of brother Samuel J. and sister Elizabeth Swigart, aged 6 years and 4 month less 4 days. Funeral sermon by brother Archy Vandyke.

Also April 7th, Ellie Vandyke, youngest daughter of the above parents, aged 1 year 9 months. Funeral sermon by A. Vandyke. Text. Heb. 12: 6—15.

Now brother and sister, you have two gone before, and now David-like, you follow after. And to the sisters of the dead, would say, try to meet your angel sisters in heaven, where you will live together forever, and always praise God.

Also, in Tuscarora township, Juniata county, Pa., February 12, friend Daniel Deibl, aged 75 years 10 months and 26 days. He was the father of 10 children and grandfather of about 41 children. Our friend was for a number of years connected with the "United Brethren," and was much esteemed by his acquaintances, and we hope while his body is in the grave, his spirit is at rest.

Also, in Beale township, Juniata county, Pa., Benjamin F. P. B. Boiseman, was found dead in the bed on the morning of 22 Feb., 1872, aged about 18 years.

Solomon W. Boflinger.

Died near Dayton, Ohio, January 24, 1873, brother Joseph B. Miller, aged 57 years 6 months and 24 days. Disease strangulated hernia. The noiseless footsteps of death crossed the threshold and removed the center of family attraction and delight. Brother Miller was afflicted several months, and suffered much. He bowed in humble submission to the afflicting hand of providence, and was resigned to the Master's will, whether to live or whether to die. Seeing the will of the Lord concerning him indicated a departure to the spirit land, he arranged his temporal affairs, providing liberally for his dear, but now bereft companion, whom he committed to the "widow's husband" above. In the early part of his illness, he called on the elders of the church, and was anointed with oil in the name of the Lord. He calmly met the approaching message, and resigned his departing spirit to the care and keeping of the Savior. Funeral service by brethren Nead, Brubaker and others, From Rev. 14: 13.

W.

Died in the Delaware congregation, Knox county, Ohio, Dec. 7, 1873, Betsy Myers, wife of brother Jacob Myers, aged 72 years 6 months and 23 days. She had never been a member of any church, and made no profession of christianity, until she came to her death-bed, where she sought the pardon of her sins, and an interest in the welfare of her soul, and finally said that she had found peace, and was willing to die, and had no desire to live. She appeared to be very prayerful until the last. But oh, how much wiser it would be for us to spend our whole lives in the service of our Lord and Master; then in the end we could claim the sure promises. The funeral services were improved by the writer.

But the messenger of death did not stop here. Although brother Jacob Myers did not feel to mourn as they that have no hope, but rejoiced in the thought of one day meeting his beloved companion in a better world, yet he wept and mourned over his loss and his checks had scarcely been dried of tears, when the mighty hand of death took a fatal hold upon his frail body, and the 28th day of December ended his earthly career. An old lady who had been making her home in brother Myers' family for some time was afflicted with erysipelas, and was somewhat deranged, and as brother Myers was in the act of helping her into her bed, he received a scratch from her finger-nails on the back of his hand; the erysipelas set in, which is supposed to have been the cause of his death. He was sick only about four days, and died in just three weeks from the death of his wife. The church has lost a worthy brother, who, we have reason to believe, died in the triumphs of a living faith. He left no children. Brother Myers was born in the State of Maryland, where he lived until 1836. Since that time he has been a resident of Ohio. His age was about 75 years. The funeral services were improved by brother Christian Wise and the writer.

The Christian Family Companion, Is published every Tuesday, at $1.50 a year, by Henry R. Holsinger, who is a member of the Church of the Brethren, sometimes known by the name of "German Baptists," and vulgarly or maliciously called "Dunkards."

The design of the work is to advocate truth, expose error, and encourage the true Christian on his way to Zion.

It assumes that the New Testament is the Will of God, and that no one can have the promise of salvation without observing all its requirements, that among these are Faith, Repentance, Prayer, Baptism by trine immersion, Feet Washing, the Lord's Supper, the Holy Communion, Charity, Nonconformity to the world, and a full resignation to the whole will of God, as he has revealed it through his Son Jesus Christ.

So much of the affairs of this world as may be thought necessary to the proper observance of the signs of the times, or such as may tend to the moral, mental, or physical benefit of the Christian will be published, thus removing all occasion for coming into contact with the so-called Literary or Political journals.

Subscriptions may begin at any time.

Tobacco—Reply to Wm. Culp.

On page 252 C. F. C., current volume, is found a communication from Wm. Culp, relative to the use of Tobacco, etc. If he, in reading his Bible, had endeavored to inbibe the spirit of its teachings, and allowed them to take hold of his soul to renovate and cleanse it from all its impurities, fleshly lusts and appetites, he would have found on almost every page proof-texts against the vile habit he evidently seems to justify.

The "Spirit of Christ" teaches purity of mind, cleanliness of habit, and holiness of life; causes the possessor to crucify every "fleshly lust," every vitiated appetite, and every sinful practice. They who follow the text and have not the spirit of the teachings of the scriptures may find themselves often at variance with the lives and practices of the pious and good. God truly created all things for a wise and good purpose, but the 'Spirit of evil' leads men to the abuse of God's good gifts.

First, God created or made to grow out of the ground "every tree that is pleasant to the sight and good for food;" but after the "curse" it was said, "Thorns and thistles shall it bring forth to thee, and thou shalt eat the herb of the field." Tobacco is not food and the users do not eat it: if they did eat it, they would die, because it is a poison, and contains as "active principles" the most poisonous substances known in the vegetable kingdom. They dare not eat it. They do not eat of every herb of the field. They do not eat of all created things which God pronounced good. Then, too, God himself forbade the use of some of the creatures he had made, showing that all were not to be eaten or used.

The use of Tobacco has the "appearence of evil," at least: nay, it has more, it is an evil, an abominable evil, a growing sinful evil, a lust, an appetite, indulged in, enjoyed, perpetuated and supported by the lowest order of humanity. We find its chief adherants, and those who practice it the most freely, in the votaries of the dram shop, the frequenters of the "gambling hells," and haunts or dens of vice.

We are commanded to abstain even from the "appearance of evil," 1 Thess. 5: 22; to avoid every abomination and sin; to crucify every sinful lust and appetite; then how can a Christian man or woman indulge in these practices and be guiltless.

The use of Tobacco is an offence: First, on account of its persistent nauseous odor; second, on account of its nastiness or filthiness; and third, on account of the filthy habits it produces in the users—their loss of personal respect, cleanliness, and purity of bodily habits.

Every one knows how chewers of Tobacco become an offence to those about them who do not use it. Smokers are constantly poisoning God's gift of pure air by their nauseous fumes, and thus becoming an offence to man and God. —"Woe unto him by whom offence cometh," Matt. 18: 7; Luke 17: 1. As he that eateth with offence, so it shall be evil for that man who smoketh with offence; Romans 14: 20.

The use of Tobacco is a useless waste of means which should be devoted to useful purposes—given to the poor, or consecrated to God in the extension of His kingdom and the spread of the gospel of peace. Few chewers use less than ten cents worth a week—$5 20 per year—while many use daily a similar amount, making $56 50 per year. I know men, who, on their own calculation spend as much as $72, of their hard earned wages, annually, for this abominable stuff, who are scarcely able to decently clothe their wives and children; and who do not feel able to provide their families reading matter to the amount of a single newspaper, or book during the year. All these things the spirit of the teachings of the Bible condemns.

The use of Tobacco is a sin against the body. It impairs the health, weakens the nervous system and predisposes to the attacks of disease. It is the most fruitful cause of dyspepsia, diseases of the stomach and paralysis. It weakens the mind, and leads to mental imbecility, disqualifying men for close and sound reasoning. It permeates and defiles every part of the living organism. "Know ye not that ye are the temple of God? If any man defile the temple of God, him shall God destroy." 1 Cor. 3: 16, 17. We are made the guardians of God's temple "which temple ye are," and he will not hold us guiltless who weaken, mutilate, or defile it. He whom God destroys will be debarred from heaven, whether it be on account of sin against him, against our fellow men, or against ourselves.

It is a favorite retort for the guilty and vicious to say, "I am not as bad as my neighbor, I don't commit as grievous sins as some others;" and for the tobacco user to cover under cover of what he believes to be a greater evil, and says, "Which is doing the greater evil, using tobacco or following the foolish fashions of the world in dress?" without pretending to sit in judgment as to the merits or demerits of the two practices which are here admitted to be evils, we would ask, why justify your own evil practices, your own lustful appetites, because some one else practices, in your opinion, a greater evil? will that save you from the just retribution of your own sins and abominable practices? God is angry with the sinner every day and against him who tries to justify his sins this fierce wrath shall wax hot; "but whoso confesseth and forsaketh his sins shall find mercy." Prov. 28: 13.

A Spark.

It is often wondered where the spark of fire, when a piece of hot iron is struck by a hard substance, comes from. It is simply this: when iron or steel is so struck, fine, dust-like particles are torn loose from the mass, and ignite by coming in contact with oxygen, as they fly through the air. Why, then, does not the large mass also take fire and burn up? It does, but slowly, which is termed oxydizing—commonly called rusting. The small particle of steel, clipped off by the hard flint and thrown into the air, is attached simultaneously on all sides by oxygen, and so rapidly consumed by this powerful agent, as to cause heat and light; while, when cohering to the mass, it is not so exposed to this gas. A beautiful lesson may be seen in this.

The church, in body, is made up of its individual members. Any one member, torn loose from the body, church, and cast away from it into the cutting atmosphere of Satanic influence, is in imminent danger of being consumed; while when a deeply, implanted and well set member, cannot be so used up by Satan.

The large mass of iron oxydizes (rusts) on its outside only; even this can be prevented by the proper care, not by filing and scouring with rough substances, but by dry atmosphere and a thin coat of oily substance. How do mechanics care for their tools?

That is, I mean to say, the church can be saved from even tarnishing, by guarding and properly protecting those of its members who are moving in its borders and are mostly exposed to evil, not by coldness and harsh judgment after long neglect, but by the proper and timely influence of care, truth, good judgment, love, attraction, mildness, kindness, forgiveness, trust, &c., &c.

We are Passing Away.

How impressive the thought! How solemn yet how true! How swiftly time flies! Hours, days, weeks, months and years pass in rapid succession. It seems but as yesterday since 1872 was ushered in. But now, where is it? passed away—gone with all its joys, its sorrow, and its woe—gone with all its disappointments, with all its privileges and opportunities. And now we have fairly entered upon another New Year; but whether we shall ever see another New Year is only known to him who holds the issues of Life's death. Be this as it may, we are surely passing away. The place that knows us now, must shortly know us no more forever. Every hour, yea, every beat of our pulse, brings us nearer our graves.

Time is swiftly winging us away. Soon all that's mortal must become inanimate and dead. Soon our friends must close our sightless eyes, and consign our bodies to the damp and silent tomb, there to moulder back to dust; for dust we were, and to dust we must return. This life is transitory and must pass away.

Our fathers, where are they? Gone—passed away. So must we. Yes, all transitory things must pass away. So says the Holy Writ. Those mortal bodies of ours must moulder back to the original element.

But the immaterial part, what of that? what of our souls? They too will pass from this stage of action—pass out of those tabernacles of clay. But what then? They will continue to live on—to exist either in happiness or misery forever and ever.

Now, in view of these solemn facts, it behooves us to look well to our eternal interests, to compare our lives carefully with God's word; for by that word we shall be judged in the last day. Let us, as the apostle admonishes, examine ourselves and see whether we are in the faith or not.

And to you who are yet living without a hope and are strangers to the covenants of promise, let me say, you too are fast passing away. Time will soon be gone. You and I must soon stand before the judgment bar of God; for "it is appointed unto men once to die, but after this the judgment." Yes, dear, friendly reader, soon you and I must pass the gloomy vale. Soon will the clods rattle down upon our coffin lids and our bodies become food for worms. Soon will our state of probation end; and oh, what a dark, gloomy place is the Christless grave! How awful these words—"Died without a hope!" Who can even bear the thought of taking up such a place, "where the worm dieth not and the fire is not quenched?" And yet, without reconciliation to God, this must be your doom; you must sink down to eternal night. Then in view of the solemn fact that we are fast passing away, and time must soon end with us, be entreated, by one who loves your souls, to no longer delay the necessary preparation to meet your God in peace, whilst you have yet time and opportunity. Turn in with the offers of mercy, whilst a loving Savior stands, with outstretched arms, ready to receive you, whilst all heaven is waiting to be gracious. Remember, Jesus turns none empty away; and again, Jesus is represented in the Scripture of divine truth, as standing at the door of the heart, knocking for admittance, and saying, "If any man will open the door, I will come in to him and sup with him and he with me." Oh, what a heavenly feast, to sup with Jesus! Then why not come to Jesus? May God help you to come; and may he grant that we may meet in that place where there is no more sorrow nor crying, where God's own soft hand will wipe all tears from our faces, is my prayer.

The True Church.

Can a church be the true church, that neglects or refuses to follow any one of the plain commands of the Savior? This question is pertinent to the Brethren.—We claim to be the only and true church of Christ. But where is the brother or sister who is not willing to admit that we have ever come short of observing one of the most vital commands of Jesus, which is as follows: "Go ye therefore and teach all nations"—"every creature.

Why the Brethren make no more effort to fulfil the above injunction is difficult to tell. We can judge, but we may err in our judgment; therefore we will not venture an assertion. But that the prosperity of the cause of Jesus rests upon the faithful obedience of the professors of Christianity to the above command, does not admit of a doubt. We wonder and are grieved, when we remember that there are many persons, living remote from the Brethren, who are calling and imploring the Brethren to come and preach the Gospel to them and their neighbors, who are denied the precious boon. Taking the common standpoint of the Brethren, it is impossible to answer their call, unless some of our ministers will consent to spend their living in travelling and preaching.

Shall we ask, has Jesus required an impossibility, or is there a provision in the Gospel? We hear it said by divine authority, "Bear ye one another's burdens, and so fulfil the law of Christ." But when we, who are not ministers, are living in ease and affluence, while the minister is denying himself the comforts of home and family, and spending his children's bread in travelling to preach, we are not bearing his burden.

"Oh well!" say some, "when they are needy we must help them." And when we ask them what they mean by needy, we are informed that "we must not let them suffer." Upon a close investigation of their idea, we learn that, when they are bereft of the comforts of home; when they have little or nothing to eat; when their clothes are tattered and torn, and the storms howl, and disease is gnawing at their vitals, then our duty begins, to communicate of our good things, if we have plenty; but until they are "needy," it is our blessed privilege to enjoy the fruits of their weary hours of labor and hard study, by listening to the gracious words of comfort that fall from their lips, telling of the mercies of God and the redemption by Christ Jesus. We hear them through, if they don't talk too long, and thank God that what they have said is true. We return to our houses, our workshops, our farms, or our merchandise, and strive to swell our pile of earthly store, while the preacher divides his time in reading, meditation, or hard study, and providing a scanty subsistence for himself and the loved ones of his household.

May we ask, was this the design of the Gospel? or may we say with Paul, "Even so hath the Lord ordained, that they which preach the Gospel should live by the Gospel?" Might not the minister ask with irresistible pertinency, "If we have sown unto you spiritual things, is it a great thing if we shall reap your carnal things?" Until we enable the minister to do his duty, as an embassador of the most High, we muzzle the ox that treadeth out the corn. "Who goeth a warfare at any time at his own charges?" Is this said in reference to the ministry? or what meaneth the Apostle? Verily that the minister should have a temporal support: that he may support a wife, a family, that he may give himself wholly to the work of the ministry; that he may be "a workman approved of God that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth."

For the COMPANION.

The Scriptures No. 7.

By referring to the introductory part of the Acts of the Apostles, we learn that this book was composed by Luke, after his gospel was written. It is an extenuation of the history of the Church, from the ascension of Christ to Paul's imprisonment at Rome. Here he preached to all who came to visit him, in his own hired house; and perchance, at this time wrote some of his epistles to the churches he had previously established, in the course of his preaching and travels, durwhich Luke was, in part, his travelling companion. This is the fifth book in the canonical arrangement of the New Testament scriptures, and is the first and oldest church history extant. It was written in A. D. 63 to 65, and covers a period of some thirty years, dating back from the time it was composed to Christ's ascension. Analytically, we have in this book, among the most noted points of interest, in the first chapter, an account of the election of Matthias to the apostleship, in place of Judas the traitor.

Here I would take occasion to remark that the election of ministers, in my estimation, at this early age of the church was quite different from what it is now among our modern churches of to-day, the Brethren not excepted. It appears that when the members were called together in a church capacity, the number of the names together being about one hundred and twenty, "Peter stood up in the midst of the disciples," or members; and no doubt, after stating the object of the meeting, he proposed to hold an election for a minister. In the first place they appointed, or nominated, two, and they cast their lots, or votes, for either one or the other of these Brethren. This is the gospel way for electing officers in the church. In case the church needs one minister, let two be proposed who would seem best fitted and qualified to discharge the duties of that office. Then let the voice of the members be taken, and the majority rule; whereas, in a church of one hundred silent members, a choice is held for one speaker, according to our present order and mode of electing officers, one might be elected with less than five votes—a very small minority; where, on the other hand, according to the strict laws of propriety and the spirit and tenor of the Gospel, the majority ought to rule in all official and business transactions of the church.

Again, in the second chapter, we have a full history of the descent of the Holy Ghost on the day of Pentecost. This is a verification of the Savior's promise to his disciples. Attending this supernatural manifestation of God's power, under the influence of the Holy Spirit, the Apostles were enabled and qualified to speak to all nations represented on the grand occasion, in their diversified tongues, "the wonderful works of God." Here, also, we have Peter's sermon on this occasion; at least a part of it, and the strong effects it produced upon the minds of his hearers, so that the hearts of the people were deeply affected by the power of God's word. The consequence and fruits of this greatest of all revivals, were three thousand souls added to the Church on the self same day.

In the third chapter an account is given of the miraculous cure of the lame man by Peter and John. By reading on to the end of the fifth chapter a good portion of the history of Peter and John is given, which the reader is recommended to examine at his own leisure moments.

In the sixth chapter, the appointment of the deacons is recorded; and concluding with this, to the end of the seventh, we have the life, accusation, trial, and death of Stephen, the first Christian martyr under the new dispensation.

In the eighth chapter, is given an account of the persecution of the Church; also the conversion and baptism of the Ethiopian eunuch, &c.

From the beginning of the ninth chapter to the end of this book treats, more or less, of the conversion of St. Paul, together with his life, travels, preaching, organizing churches, and so on. He is called the Apostle to the Gentiles; and for the purpose of introducing Christianity among the Gentile nations, God saw fit to call this learned Jewish doctor to his aid, as an instrument in his hands, to bring the Gentile people into the Christian Church, namely; those other sheep of which the Savior was speaking that they (the Jews and Gentiles) might constitute one flock.

I shall now briefly notice a few points in the epistolary writings of the New Testament, and as my papers are growing lengthier than was anticipated at first, I shall, for fear of becoming too tedious, hasten on with this part of the history of the scriptures.

The New Testament, in a great measure, is made up of epistolary correspondence, which goes to show, that this sort of composition must have been extensively in vogue in the Apostles' times. It is a strong means of communicating thought and purpose, and was practiced as early as Solomon. At the present day, in this age of civilization and learning, almost every man and woman is able to write a decent and polite letter, and when a person lacks these simple qualifications, he is regarded by the intelligent mass of the people, as an object of pity, and not qualified to discharge the responsible duties of life. In the epistolary writings of the New Testament, the Apostle Paul figures largely. Out of twenty one epistles recorded in the canonical books of the New Testament, fourteen are ascribed to Paul, one to James, two to Peter, three to John, and one to Jude. In order to appreciate and fully comprehend the practical and doctrinal import of these God-given letters, it is necessary that we peruse them carefully and prayerfully; just like an ordinary letter, containing some important message affecting our general interest and welfare. Therefore, to understand, thoroughly, epistolary correspondence, it becomes essentially necessary to enter into the design of the letter and the spirit of the author. Just so in reading these inspired epistles. To read with profit and edification, we must read on in one continuous strain, without regard to verse or chapter; for only in this way can we catch the spirit of the inspired penman. The Apostle Paul, although at one time a persecutor of the Church of God, after his miraculous conversion, he became a champion in defending and propagating the doctrines and principles of the religion of a meek and lowly Savior. Just as earnestly and ignorantly as he was in blindly persecuting God's people, so, after his call to the apostleship, he was equally zealous and intelligent, if not more so, to lead his erring brethren—the Jews— and bring the Gentile nations to the sovereign feet of King Emanuuel. He was truly a chosen vessel of God, and shunned not to declare the whole council of God. In short, as far as in his power lay, he cleansed his skirts, and made himself free from the blood of all men.

In his letters to the Corinthians, he sharply rebukes them for the party spirit lurking in their midst, &c. By referring to these letters, the reader might suppose that the Church at Corinth was made up of some very rough Christians; but, perhaps, they were not more so than some of our so-called Christian Churches at the present day. If all the secret crimes in the Church could at once be unraveled, it would, at times, present a monster of iniquity, at which good men would stand agast! And as Paul had the welfare of all men at heart, he studiously labored, at all times, to restore love, peace, and union in the Church, as the nature of his epistles clearly indicates. In other respects he endeavored to impress upon the minds of the people the multifarious duties that devolve upon the followers of the Lamb of God.

Of the fourteen epistles, all have the author's name prefixed, with the exception of the epistle to the Hebrews.—Even in this epistle its Pauline authorship is not much disputed by the learned. The eastern churches almost unanimously agree in this, and biblical critics at the present day, allege that there is a striking similarity of style in the composition and general make up between the rest of Paul's writings and the epistle in question. It is, beyond doubt, the production of St. Paul, and contains many wholesome truths, in the main, such as the fatal sin of unbelief, the heavenly rest, a description and illustrious examples of true and genuine faith &c.

We cannot close this portion of the history of the scriptures, without noticing the epistles of St. Peter, the great apostle of the circumcision. There is scarcely a piece of written language upon record, that contains as much subject matter in as few words as in these time-honored epistles of St. Peter. They are full of thought, feeling, and purpose; and abound richly in encouragement, consolation, warning, instruction, and natural piety. The Apostle has a word for both saint and sinner. To the saint he writes, "The eyes of the Lord are over the righteous, and his ears are open unto their prayers;" but unto the sinner the reverse: "The face of the Lord is against them that do evil."

A few words of the great prophetic writings of the New Testament scriptures, the last book in the sacred canon. It treats largely of the unexplored future of the Church. But it also treats of "things that are," as well as "things that are to come." It is claimed, by some, to be a sealed book; but, we think, it is so only to those who do not study its meaning and interpretation. It is sealed to those who refuse to know it. The promise of blessings is only conferred to those who read and obey it, as declared by the Revelator himself. "Blessed is he that readeth and they that hear the words of this prophecy, and keep those things that are written therein." The title of the book in itself goes to show what is the nature of its contents. The term revelation signifies a disclosing and opening, the very reverse of sealing. It is true, some of the unfulfilled language cannot be comprehended by mortal man, till its proper time has come to be revealed. This book in the early age of the Church, has given rise to much controversy in regard to its authenticity, and it was even doubted by some whether John the Apostle and Evangelist wrote it. Notwithstanding this, its claim in the sacred canon was jealously defended by some of the primitive Christians. At the present time its genuineness is, I believe, universally accepted, as well as, St. John, the Apostle, to be its author. For preaching the "Word of God, and for the testimony of Jesus Christ," St. John was banished to the lonely and desolate Isle of Patmos, in the Ægean sea, by the persecutors of the doctrine of Christianity. Tradition says this was done either by Domitian or Nero. Modern travelers describe Patmos to be a desolate, barren region of land; and on it is found a cave, which the few superstitious people who live there, claim to be the spot in which the Revelator found rest, and wrote his book. In this book we have a history of the Church from the time it was written to the winding up of all things.

Annual Meeting—Shall it be Changed?

There seems, of late, to be a desire to change the manner of holding the Annual Meeting of our Brethren; and more than once has that desire been expressed. From this we conclude that the meeting, as now held, does not give entire satisfaction. We should not wonder that all are not pleased with it; for there are but few meetings that do give all we wish. Human expectation flies so much higher than human power; and besides, we may wish for things that we can have no reason to expect.

As a change is proposed, it may be in order to offer a few suggestions on that subject, that the brotherhood may have an opportunity to consider the matter, and offer such thoughts, as to them may seem proper, before an effort is made to change the present plan.

The first thing we shall find fault with, is, its frequency. In presenting our views on this subject, we shall no doubt cross the views of many brethren; but all we ask is for them to hear us, and then we are willing and ready to hear them. We mean there is no use of the meeting, so far as business meeting is concerned, when there is no business to do. There are two objects sought in appointing a yearly meeting for the brotherhood: The first is, to transact business for the church; the second is, and we believe the most important, one to give an opportunity to meet with friends and brethren long parted, to keep alive that good feeling naturally where the love of Christ prevails, and to enjoy another sweet foretaste of that meeting in heaven, that will know no ending. To this last we shall never offer an objection, so long as the meeting secures an object, so worthy, and one so congenial to our view of what enjoyment is; but with the first object of the meeting, we do find fault, when there is no demand for meeting of that kind.

If some brother will refer to the minutes of A. M., for the last ten years, he will see what we are trying to tell—that the brethren in Annual Council have been burdened with questions, that should not have gone not a step farther than the church or place in which they sprang up. We can name a host of them that are now recorded on the minutes; but we do not deem them worth a place here, much less in the transactions of a public assembly made up of the talent and power of the whole church. We remember to have read, once at least, of brethren who rejoiced when delegates reported "No business," and it seems to us, we should not want a better indication, as to the welfare and good condition of a church in the brotherhood, than to hear that they had no business for others to transact for them. We think it shows that they are satisfied with what their brethren at home may do for them. And when I hear of brethren carrying to the District Council or Annual Meeting such questions as the record shows have gone there, we think it shows a condition certainly not the best, and one that shows that all do not possess all the benefits and blessings of the religion we claim to have.

We believe that it has been a source of much sorrow, to brethren who love the truth and who labor for the peace and prosperity of the church, to know that brethren valued the character of the A. M. no higher than to burden it with questions, if such questions actually did exist, as have been brought before it for its final consideration. This should not be so; and brethren should dispose of all such questions at home where the facts are known, and where they may be matters of some importance, and not try to make them and their disposal an example to the whole church. There would then be but few questions of a general character that need require the action of brethren in general council.

It may be asked, what shall be done? We would suggest that the A. M. should refuse to act upon all questions of an individual or local character, and refer them at once back to their starting point, for their disposal among those who know most about them. If brethren seek the peace of the church and the glory of God, they will then find some way to settle all such things better than can be done anywhere else.

It is claimed that, in Annual Council our brethren are directed by the Holy Spirit of promise. To this we do not object, but brethren, that Holy Spirit is not confined to no space nor place, and if he does not dwell in every one of our hearts, it is because they are not what they should be;

and at our homes or in our own church councils, he is just as ready to lead us and help us to arrive at the truth as he is in any other place. "For as many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God." And if we are not led by his Spirit at our homes, it is not likely that we shall be at any other place.

If we strike from the list of questions which have come before the Annual Council, all those that could have been disposed of without going there at all, we have but a very few left—not enough to demand a yearly council, Our brethren could then (if they had an A. M.) employ their time and talent in another and better way, and have nothing to divide feelings, or call their minds off from the real objects of their meeting. It could then be a place for preaching the word to all who would listen, and for obeying all those commands enjoined upon the church for public observance.

We cannot tell, certainly, how or why our brethren were induced to appoint a yearly meeting to transact business for the church, so many years ago. But it seems plain to us, that the meeting was at first held as a meeting for worship; that at those meetings, business came up and was disposed of by the brethren assembled, thus saving an extra meeting and making use of a good opportunity. As time passed on, more questions came up and there was more business to do, until the council part, of what was once a meeting, devoted to worship and preaching the word, became to be by far the greater part. The A. M. as it was called began to be looked upon as a legislative body, for the use and benefit of the church, and brethren soon learned to bring their appeals from home councils to Annual Meeting. From that time business increased to such an extent that it was decided several years ago, we think, to hold the meeting not for worship, and preaching and practicing the word, but for business only. So brethren, you can see that the one object of the meeting is almost lost sight of, while the other, and the one that indicates a backward movement, has continued to increase all the while. All the efforts to check the flow of business to the A. M. have seemed to increase the amount of it. District Meetings have been appointde and held, but many of their decisions have been sent to the A. M. for its sanction or for general adoption by the church. And more than half of the delegates from District Meetings to A. M. carry with them, numbers of questions for the attention of that body, nearly all, if not all of which could have been disposed of at home. This is what makes so much business, brethren, for the A. M., and nothing else; and its continual increase will never be checked until brethren are taught to do more at home and less abroad.

LANDON WEST.

Parental Influence.

Among the many old truths which will bear continual enunciation none is more important than that which establishes the connection between family life and the well-being of the community. The family is not only the germ of the State, but is in fact a miniature representation of it, so that could we ascertain the average amount of good order, true principle, virtuous action and happiness in the various families of any country, we should have arrived at a very fair appreciation of its national character and prosperity. In organization, in administration, in duties and in aims, the family and the State bear a close analogy to each other, and the more perfectly each fulfils its duties and attains its ends, the more complete will be the resemblance. All government should be paternal, all citizenship filial in the best sense of the words; but the selfish, austere and tyrannical parent will make the despotic and unscrupulous ruler, while the rebellious and unloving child will develop into the unloyal and refractory subject. Especially close as this analogy in a republic, where the governing power is so largely committed to the people. For as in turn we fill the relations of both child and parent, so the republican citizen alternates the relation of subject and sovereign; and as the best child will likely to become the best parent, so the most loyal subject will use his sovereignty in the most conscientious manner.

The training of children is thus a preparation for the gravest and most important relations of life, and upon the character of our home life must rest the well being of our nation and the permanence of all our institions.

The statistics of prison life go to show the baneful effects of paternal neglect—vicious companions and undisciplined family life. It was at one time established by careful computation that out of every hundred English criminals ninety-eight commenced their life of guilt before the age of sixteen years. The same general proportion will probably hold good everywhere. Crime is more largely the result of bad parental training, or of its absolute neglect, than of any other cause. Children under sixteen who are found indulging in vicious habits, or violating the laws of their country, cannot rightly be held as the sole offenders. The moral responsibility of their conduct is not so great as that of their parents.

There is not one case out of ten, perhaps not one out of a hundred, where such a child has had the advantage of a virtuous family home, or parents that have conscientiously tried to make him an honest and useful member of society. They may not have directly counselled or upheld his evil practices, but they have either sanctioned them by some measure of their own example, or have permitted him, unchecked, to associate with evil companions and to into their pracitices; or by tyranny and austerity have driven away from their influence and their home.

When to this we add the inherited tendencies which the child receives, and which are the inevitable result of the entire parental character, we must admit that the parents of young criminals are, as a general thing, more culpable than the criminals themselves.

What is true of crime is also true of all moral delinquency in its many gradations. There are habits easy to inquire, hard to break, which may seem trifling in the child, but which, if not checked, will sap the principles of honor, ietegrity, industry, justice and truth. Little acts of deceit, petty pilfering small untruths, or prevarications, idle hours, cherished feelings of enmity or intentions of revenge, wilful disobedience, cruelty to the weak and unprotected, and a hundred other faults of childhood, need the watchful eye to detect, and the gentle but firm authority of the parent to check in the germ. If they meet not with this resisting power, they will expand and develop into the rank weeds of hypocrisy, dishonesty, cruelty and injustice, and will acquire such tenacious hold upon the character that no subsequent efforts can wholly eradicate them.

There are not only faults to be corrected, but positive virtues to be inculcated, if we would train our children to fill worthy their places in the world. There are some parents whose main effort is to keep their children innocent. They guard them from every temptation, keep them from evil company, suffer them them to see and to know only one side of life, and thus develop a sort of hot-house growth of goodness that may be beautiful to look at in childhood, but that will never serve them in the rough winds and storms of temptation and trials that await them in the open field of life. Innocence is not virtue, and those who fancy that it is, make a fatal mistake. Innocence is simply the ignorance of evil; virtue knows it, depreciates it, rejects it.

Infancy is lovely in its innocence, but life, with its stern realities, demands the strong, ripened vigor of manly virtue, to resist its evil, to protect its good, and to build up character, and to bless the world.

So all moral education, to fulfil its true work, must lead to innocent child up to virtue by instilling the positive love of truth and justice, honor and integrity into the heart, not by shielding him from every temptation, but by preparing him to meet it, not by hiding from him all knowledge of wrong, but by inspiring him with a love of right and a resolute purpose of following it. Parents only can do this work. They may and do have many sufficient helps in Sunday-schools, teachers, friends, books, &c., and they do well to claim and to welcome such aid, but if they rely on it to accomplish everything, if they think to transfer their own responsibility in this matter to any other hands, they inflict an irreparable injury upon their offspring and sow seeds of misery for their own old age.

But if parental duties are onerous, and the responsibilities momentous, the rewards are sacred and priceless. Who that has wisely and lovingly trained up sons or daughters to manhood or womanhood, and beheld them, one by one, take honorable and useful places in the world, and has received the respect and love, the confidence and sympathy that is gladly rendered by filial affection, does not feel a thousand-fold repaid for every effort, for every self-denial he has made in their behalf? Not for thousands of gold and silver would he part from these sacred joys. They cheer his declining years, they soothe every trial, they brighten every dark passage of his life. Let, then, every father and every mother take a new and more solemn, yet inspiring view of duties so emphatic, of responsibilities so weighty, of encouragements so cheering. To family life is our country looking for a new generation of brave and noble citizens, upon it is she depending for her stability and prosperity. Let us each do our part, and she will not be disappointed.

The above I clip from the Philadelphia Public Ledger, a daily publication of this City, of almost unparalleled circulation and general interest, and send it for the benefit of your readers. With a few additional paragraphs, my views are, in a general way, fully expressed on this subject.

Parental influence is a subject that should attract the very earnest and serious attention of all parents; and those who are about stepping into adult life. This all-important subject, I am satisfied from actual experience and observation, receives attentions at a very, very heavy discount, by the great majority of fathers and mothers. By comparing my extensive notes on this subject, taken during the last twelve years, I arrive at the alarming result, that not one mother of five hundred, nor one father of one thousand, has the way of training children, clear.

It is due to the badly managed twig through high winds and storm, heat, frost, and foul atmosphere, that that we must content ourselves among a forest of dwarfs, dwindles, and good-for-nothings, ready to crush themselves, and the few really good among us, out of existence, at any sudden and sharp turn.

We need only to go to our halls of legislation, which, if they possess not, should, the very best stock, the very cream of our country, to see these dwarfs and get at the very end of our nation's universally popular class. From here it takes but a few day's travel, and investigation with deep and reflective thought, to trace the cause of the alarming fact back to the very homes in which the stock was reared.

Mark what I say here, reader, though I say it makes it not any the less true. The majority of nurseries in which our sons and daughters are brought up, are in too impure and unwholesome a condition for either mind or body to arrive at anything of perfection and nobility in the true and full sense of the word.

In these very homes, when we come to ferret the matter closely, we find the very first seeds of vice and mischief sown, which may, at any time future, develop in the shape of jail-birds and gallow-corpses. In these homes is too much careless and sifted vice, over which neither church nor state has, as yet, any direct control. Though there may be plenty of praying, preaching, and precept of good quality, yet, unless we remember, aye doubly remember, dear reader, that bad examples and practices, such as tattling, small deceptions, falsehoods, quibbling and quarreling, small thefts, &c., are completely wiped out, good precepts are as worthless and as useless as sail without ship, or ship without water.

Speak Kindly.

How much misery may be abated, how much suffering may be removed, by the simple tone and expression of the human voice! Upon the heart that is lone and desolate, how sweetly falls the voice of sympathy and consolation! Why is it, then, since everything proves, and none are ignorant of the fact—that all must lie down in mother earth together, since all are travellers in this highway to death—why is it, that each should be so sparing of that which costs him nothing, but which might raise the drooping spirits of his neighbor, and cheer him on his journey—a few kind words and kindly looks?

Beyond.

Beyond life's fitful fever,
Beyond life's troubled dream,
Beyond death's shadowy river,
That dark and sullen stream ;
Beyond this land of sighing,
Where countless tears are shed,
Beyond the sick and dying,
Beyond the mouldering dead ;
Beyond the days of mourning,
Beyond the years of grief,
Beyond creation's groaning,
And panting for relief ;
Beyond the darkening shadows,
Beyond the gloomy vale,
Beyond the scenes of trial
Where flesh and heart do fail ;
Beyond the spoiler's ruin,
Beyond the tempter's wile,
Beyond the lion's roaring,
Beyond the serpent's guile ;
Beyond the fear of sinning,
Beyond the chastening rod,
Beyond the thought of grieving
A kind and gracious God ;
Beyond the doubt and darkness,
Beyond the realm of night,
Beyond the hopes uncertain
That mock with fitful light ;
Beyond the transient greetings
Where joy and sorrow thrill,
Beyond the fears of parting
Which oft the spirit chill ;
Beyond the dreary mountain,
Beyond the weary moor,
Beyond the emptied fountain,
With disappointment sore ;
Beyond the fiery desert,
Beyond the furious foe,
Beyond the tedious pathway
Along which pilgrims go ;
Beyond man's proud oppression,
Beyond the tyrant's hour,
Beyond earth's desolation,
And Satan's blighting power,
Beyond earth's fallen glory,
Beyond earth's fleeting joy,
Beyond earth's sinful story,
And mortal's vain employ ;
Beyond all real sorrow,
Beyond all fancied woe,
Beyond all fearing morrow,
Or grieving if it go ;
Beyond all mortal yearnings,
For love, and peace, and rest,
Beyond all earthly longings,
For union with the blest ;
Beyond all human madness,
Beyond all worldly strife,
Beyond all transient gladness,
In blest, eternal life ;
Beyond earth's weary burden,
The cross, the scourge, the rod,
The saint shall rest in glory,
The saint shall dwell with God :
In brightness undecaying,
In beauty fading not,
Oh, pilgrim, are you praying,
That this may be your lot ?

Religion.

There are many reasons why we should attend to religion. Many think they could not forsake the pleasures of this world. But how much mistaken they are, if they think that we who are members of Christ's body, have not as much real enjoyment, as they who are outside of the church. Then, dear sisters, let us be encouraged, and ever remember each other in our prayers. Though trouble and cares shall be ours, and friends forsake us, we have the consolation that our Savior is near us, and ever ready to hear and answer our prayers. Then if we are faithful to the end, though we very often come short of our duty, if we do what we can, we know there is a fadeless crown reserved for us. Let us not be discouraged. "Many are the afflictions of the righteous; but the Lord delivereth them out of them all." If we are found faithful, "we have a building of God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens." But not so with the ungodly and sinner.

Dear reader, you who are staying away from Christ, beware; the recording angel is writing in the book of memory, and you must meet it in the day of God's fiery indignation Then seek salvation where it can be found, in the arms of Jesus.

Brother Henry, I was first started on the road to go with these dear Christians by reading the Companion. I was seventy-nine years old, when I was led by the hand of brother Daniel Brower into the Anglaire River, and there was made satisfied to live the life of a Christian, that I may die the death of the righteous. Written in love by your unworthy and humble sister in Christ.

Elizabeth Cary.

The above named sister is deaf, and has been for some years. All her pleasure in this world is to read, and talk, and tell of the goodness of God; and is never so well satisfied as when among the members of the Church. The Companion seems her preference, as she claims it was a means of bringing her from darkness to light; Yet the Bible, the text book, is not forgotten by her, it being the fountain of all religious reading matter.

Horses in the Pocket.

BY S. M. MINNICH.

An old gentleman remarked the other day, while chewing his cud, "If I had never used any tobacco, it would have been a horse or two in my pocket."

"How much does it cost you a week, and how long have you used it?" was asked.

"I have used tobacco for fifty years; and it costs me twenty-five cents a week."

"And you think the money you have spent for tobacco would buy a horse or two?"

"The old man replied that he supposed it would."

If this money had been at interest, and been compounded every year it it would have purchased so many horses, that your pockets, stables and pastures, would have been full. At ten per cent, in fifty years, it would amount to more than $18,000. Now at one hundred and fifty dollars a head, this amount would buy one hundred and twenty horses. Takes big pockets don't it?

Christian Union. No. 3.

We have shown that Christians are to have the same love—the love of God shed abroad in their hearts; the same mind—the mind of Christ; and that they are to speak the same things—the things that Christ taught them by the will and command of his Father. It is not difficult to see from these facts, that the disciples are to be united in one body, having the same faith and practice. It will be our purpose to show, in this article that the word of God requires Christians to be thus united.

Paul, in his letter to the saints at Ephesus, to the faithful in Christ Jesus, said, "I, therefore, the prisoner of the Lord, beseech you that ye walk worthy of the vocation wherewith ye are called, with all lowliness and meekness, with long-suffering, forbearing one another in love; endeavoring to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace." After this strong admonition to faithfulness and union, he states seven essential points of union, as follows:

1. "There is one body;"
2. "One Spirit;"
3. "One hope of your calling;"
4. "One Lord;"
5. "One faith;"
6. "One baptism;"
7. "One God and Father of all, who is above all, and through all, and in you all." Eph. 4: 1—6.

We shall consider these points in their order, showing their nature, their relation to each other, and what bearing they have on Christian Union; but first we must take a general view of the design of this Epistle. The first three chapters are principally of a doctrinal character. After his salutation and congratulations, he wishes them a number of blessings, and exhibits to them the marvelous grace of God, evinced in their election, justification, adoption, illumination, regeneration, access to God, inhabitation of his Spirit, freedom from heathenish idolatry and Jewish ceremonies, their knowledge of Christ's love, and in their sure title to be filled with the fullness of God. Prominent, in this part of the epistle, is the doctrine, that the middle wall of partition between Jews and Gentiles is broken down, and that all stand in the same relation to God, and are saved by the same means, and on common terms. He then admonishes them to Christian Union, mortification of sin, holiness, honesty, meekness, love, the discharge of relative duties, and to be faithful in the spiritual warfare with Satan and his agents. Here again, the idea of common relationship to God and one another, and of salvation on the same terms is conspicuous. Christian Union—one in Christ—is the manifest design of this epistle. With this idea before us we turn to a consideration of the points designated.

I. "There is one body."

The meaning of this evidently is, that there is one, and only one, true church. This "one body" is the church that Christ established in the world, and is composed of all the true disciples of Christ. In the first chapter of this letter, the Apostle says, that God, the Father of glory, gave Christ to be "the head over all things to the church, which is his body;" (verses 22, 23). Again he says that the Lord gave apostles, prophets, evangelists, pastors, and teachers, "for the perfecting of the saints, for the work of the ministry, for the edifying of the body of Christ;" (4: 11, 12). This certainly is the church of Christ. See also 5th chapter 23rd and 30th verses. To the saints at Colosse, the same apostle says, in speaking of Christ, "And he is the head of the body, the church." Col. 1: 18. These texts, and many others, establish the fact, that the "one body" is the church of Christ.

The Apostle had taught them, that in Christ Jesus, the Gentiles, "who sometimes were far off are made nigh by the blood of Christ;" that, Christ had broken down the middle wall of partition between Jews and Gentiles; "having abolished in his flesh the enmity, even the law of commandments contained in ordinances; for to make in himself of twain one new man, so making peace; and that he might reconcile both (Jews and Gentiles) unto God in one body by the cross, having slain the enmity thereby." See 1st chapter 11—22 verses. Then he says, "There is one body;" not a body, or church, for the Jews, and a different body, or church, for the Gentiles, but one body, one church, for all, whether Jew or Gentile, bond or free, male or female. "Circumcision is nothing and uncircumcision is nothing, but the keeping of the commandments of God;" (1 Cor. 7: 19). "There is neither Jew nor Greek, there is neither bond nor free, there is neither male nor female; for ye are all one in Christ Jesus." Gal. 3: 28.

There is no fact more plainly taught in the scriptures of divine truth than this, that Christ organized and established but one church in the world. But as we read of churches, it is necessary for us to notice how the church of Christ was organized, that we may know what is meant by churches. Paul represents the church as being in our own similitude: "For as we have many members in one body, and all members have not the same office: so we, being many, are one body in Christ, and every one members one of another." Rom. 12: 4, 5. "For as the body is one, and hath many members, and all the members of that one body, being many, are one body; so also is Christ. For by one Spirit are we all baptized into one body, whether we be Jews or Gentiles, whether we be bond or free." 1 Cor. 12: 12, 13. Then, after referring to various members of the human organism, and speaking of their relation to each other, and of their sympathy, he adds, "Now are ye the body of Christ, and members in particular. And God hath set some in the church, first apostles, secondarily prophets, thirdly teachers, after that miracles, then gifts of healings, helps, governments, diversities of tongues;" (verses 27, 28). Again, "And he gave some, apostles; and some, prophets; and some, evangelists; and some, pastors and teachers; * * * for the edifying of the body of Christ: till we all come, in the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ." Eph. 4: 11—13. From these scriptures we learn three important facts: first, all the true disciples of Christ, being many, constitute one body, the church of Christ; second, all members have not the same office; and third, as the ear cannot say, "Because I am not the eye, I am not of the body," so in the church, no one may say, on account of his station, that he is not a member of the one body, or that the body is divided. Paul asks, "Is Christ divided?" Nay, surely not; neither is his body, the church.

Again, the gospel was to be preached in all nations, to every creature; and as the one body is composed of all who receive the glad tidings, it is evident that the whole body could never meet and worship in one congregation. It is not required of Christians to go up to Jerusalem to worship, nor to any other one place, but everywhere the true worshippers may worship him in spirit and in truth. The result was, that there were soon worshipping congregations in many different places. These different congregations were called churches, and although there were many, and each was composed of many members, yet all taken together constituted the one church; all having the same love, the same mind, speaking the same things, and walking by the same rule.

In this same sense a denomination of professing Christians, at present, is divided into many congregations. These congregations are governed by the same discipline, and all taken together constitute that denomination, or church. For illustration: The Methodist Episcopal church is composed of many congregations; each congregation is also called a church; yet as all the congregations, or churches, are governed by the same discipline, they compose only one body—the Methodist Episcopal body.

Now there are many different denominations; and it is claimed, by some, that all the denominations, taken together, constitute the body of Christ. To this we object, and will object, so long as these different denominations have not the same love, the same mind, speak not the same things, and are not governed by the same rule—the gospel of Christ. Whenever they are thus united, they will constitute the one body, and not until then; but just as soon as this union is effected, denominational differences will cease to exist, and sectarianism and party names will be thrown to the moles and bats—they will exist no more, except in history, until there is a new departure from the way of life. Christ in a parable represented himself as a vine, and his disciples as branches; but he nowhere speaks even of congregations, and certainly not of diverse denominations, as being branches of the true vine. Paul, in his letter to the Romans, represents the members from the Gentiles as having been "cut out of the wild olive tree," and grafted into a good olive tree (the church of Christ); but it must be remembered that, as soon as they were grafted into the good, contrary to nature, they partook of the root and fatness of the good, and consequently they were transformed from the wild into the good. So whenever we become ingrafted into Christ, we partake of his nature, his spirit, his mind, his love, in short, become Christ-like, and sectarianism will cease.

Agents at Work.

We observe that some of our agents have set in afresh to solicit subscribers, and that they are succeeding well. We have long been persuaded that, if our agents and readers generally would take hold of the wheel in earnest, and would improve every opportunity for six months, our list of subscribers might be doubled. In this, as in everything else, persistent effort is necessary in order to succeed. Perhaps the fault is partly with ourselves, that there is not more effort made on the part of many of our agents. We know that it is as necessary for us to keep them in remembrance as it is for them to talk with others; but we know, too, that, if we speak about this very frequently, our good motives are impugned and we are charged with begging. Will not all of our readers, and especially agents, accept this hint as a reminder, and improve every opportunity during the balance of this year to swell our numbers?

Full volume, $1.50. From No. 17 to the end of the year, $1.00.

Did the Savior Bear the Cross?

Under the above heading we find an article written by B. F. Koons, page 19, present Vol., where he asks this question, "Did or did not, the blessed Lord bear his cross to the place of execution?" We answer, No; from the very fact, that the sacred writers do not teach me so.

Matth. 27: 31, 32, "And after that they that mocked him, they took the robe off from him, and put his own raiment on him, and led him away to crucify him; and as they came out, they found a man of Cyrene, Simon by name; him they compelled to bear his cross."

Mark 15: 20, 21, "And when they had mocked him, they took off the purple from him, and put his own clothes on him; and led him out to crucify him. And they compel one Simon a Cyrenian, who passed by coming out of the country, the father of Alexander and Rufus, to bear his cross."

Luke 23: 25, 26, "But he delivered Jesus to their will. And as they led him away, they laid hold upon one Simon a Cyrenian, coming out of the country, and on him they laid the cross, that he might bear it after Jesus."

John 19: 16, 17, "Then delivered he him therefore unto them to be crucified, and they took Jesus and led him away. And he, bearing his cross, went forth unto a place called the place of a skull, which is called in the Hebrew, Golgotha, where they crucified him."

Now we have here three witnesses to prove that the Savior did not bear his own cross. This, brother K. will not deny. But he says that in John we have a positive declaration that the Savior did bear his own cross. But did John say so? We think not. Let us examine John a little. John says, "And they took Jesus and led him away; and he (who? Simon of Cyrene) bearing his cross." John does not say who; but the other three say that it was Simon of Cyrene. The words, "and he" signify something else. They mean some other person. If it should read, "And they took Jesus and led him away, he bearing his cross," then we might suppose that John meant Jesus himself; but as John wrote his Gospel more than fifty years after the rest, we suppose that he did not think it necessary to say who did bear the cross. We feel confident that Simon did bear the wooden cross after Jesus.

But Jesus did bear his own cross; not that wooden cross that Simon did, but that no one could bear for him. The sins of the whole world were laid on him; and he did bear his load with patience without a murmer.

Luke 9: 23 "Jesus says, If any man will come after me, let him deny himself and take up his cross daily and follow me.

Dear reader, cannot we take up our cross, and follow Jesus with a free will, and a ready heart, and not as Simon did, the wooden cross, when he was compelled to bear it? I will now give these few lines over to you; and if I am wrong, correct me by the word of God, and I will thank you for it. I fear no contradiction, as the brother in his last remark confessed that Simon did bear the cross after Jesus.

Yours in love,
JOHN G. NEHER.

BROTHER HENRY:—I feel my inability to write for the COMPANION, as it will be my first attempt. I love to read the COMPANION, but it is not long since I became acquainted with it, nor is it long since I became a member of the Brethren. I was led to them through the mysterious power of the Holy Spirit of God. I had been a member of the Baptist church for several years, and enjoyed myself for a short season; but a change came over me, and I began to realize that the things I once hated I now loved, and the things I once loved I now hated, meanwhile searching the scriptures, knowing therein were contained the words of eternal life; I became dissatisfied, feeling that I could not obey the commandments of Christ according to his words and my faith. Not being aware that there was a church in existence which met the requirements of the New Testament as they were given, I was much troubled, but not forsaken by the Lord, who had the means to deliver me out of this unhappy state. I came across a part of Nead's Theology, that had been cast away by some unknown person, and accidentally came under my observation. By closely comparing it with the scriptures I became convinced of the truth, and determined to unite with the church the first opportunity the Lord, in his providence, would bring about, and as the Lord willed, our worthy brother, John Nicholson, came this way, stopped in our little village, and delivered a few sermons. This was the first brother I ever heard preach, and gave me a chance to make application to unite with the church. I borrowed the whole book from brother Nicholson and gave it to a neighbor of mine, a Lutheran lady, who read it as I had done, and as a consequence, last fall together, we went a distance of about 15 miles to unite ourselves with the church. Now I would advise my brethren and sisters, who are in possession of this book, to lend it to their neighbors; for on account of so many different denominations, there are some who will be puzzled and not know what to believe. To brother Nicholson I would say, the book has been passing from hand to hand, and there are more calls for it than it can fill.

"God moves in a mysterious way."

BROTHER HENRY:—

As we, as a body of Christian brethren, are not only opposed to all secret societies, but make it a sine qua non, or test of membership, it is important that we keep that feature in our Church prominent upon its banners.

Do you feel free to insert in the C. F. C. the following extract:

"Freemasonry is a false religion, a rival of the Christian Church, an enemy to the true religion of Christ, and a damage to the families, churches and states, containing members of the same. It places the Bible on the same footing with the Koran. It strikes out the name of Christ from quotations made from the Bible in their ritnals and services," which name is the crowning glory of all good books, and of the holy scriptures. And husbands and wives, whom God hath made one, it separates in their confidence. Evenings which should be spent with their wives and children, are devoted elsewhere. It is an enemy of the church, and of the State, inasmuch as its secret oaths must often conflict with civil oaths, and the conscience thereby is corrupted. And it is fearfully true, that all secret associations down to the latest, "the Grange," are under their influence. They are sustained by recruits from those less objectionable orders, and we ought certainly to warn our members, and members' children of the danger.

Your brother,
ISAAC PRICE.

Address.

Brother F. M. Snyder's address, until farther orders, will be Box 358, Johnstown, Pa.

To a Sister in the Flesh.

It is with a deep sense of pain that I address you; because I had hopes that you would turn from your sinful ways, and join the fold of Christ; since I saw that in your sickness, about six months past, you had done works meet for repentance; such as casting off pride, and had taken to reading and meditating upon the word of God, and by calling one of God's ministers to encourage you, and declare unto you the way to become an heir in Christ's kingdom, more perfectly. But alas! I am deceived, and I am sorry that such is the case; for what an ornament you could have been in the Church of God, if you had lived faithful to your calling, what a light in your family, in your neighborhood, unto your comrades, and oh, the angels in heaven would have rejoiced! But all is gone; our hopes are blasted; the angels are made to mourn, and you, by listening more to Satan's servants, by moving in their company, and again following the foolish fashions of the world, and not taking heed of the warning of your nearest friends, are again on the road to destruction. Oh, I say with the deepest emphasis turn, TURN! for the way of the transgressor is hard; and it is better not to vow unto the Lord than break it. And what is worse still, I am afraid if you go on as you have again commenced, you will fall into sin deeper than before; for when the unclean spirit is cast out, and returneth again, he bringeth with him seven more, worse than himself; and should such be the case, that you would go on from one sin to another, till at last you would bring your aged father into trouble, and the rest of the family to shame; and should your case even not prove so bad as this, you are nevertheless on the way to destruction. And should death suddenly call you away, as it lately has some whom you well knew, how do you think your case would be? and how do you think your remaining friends would feel, if they had to stand around your grave? What thoughts do you think they would have to entertain, perhaps to feel that we had a near relative in that place, where the rich man was denied, even a drop of water to cool his parched tongue? For remember there are but two ways; one leadeth to heaven, and one to hell; one leadeth to the place where you would like to come to, and one leadeth to the place where no person of sound mind would even have a thought to land. But we have a just God, and he will judge us according to our words. Now it remains for yourself to judge on which of these two ways you are on; and if you feel that you are on the wrong, take fresh courage, go into the sanctuary, read the Word of God, and there learn that the sinners stand on slippery ground—they are utterly consumed with terrors—and that it is better to do as Moses, (Heb. 11: 25), "Choosing rather to suffer affliction with the people of God, than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season." My prayer is that your end may, by God's will, be in peace, and that we may meet where parting is known no more.

Your brother in love,

CYRUS BUCHER.

Discrepancies.

DEAR COMPANION:

You have been associated with my father's family, as a Christian companion, for a number of years. Your company is quite pleasaut and agreeable to me. I hope you have no unpleasant feelings towards me, for having been so reserved in conversing with you; but lest you might think that I did not feel concerned about my future enjoyment, uor our fraternal relatiou, I will try and talk a little with you. Beiug young and inexperienced, I may say some things that may seem a little singular to you; but what I shall say shall be the products of an inquiring miud.

Four wiuters ago, upon a cold, stormy day, I, with four others of my young associates, having resolved to take up the cross aud follow the Savior, stepped into the bath of regeneration, with floating ice all around us. There we were buried with Christ by baptism into death, that, like as Christ was raised from the dead, we resolved to walk in newness of life. But having come in contact with some (with me) incomprehensible, and I fear, insurmountable difficulties, I therefore now, your young and imperfect sister, iu order to find relief for my poor burdened heart, do, in all sincerity inquire to know the whys and wherefores of this great discrepancy in our wide extended Christian family circle. Many of our young sisters and brethreu, yes, both old and young, have been excommunicated from church fellowship, for not conforming to an adopted custom in the wearing of apparel. Mauy tears of grief and lamentation have been shed. Cries of "what shall we do?" have gone forth from mauy, both in and out of the church. Now for the discrepancy.

Upon a beautiful summer Sabbath-day, early in the morning, let us take our staud upon yonder church-yard, look at the assembling of the congregation. The approachiug chariot, iu its beautiful finish with silver plating, drawn by a well trained span of horses in their silver-mounted harness, bringing to our view a dear brother and sister, enjoyiug the style of the day. No one complains, or if there is complaint the decision is, forbearance; for if we undertake to correct our brethren and sisters in this matter, we get into trouble, as there are too mauy of us gratifying ourselves in this way.

Now, dear brethren, let us take another look all around us, and see how the Lord has blessed our brethren with an abundance of this world's goods. Some are enjoying themselves in one way, and some in another. I notice some take great delight in building splendid houses and barns: houses costing from five to fifteen thousand dollars, finished and furnished after the best of style of the world. All these extremes are passed over; but the dear young sisters, without a known stain upou their Christian character, are expelled from church fellowship, because of their deviating a little from the usages of the church iu dress. These are small matters in comparison to the above, and many more things that might be referred to. These grosser things are passed tenderly by; but many of the dear little lambs, for want of tender care and forbearance, stay away, wonder about and perish—some seekiug and finding homes in other churches. Will you or some other kind brother, tell why such a state of things should or does exist? By the help of the Lord, I'll stand the storm, and anchor by and by.

BROTHER HOLSINGER:

As we esteem your paper very highly, and have read, I think, every number so far, I do not know how we could do without it. Although we are poor in this world's goods, yet we still try to take the Visitor and the COMPANION. I love to hear from all the dear brethren and sisters. Sister E. Williams writes some very good and interest-articles to the poor members. We would like to hear from her ofteu.

We left Owen county, Ind., about three years ago, and came to this place where we found a few members, who have been very kiud to us. We have seen but two brethren since we left home, that we remember of ever having seen before. This seems to be a healthy country; and we would be very glad if some brethren would move here. There is room for many, and we stand in need of laboring brethren. Brother J. H. Filmore was with us two years; but now he has left us with only one speaker. Now we would say, if there are any that wishes to come West, come here where you are needed. We often think of the church we left in the East, where there were five or six speakers and many members. But we hope to meet all the dear brethren and sisters where parting is known no more, and where the wicked cease from troubling and the weary are at rest. What a consolation, dear sisters, we have in the word of God, if we only do his will. So let us all try and be faithful.

"A few more years shall roll,
A few more seasons come,
And we shall lie with them that rest
Asleep within the tomb."

If there are any that wish to know more of our country, let us know, and and will try and tell you the best we can. Direct to

Why I Changed.

My Dear Christian Friends:—Many of you have, by this time, probably heard that I have of late changed my denominational relation. For persons to leave one church and unite with another, is an occurrence which often takes place; but such an occurrence never ought to take place without being well considered. It is a serious matter, and ought not to be entered upon without a clear conviction of duty. When a member of a church changes his denominational relation, he should be so enlightened himself as to the path of duty, as to be prepared to give his reasons for so doing. My reasons for dissolving my connection with the Methodist Church are, I do not believe in sprinkling or pouring. I came to the conclusion, that sprinkling or pouring is an unscriptural mode of administering baptism, having neither precept, example, nor the most remote inference of either in the New Testament; and that immersion, being sanctioned by precept and example, is baptism: in short, that there is no baptism without it. Of course, my opinion must be, that those who are sprinkled are not baptized; and as unbaptized persons have no right to the communion, none but such as are immersed ought to commune together.

With these views before them, my Christian friends will plainly see that I could not remain in the Methodist church and be an honest member. Thus, my readers, you have my reasons for changing my denominational relation.

I was sprinkled when I was eight years old, and I verily thought myself baptized; but I am now quite sure that in this I had erred; and as baptism is the answer of a good conscience, I for conscience sake, have been obliged to make this concession, and follow my Savior. And I rejoiced when the hour came: I hailed it not as a cross. I complied with Christ's commands, not as a task, but as one of the happiest and most privileged acts of my life.

I would remark, that I have heard much said about my dissolving my connection with the Methodist Church; but I can assure the public that I have not been hasty in my conclusions, and I think that those who have heard my reasons will, at least, admit that my decision on these points was never made without much study and careful research to find out the truth. I can assure you, and all whom it may concern, that I never announced myself as "Dunkard," until I fully and unequivocally believed their doctrine; that I never gave up the subject until, to my mind, infant baptism and sprinkling were annihilated, and nothing left as scriptural baptism but the immersion of believers.

It has been inquired, "Why did you not go to your ministerial brethren, and frankly state to them your doubts?" To this I reply, why should I? Did I not understand all that could be said by the brethren? That ground was familiar to me, and I was certain that they could add nothing new. They might have given me advice, but surely they could not have given me arguments which I had not seen. I wanted arguments to counteract the Brethren's arguments, and not merely friendly advice.

Finally, I would say to all such as are inclined to censure me for dissolving my connection with the Church of my early choice—a Church of which I have been a member ever since I was fourteen years old—you may think me unwise, or even acting under an infatuation, and in this you may be honest. I also claim to be equally so, in believing it to be my duty to come out as I have done in defense of what I regard as the truth. Should even my motives be impugned, still an approving conscience will sustain me; and in the exercise of Christian love, I hope to pray, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." But to all such as honestly inquire, "Why have you done this?" I would say, consider well the statements which you have read, and above all, take the holy scriptures, search and see for yourselves. And may God grant His Holy Spirit, by which we may understand His Word and be made wise unto salvation, through Jesus Christ. I cannot but believe that the hand of God is in it, for he hath led me into a path that I knew not a few months ago. I therefore endeavored to weigh each argument on both sides, in the balances of divine truth. I think I was honest, and I am sure I earnestly prayed to be guided into the truth. I had not pursued the examination very far before I became convinced; and as I advanced, those convictions increased, till at last I was fully converted to the views which are entertained by the Brethren on these points, by which they are distinguished as such; or, in other words, I found myself in doctrine, a "Dunkard." I went over the ground again, and, again, and came every time precisely to the same conclusion, that there was no divine warrant for infant baptism in the Word of God.

I have now taken up my lot with another tribe of our common Israel; and the recollection that we belong to the same common family, will always afford me no small degree of pleasure; and finally, the hope of meeting in that bright world of light and glory, where we shall see truth without error, and forever bask in its sunshine, is most cheering and delightful in the prospect. There I hope to meet you, (and the many thousands of our own Israel,) with whom I have been associated for more than twenty of the last years of my life. Allow me to say, in conclusion, that the step which I have now taken is guided by God. Had I one doubt as to its propriety, I would hesitate, but I have not. My mind is clear, I know my duty, and I have cheerfully performed it. I am aware many may impugn my motives, and censure me for so doing, but if they do, I shall still pray for them. I am sure of one thing; and that is, those who know me best will give me credit for moral honesty; and those who do not know the facts, will do it ignorantly.

May the grace of God be with us all, amen.

DIED.

We admit no poetry under any circumstances in connection with Obituary Notices. We wish to use all alike, and we could not insert verses with all.

In Spring Run congregation, Mifflin county, Pa., April 24th, FRANKLIN HARVEY, youngest child of Bro. George H. and sister Rebecca J. SWIGART, aged 1 year, 1 month and 13 days. Funeral discourse by Elder P. S. Meyers from 2 Tim. 1 : 10.

The Savior said upon one occasion, "Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not, for of such is the Kingdom of heaven." Blessed promise! Whom the Savior blessed, is blessed indeed. Now if we humble ourselves and become as a little child,, the same Savior says heaven is ours; thrice blessed promise, that children and parents can both enjoy the same heaven and mingle in praising the same God.

S. W. Bollinger.

In Spring Run congregation, Mifflin county, Pa., April 27th, SARAH SERENA, only daughter of Elder Joseph R. and sister EVA S. HANAWALT, aged 2 years, 7 months, and 8 days. Funeral sermon by brother Abram Meyers, from Gen. 3 : 19.

Of our brother and sister's children, one died on April 3d, another on the 4th, and now one on the 27th, thus in the short space of 25 days they buried 3 children, and have but one remaining. Soon you will meet in heaven.

S. W. Bollinger.

Near Berlin, Somerset county, Pa., April 22d, JOHN PENROD, aged 74 years, 6 months and 16 days.

He was a member of the Seven Day Baptist Church. His funeral sermon was preached in the Brethren's meeting house, from Isaiah, 3 : 16, by brethren Jacob Blough and John P. Cober.

Ephraim Cober.

March 15th, CATHARINE A. MONROE, wife of Clark Monroe, aged 44 years and some months. Disease, cancer.

Her home was in Oswega, Kansas, but at the time of her death she was in Missouri, trying to have a cure effected by a physician, but it was of no avail, and death overtook her. She was taken to her home and buried there, leaving a husband and four children to mourn her loss. Two children had preceded her to the spirit world. She was a member of the United Brethren Church. Funeral occasion improved by a Methodist minister from Job 16 : 22.

Eliz. N. Barb.

On Sunday morning, April 27th, of paralysis, in Baltimore, at the house of Louis Detrick, his son-in-law, Elder JOHN H. UMSTEAD, aged 71 years, 3 months and 26 days.

His remains were brought home for interment with his family at Green Tree Cemetery, a piece of land he donated to the people of his charge. Though dead, yet he liveth in the hearts of his beloved flock, and his many friends, while he sweetly sleeps in Jesus.

In the Woodstock congregation, Shenandoah county, Va., January 10th, sister MARY RICKARD, aged 75 years, 4 months, and 5 days. Funeral occasion improved by brother Wakeman and the writer, from Rev. 14 : 13.

In Frederick Co., Va., April 20th, Eld. JAMES D. TABLER, aged 68 yeras, 10 months and 14 days. Funeral occasion improved by Elder G. Shaver, J. Wakeman and the writer, from Proverbs 14 : 13.

Sister Tabler, his wife, preceded him to the silent tomb about two years. She was in her 68th year.

Samuel A. Shaver.

In Shelby county, Ills., Aug. 13th 1872, sister ANGELINE CLEMENS, wife of brother David Clemens, aged 49 years. No brethren there to attend to the funeral.

Brother Clemens and family were formerly of Aughwick district, Huntingdon county, Pa.

A. S. FUNCK.

In the Ridge congregation, Franklin county, Pa., April 4th, sister ELIZABETH BURKHOLDER, aged 62 years, 6 months and 14 days.

She suffered much, but seemed to bear her affliction with Christian patience.—She leaves three children, two sons and one daughter (a sister), to mourn the loss of their kind mother. But they need not mourn as though they had no hope for their departed mother. The daughter has also been much afflicted, but if she proves faithful unto the end of this life, she may expect to meet her father and mother where afflictions are unknown.

Funeral services by the Brethren, from Ecclesiastes 9: 5.

DANIEL ECKERMAN.

In the lower Deer Creek congregation, Carroll county, Indiana, March 25th, our much esteemed brother REUBEN YOUNG, aged 40 years and 5 months.—Disease Erysipelas. He leaves a sorrowing wife and three small children, to mourn their loss; yet we think they need not mourn as others, who have no hope. In him the Church has lost a worthy brother, and the family a kind father.—Brother Reuben was elected to the office of deacon a little over a year ago, where we think he discharged his duties faithfully; ever seeming to be ready and willing to do what duty seemed to require.

Funeral service by C. Lesh and Henry Gish.

J. D. MUSSELMAN.

[Visitor Please Copy.]

In the Manor congregation, Indiana county, Pa., January 29th, sister NANCY RICHARDS, aged 40 years, less 6 days.

This was almost an extraordinary case, neglecting her duty until struck down by that dreadful disease, consumption, beyond all reasonable hope of recovery.—Having been pronounced incurable by her physician, she was led by the grace of God, to apply to the great physician. She sent for the elders of the church, and as a deeply penitent sinner, sought reconciliation with all she thought had aught against her, demanded baptism as an act of obedience by which she sought to have her sins cancelled by the application of the blood of Christ. As opportunity farther offered, she made request to have the ordinance of the holy communion, with its attendant ceremonies administered; which was attended to three days before her death. She now expressed herself ready to depart, with no desire to live any longer.

She selected 1 Thess. 5th chapter to be read on her funeral occasion, which was attended to by Elder Levi Fry. The time of discourse was postponed until the following Sabbath, when the writer improved the occasion from portions of the same chapter, assisted by Levi Fry.

JOSEPH HOLSOPPLE.

In the same congregation, March 11th, CHARLES FLEMMING, of scarlet fever, aged 7 years, and 3 months. Funeral text 1 Tim. 4: 10, by Joseph Holsopple.

In the Yellow Creek congregation, Bedford county, Pa., April 4th, bro her DAVID F. BUCK, aged 55 years and 12 days. Disease a complicated one; perhaps, asthma and bronchitis. His last years were devoted to the service of God; and in his last months he was concerned only in the setting of his house in order. A few weeks before he crossed the Jordan of death, he called for the Elders and had the solemn rite of anointing performed. He leaves a sorrowing widow and 4 children, father and mother [former 84 years old] to mourn their loss. While their loss is being deeply felt in the family circle and in the neighborhood, [none to fill his place,] we hope our loss is his great gain. Lord help us to profit by this providence. Funeral services improved from Thess. 2: 8, 19, to a very large concourse of people.

The Christian Family Companion. Is published every Tuesday, at $1.50 a year, by Henry R. Holsinger, who is a member of the Church of the Brethren, sometimes known by the name of "German Baptists," and vulgarly or maliciously called "Dunkards."

The design of the work is to advocate truth, expose error, and encourage the true Christian on his way to Zion.

It assumes that the New Testament is the Will of God, and that no one can have the promise of salvation without observing all its requirements, that among these are Faith, Repentance, Prayer, Baptism by trine immersion, Feet Washing, the Lord's Supper, the Holy Communion, Charity, Nonconformity to the world, and a full resignation to the whole will of God, as he has revealed it through his Son Jesus Christ.

So much of the affairs of this world as may be thought necessary to the proper observance of the signs of the times, or such as may tend to the moral, mental, or physical benefit of the Christian will be published, thus removing all occasion for coming into contact with the so-called Literary or Political journals.

Turn or Die.

"Say unto them, As I live, saith the Lord God, I have no pleasure in the death of the wicked; but that the wicked turn from his way and live: turn ye, turn ye from your evil ways; for why will ye die, O house of Israel?" Ezekiel 33: 11, Is it not astonishing, as we read the Holy Scriptures, how few will be saved, and the greatest part will be everlastingly shut out from of the kingdom of heaven? But nature itself, teaches us all to lay the blame of evil works upon the doers; and, therefore, when we see any heinous thing done, a principle of justice provokes us to inquire after him that did it. If we saw a man killed and cut in peices by the way, we would ask, "Oh! who did this cruel act?" So when we read that many souls will be miserable forever, we must needs think with ourselves, "How comes this to pass? and whose fault is it? who is it that is so cruel as to be the cause of such a thing as this?" and we meet with few that will own the guilt. It is confessed by all, that Satan is the cause; but he is not the principle cause: he does not force men to sin, but tempts them to it, and leaves it to their own wills whether they will do it or not. It therefore lies between God himself and the sinner: one of them must needs be the principle cause of all this misery. God disclaims it, and the wicked disclaim it, usually; and this is the controversy that is here in the text.

The Lord complaineth of the people, and the people think it is the fault of God. The same controversy is handled, chap., 18: 25; they plainly say that the way of the Lord is not equal. But God, in the text, clears himself of it, and tells them how they may help it, if they will; and persuades them to use the means; and if they will not be persuaded, he lets them know that it is the fault of themselves; and if this will not satisfy them, he will not forbear to punish them. In the text, God is clearing himself from the blame of their destruction. This he does, not by disowning his law, that the wicked shall die, nor by disowning his judgment and execution according to that law, or giving them any hope that the law shall not be executed, but by professing that it is not their death that he takes pleasure in, but their returning, rather, that they may live. Here is an express exhortation to the wicked to return. Wherein God doth not only command, but persuade, and condecends also to reason the case with them: "Why will ye die?" It is the promise of God, that the wicked shall live, if they will turn. If after all this the wicked will not turn, it is not the fault of God that they perish, but of themselves; their own wilfulness is the cause of their damnation: they die because they will die. O poor sinner! if you doubt whether this is the word of God, please refer to the following texts, Matth. 18: 3, "Verily I say unto you, except ye be converted, and become as little children, ye shall not enter into the kingdom heaven." 2 Cor. 5: 17, 'If any man be in Christ, he is a new creature; old things are passed away; behold, all things are become new." Heb. 12: 14, "Without holiness no man shall see the Lord." 1 Peter 1: 23, "Being born again, not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible, by the word of God, which liveth and abideth forever." Psalms 9: 17, "The wicked shall be turned into hell, and all the nations that forget God."

Need I add any more? If you believe the word of God, here is enough to satisfy you that the wicked must be converted or condemned. Should God send an angel from heaven to you, it seems you would not believe; for an angel can speak but the word of God, and if an angel should bring any other gospel, you are not to receive it, but to hold him accursed. Gal. 1: 8.

I beseech you now, all that love your souls, that instead of quibbling with the word of God, you will receive it, and comply with it. All you that are yet unconverted, take this as the undoubted truth of God; there is no other way but to turn or die. When you hear it from the Maker and Judge of the world, it is time for him that hath ears to hear. But the reason why so few escape it, is because they strive not to enter in at the strait gate, and the narrow way of holiness while they have time; and they strive not, because they are not awakened, to a lively feeling of the danger they are in; and they are not awakened, because they are loth to hear or think of it. If you had but once heard this word by the voice of and angel, "Thou must turn or die!" would it not sink into your mind, and haunt you night and day, so that in your sinning you would remember it, as if the voice were still in your ears? "Turn or die!" you may put this out of your mind, but you can not put it out of the Bible; there it will stand as a sealed truth, which you shall experimentally know forever, that there is no other way but, "turn or die." JOSEPH ROTHROCK.

Covering the Head.

I wish to say a few words to my dear sisters; and I do hope they will bear with me, when they consider that the apostle commands the elderly sisters to admonish the younger. Therefore I hope they will not consider me an intruder without a cause. The article that brother Eby has written, has brought several sisters to use the pen, and right sharply too. If the matter were just between brother Eby and the Iowa sisters, I would say, settle it yourselves; but this is not the case: it concerns the whole church. Remember, "a little leaven leaveneth the whole." Now I do not wish brother Eby to think that I have placed myself in his stead, to answer those sisters. No, by no means: it is your duty to teach them what is right. I only wish to throw in the widow's mite; and if it will be any help to you, then it is all I desire.

In the first place, I will ask these sisters who they suppose has best right to judge, what is the proper covering for the heads of the sisters, the church or those few who are unwilling to obey the order of the church. Do you not know, that, when the church was first organized, they adopted a plain cap for the covering of the heads of the sisters? and I do not know, at least, I never heard of it being rejected by any of the sisters until these last times. Now do you not think the brethren have a right to demand of you to obey the order. Remember God is a God of order, and he also wants order in his church.

But you say, 'Give us proof that the covering we prefer does not answer all the purposes of a covering." Very well, has not the church the same right to ask you whether a plain cap does not answer all for which the apostle was contending? So I hope you will see that the brethren have as much gospel for a plain cap, as you have for any thing else than a cap. Now I would like to know who ought to yield—the church that established the order hundreds of years ago, or those few disobedient sisters.

Remember, there ought to be order in the church; and we should be of one mind as much as possible. We know that it is almost impossible to be of one mind in every thing; but when it comes to the rules and ordinances of the church, we ought to be of one mind. This is possible; and we can only be so, if we are willing to obey the church.

I would like to know why some sisters are so unwilling to wear a cap, since the majority of them do wear them. I think I am safe in saying, that not more than one or two out of every hundred are unwilling to wear them. Is it pride, or is it stubbornness? I would rather think it is the latter, which, in my opinion, is worst of the two. If you want a pattern or scripture proof of what kind of covering the women used to wear, you must go back to Ruth the Moabitess. But I suppose a vail that would hold six measures of barley would not suit those sisters either. Perhaps if the church had adopted a thin vail, as worn now-a-days, it would suit them better than any thing else.

If the church would ask you to do something that would be contrary to the gospel, you would have a right to contend against it. But this is not the case in regard to the covering of the head. The brethren can produce as much scripture for a plain cap as you can for anything else than a cap.

Now dear sisters, I will leave you to judge for yourselves who you think ought to yield, so that there can be more of a uniformity. Remember what the Savior said, if any would not hear the church, they should be held as heathens and publicans. How beautiful it looks to see a whole house full of sisters, all with the same kind of covering on their heads! It looks like an army of soldiers, who have all initiated under the same banner.

That a bonnet is a covering we will not dispute; but it has not that power that the apostle wants the sisters to have on their heads: it does not distinguish the believer from the unbeliever; therefore it has not that power as if we were all in uniform.

I shall never forget my visit to the battle of Gettysburg, a few weeks after the battle was over. We saw coats, or parts of them, lying about, all full of bullet holes. You could easily tell by the color of them, to what party the owners of them belonged. Just so it ought to be in the church, so that the world can know us by the uniform, as well as by our walk and conduct, whether we are fighting for the cause of Christ, or whether we are contending for the order of the world. I will now close in love, and I hope our sisters will receive it in love.

Where is Man.

He is far from his native heaven, amid the turmoil and discord of a sin ruined world; and ruined through his own instrumentality, in choosing "death rather than life." When five revolving days of creation work had rolled away, revolving nature stood forth, in all it magnificent beauty, complete, as now evinced, save one great work; the God-like man was not yet formed. But when the sixth day arose, glowing in the orient, man came forth from the mighty hand of Creative Wisdom, erect, dignified, and with a soul adorned with all the matchless graces of its Divine Original, and a mind endowed with all the excellencies of an enriched, mental, maturity. In all respects Adam was the image of God, save in physical structure. Thus the morning of man's career, was bright and beautiful, radient with hope, and celestial love. Angelic host celebrated his advent, "and the sons of God shouted for joy," on beholding a kindred spirit, made perfectly happy in the possession of its blooming, elysian home.

God placed man in blissful Eden; but the tricky old serpent contrived get him out. Thus he lost his flowery bed of ease, his birth-right—his inheritance—his all: and falling from his superiority, to the deepest perdition, condemned and disdained, went forth from his Maker, a fugitive and vagabond, amid the mazes of life, with but one lone star to cheer his gloomy day, from Eden to Gethsemane: "the star, the star of Bethelehem."

Daily Devotion.

This is an exercise which every true Christian must be engaged in: and it is just as necessary that the inner, or spiritual man, is daily refreshed and built up, as bread is to the natural body. Yet we have every cause to believe, that it is greatly neglected, and even by many of our beloved brethren. When we behold the goodness, the tender mercies, and loving kindness of God our heavenly Father, we certainly should feel like praising his holy name. And again, when we consider the frailty, the nothingness, and inability of poor, mortal man, we certainly cannot help but daily to approach a throne of grace, asking his divine blessing upon us.

When we behold nature, everything appears to be pra'sing that God, who has erected it; yet man, who appears to have been created lord of creation, and the noblest of all God's created beings, ofttimes is dumb and silent to his creator.

Now brethren and sister, the word of the Lord is, that we should watch and pray, lest we fall into temptation; and again we are to pray without ceasing. These appear to be some of the commands of Jesus, let us see that we comply with them.

EDWARD IV. (at a time when Sir John Cheek, one of his tutors, was sick) asking, one morning, "How his tutor did?" was answered that "He was supposed to be near death; and had been absolutely given over by his physicians." "No," replied the king, "he will not die this time, for I have been wrestling for him today with God in prayer, and I have had an answer of peace; I know he will recover." And the event corresponded. Christ also prays for the spiritual and eternal life of his people; nor prays only, but prevails.

HE that makes transitory honor the reward of a good work, sets eternal glory at a low rate.

A few Words to our Ministering Brethren.

I hope that none of our ministering brethren will become offended at the perusal of this essay; for I have no apologies to make for its issue. When a minister does not seem to know his duty, I understand it becomes the duty of either a brother or sister to teach him, either by letter or by personal conversation.

But, probably, some of our ministers would rather have me prove that the liberty I am taking is in order. I will just refer you to the last five verses of the 18th chapter of Acts. I learn there that Apollos was an eloquent man, and mighty in the Scriptures; but, at the same time, it becomes the duty of a sister (Priscilla) to assist her husband (Aquilla) to expound unto him the way of God more perfectly. And I also learn from the same lesson, that a sister is justifiable in the sight of heaven, and all that heaven means, to instruct our ministering brethren where and whenever she thinks she can render herself useful, except in the pulpit.

I am well aware that it is quite a bold undertaking, for one sister alone to try to reprove our ministering brethren for not living in discharge of their duty; but I am writing in the name and in the fear of the Lord, and with an eye single to the glory of God, and I have by me the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God, and upon this I intend to rely.

Let us take the first part of the commission for a starting point. "And Jesus came and spake unto them, saying, All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth. Go ye therefore and teach all nations." Matth. 28: 18, 19.

"Go ye" is a command in positive terms. Our Savior did not tell his disciples to wait until invited to come to some certain neighborhood and preach to the people, as the most of our ministers do at present; but he said unto them, "Go ye." Now, brother minister, don't you think that our Savior said just what he meant and meant just what he said? But if any of you think that he did not just exactly mean all that he said, will you please be so kind as to tell the people just what the Savior did mean in saying, "Go ye, therefore and teach all nations?" "Go ye therefore"—for this reason. For what reason? For the proclaimed reason, that all power (authority or divine influence) was given to him in heaven and in earth.

Come let us see what our Savior meant by "all nations." If I ask our intelligent readers, what constitutes a nation? they will answer, "A body of people inhabiting the same country, united under the same sovereign or government;" and their answer will be correct. But here is the trouble(or disobedience) that lies between you and your God. Our ministers do not go and teach all nations; but if a part of one nation hears the gospel preached to them, our ministers seem to think that they are doing right well. It seems to me that some of our ministers have forgotten, or never knew, that "whosoever shall keep the whole law, and yet offend in one point, he is guilty of all." I imagine that some of our ministers, in reading this, will too hastily say, "What! have I ever offended in one point that will render me guilty in all?" To which I can answer, that some of you are not obeying the whole law. You fail to give yourselves continually to prayer and to the ministry of the word.

Let us see what the term coutinually will sound like when defined Without ceasing is the definition of the word.

"What!" say some of our ministers; "does any person think that we can give ourselves to the ministry of the word continually, without ceasing?" Certainly you can: it was for that purpose the church has called you to that most important work According to Mark 16: 15, you are to go "into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature." Do you suppose that the Lord would appoint you to a work that you are not able to perform? The Lord knows just what you are able to do, and what you are not able to do; and if you comply with the conditions that our Savior has offered you, he will be faithful to his promises. But, brethren, there is one promise that I fear you are going to fail in receiving, and that is, our Savior's being with you always, even unto the end of the world. It is only on conditions, that the Lord has promised to be with you unto the end of the world. It is providing you preach the gospel to all the world and every creature; or, in other words, teach all nations.

But stop here, brother, don't read another word until you think seriously and prayerfully upon this subject. Ask yourself, "Have I been faithful to my calling since I was appointed to the ministry? Or am I not aware that not one fourth of a fourth part of the world has never heard our brethren preach?" Oh brethren, do be candid and reflect awhile upon this subject; for when the last trump shall sound, the Lord himself shall descend from heaven, and the dead in Christ shall rise first. "Then we which are alive and remain, shall be caught up together with them in the clouds to meet the Lord in the air, and so shall we ever be with the Lord."

Brethren, do you expect to accompany that happy throng that shall ever be with the Lord? Or will you appear with those that will say, "Lord, Lord, have we not prophesied in thy name and in thy name have cast out devils, and in thy name done many wonderful works,"and to whom the Lord will profess, "I never knew you, depart from me ye that work iniquity." Just allow me to say to you that you have no right to expect a promise outside of your obedience. You need not expect to ever be with the Lord unless you comply with the conditions that our Savior has offered you. He has promised to be with you even unto the end of the world, providing you go and preach the gospel to all the world and every creature; but he did not promise to be with those that only preach about one half of their time and the other half engage in their worldly occupation.

Ambassadors for Christ, do you think that you are justifiable in the sight of God to only engage a part of your time in preaching, while there are millions upon millions of people that have never had the opportunity of hearing one of our brethren preach? Have you any idea what you are going to say for yourselves in the great day of accounts? I have often thought that our ministers excuse would be something like this, "We were ignorant of that one little offense that has rendered us guilty of all. We did all the preaching that we were able to do without compensation. We had our wives and children to support; and we could not keep them as they should be kept, unless we engaged one half of our time at our worldly occupation. We thought just because the apostle Paul preached free of charge, that we could also. But the trouble was just here, we did not take into consideration, that brother Paul was a bachelor and had no person to support but himself. If we just had our lives to live over again, we would give ourselves continually to prayer and to the ministry of the word."

But, brethren, if this will be your excuse, it will be a very poor one indeed; for the Lord ordained "that they who preach the gospel should live of the gospel." Cor. 9: 14. The Lord has provided a way for his ambassadors to live without laboring with their hands; for he is allwise, and he knew that it was impossible for our ministers to devote all of their time to studying and preaching, unless they and their families were supported by the church.
